[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

The Secretary of State was asked—

Reserve Forces

1. Mr. Bayley: If he will make a statement about the role of the reserve forces. [31403]

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Dr. John Reid): The reserve forces support the armed forces in a wide range of operational circumstances. We very much value that contribution, and the link that they form between military life and the civilian community. Their roles are being taken fully into account in our work on the strategic defence review, and our main priority is to make our reserve forces as usable and effective in future as they have been in the past.

Mr. Bayley: Is my hon. Friend aware that, in the past two years, the 3rd battalion of the Prince of Wales's Own Regiment of Yorkshire, which is based in my constituency, has supplied a total of 50 all ranks to support regular forces in a wide range of locations around the world, including Bosnia? Do not the Territorial Army and other reserve forces have a vital role to play in supporting our regular forces and ensuring that we achieve our military objectives, including humanitarian and peacekeeping objectives? Will he ensure that that is properly taken into account during the strategic defence review, and reflected in the White Paper when it is published?

Dr. Reid: Yes. We should all wish to pay tribute to the role that has been played, not only by the 3rd battalion of the Prince of Wales's Own Regiment of Yorkshire, but by the other Territorial Army units, which have done so well in providing members for our activities, not least in Bosnia. We shall, of course, take account of the utility and effectiveness of the Territorial Army and the contribution that it has made to our operations in the past. Like all other elements of our armed forces, it must be rigorously scrutinised, with the aim of ensuring that, in future, all our reserve forces are as usable and effective in the new circumstances as they have been in the past.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: Are not combat units the most difficult part of an Army to reinforce? Does the Minister agree that, whereas one can put civilians with specialist qualifications into uniform comparatively easily, the Army is the only organisation that can train people to serve in combat units, and that we neglect at our peril the role of people serving in combat units?

Dr. Reid: We would neglect that area at our peril, which is precisely why the Government have no intention of neglecting it. As the complexity of warfare and the security situation increases, many areas of the battle on land and air and in the sea become extremely complex. Logistics and other areas which, in a flexible, deployable force, in the past may not have received the emphasis that they should have done, are another subject, but I agree with the right hon. Gentleman's point on combat units, which is why we shall place such emphasis on them.

Mr. Linton: Is not the most valuable 2 per cent. of my hon. Friend's budget the part that is spent on the Territorial Army, especially the infantry battalions—not only because of the links that they forge with local communities, but because of the training role that they play through the Army Cadet force? The London Regiment, whose headquarters are in my constituency, looks after no fewer than 32 Army Cadet force detachments and is greatly valued by the local community.

Dr. Reid: Far be it from me to make invidious comparisons between such elements of the British armed forces. However, I take the point about the importance of the Territorial Army—not only its operational support to the regular Army, but its role as the link between the civilian and military community, its role in the regeneration of forces against, perhaps, a more distant threat, and its role in recruitment and in fostering the Army Cadets movement.

Sir George Young: The Minister will understand the concern in the Territorial Army and the volunteer reserves generated by the strategic defence review, which is studying its role. Originally, we were told that that review would be completed by last December. We were then told it would be completed in the spring. Last week, the Green Paper on the Defence Diversification Agency stated that an announcement would be made "later this year". Can the Minister bring to an end that damaging uncertainty by announcing a firm date by which the review will be both completed and published?

Dr. Reid: If anything, the damage is done by those who would rather have the review rushed than right. Unlike the previous Government, we are carrying out a detailed and in-depth strategic defence review to ensure that our forces are not hollowed out and that they are sustainable, deployable and as effective in the future as they were until relatively recently. Under the Conservative Administration, the Territorial Army had establishment figures of 91,000, which sounded marvellous until we found out that the actual figures were only 75,000. Similarly, when the figure fell to 59,000, we found out that it was actually only 55,000. The stronger the rhetoric from the Conservatives, the weaker the forces that they produced.

Smart Procurement Initiatives

2. Mr. Hutton: If he will make a statement on the Government's smart procurement initiatives. [31404]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Robertson): Smart procurement is a ruthless examination of how value for money from our procurement programme can be improved to ensure faster, cheaper and better delivery of our future requirements.

Mr. Hutton: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply and welcome the steps that he and the Government have taken to improve the procurement process, which will result in a better deal for the taxpayer and the defence industry as a whole and for my constituency in particular. Is that not the best way to ensure that we avoid the expensive delays, waste and cost overruns that came to characterise the procurement policy of the Conservative party?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is right and, coming from Barrow, he knows a little about procurement. I know that he will be feeling a special sense of pride, as will Barrow this week, as HMS Invincible, which was built there, steams home after distinguished duty in the Persian Gulf. On behalf of the taxpayer, we are trying to ensure that the cost and delivery overruns that were the experience of the past are minimised and, hopefully, eliminated.

Sir George Young: The Secretary of State will recall that the Scottish Labour party thought that it would not be smart to continue procuring Trident. Why are he and his hon. Friends so unsuccessful at persuading members of the Labour party in Scotland to adopt pragmatic defence policies? Is that not a case of old Labour fighting back and winning? Does not the clear message from the Scottish Labour party show that defence is not a priority, and does that not seriously undermine the right hon. Gentleman's negotiating position with the Treasury?

Mr. Robertson: No, it does not. The Scottish Labour party conference is entitled to express a view but, since it contradicts the manifesto commitment that we gave at the last election and that we intend to stick to, the decision is merely an expression of opinion. Of course, the Scottish Conservative party got so out of line with the country as a whole that it does not exist any more.

Recruitment Advertising

3. Sir Sydney Chapman: What amount and proportion of his Department's annual expenditure was allocated to recruitment advertising in 1997–98. [31405]

Dr. Reid: Some £22.71 million was allocated to service and Ministry of Defence civilian recruitment advertising in the financial year 1997–98. That represents 0.1 per cent. of the Department's expenditure allocation for the year.

Sir Sydney Chapman: I am grateful for that reply. On reflection, does the Minister agree that probably the greatest disincentive to recruiting people into our armed services in recent years has been the cases of Privates Clegg and Thain and of Guardsmen Fisher and Wright? Given the extreme anger felt by so many of my constituents at the continuing imprisonment of the two Scots guardsmen, will the hon. Gentleman have a word with the appropriate ministerial colleagues, including the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, to find out what Government action can be taken, as the issue has now become very much a political one?

Dr. Reid: As the hon. Gentleman would expect, I shall take the same position as all previous occupants of this ministerial post—I shall not intervene in the judicial process. I cannot agree that the issue has had a major effect on the level of general recruitment. The instability and insecurity engendered under the previous Administration—including, whatever their intent, their cack-handed approach to redundancies—and the general lowering of morale all contributed to the desperate situation.

When we inherited this portfolio, all three services were short—the Army was 5,500 soldiers short, and that figure was set to increase to 7,5000. I am glad to be able to tell the House that, for the first time in seven years, the quarterly figures show that the new Government have stemmed that decline and reduced the shortfall. Even though the increase has been modest, the Government's efforts are beginning to bear fruit.

Ms Squire: Following my hon. Friend the Minister's most welcome announcement, will he agree that those quarterly figures demonstrate that the Government have already had some success in tackling the dreadful shortfall in recruitment in the armed services that they inherited from the previous Government? Will he join me in welcoming the success in Dunfermline in Scotland of the initiative that was developed by Lauder college and Dunfermline's Army recruitment centre, which was so successful in recruiting young unemployed people to the Army that, for the first time, that Army recruitment centre exceeded its recruitment target when it signed up its 100th recruit last week?

Dr. Reid: I extend my congratulations to that recruitment office, which I know has exceeded its target for the first time, and to Lauder technical college on its gateway courses, which we hope will help to inform our approach nationally. Those gateway courses are one of a large range of initiatives that have been introduced since 1 May last year. We take this opportunity to tell anyone outside the Chamber who may read our debates that the armed forces are back in business. There are 25,000 opportunities a year for new recruits to have a rewarding and challenging career with skills and training that are second to none.

Mr. Hancock: I am sure that the whole House will be grateful for what the Minister said about the improvement in the figures. I am also sure that he would agree that the sacking of Major Joyce is hardly something that will excite young graduates or others to want to join the armed forces. What steps will the Government take to improve the situation for well-trained young service men who, sadly, have to rely on state benefits to supplement their incomes? Again, I should have thought that that was a serious impediment to recruitment. Finally, can he tell me whether the recruitment drive around the nightclubs of the north of England, which was announced some months ago in the Chamber, has met with any success?

Dr. Reid: On the first point, that is a personal and personnel matter between Major Joyce and his employer, the Army. It would be quite wrong for me to comment on what is a personal matter, or for Ministers to become involved in it. I merely say that, if the Army Board calls on any soldier to resign or retire prematurely, he can, should he so wish, seek redress against that decision through the chain of command, the Army Board and ultimately the monarch, and then seek judicial review in the divisional court of the High Court.

On the hon. Gentleman's more general questions, I am glad to say that the whole range of instruments to assist in recruitment that have been deployed since the Government came to office have, as I said, begun to bear fruit, although there is a long way to go. On the other question, I have called for an examination of those very few cases in which people have fallen through the net and are in receipt of supplementary benefits. He will be aware that, this year, the Armed Forces Pay Review Body, which is an independent body, ensured that the lower ranks in the armed forces received a higher increase than anyone else in Britain.

Ex-prisoners of War

4. Mr. Gibb: If he will make a statement on the process by which the complaints of officer ex-prisoners of war and protected personnel regarding pay deducted during incarceration were investigated. [31406]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. John Spellar): In response to a number of submissions from ex-officer prisoners of war and protected personnel, the previous Government established a thorough review to examine the deductions, the pay policy and its implementation. Following the general election, those submissions and the report of the review were presented to me. I considered them with great care and announced my conclusions on 24 July last year. I am satisfied that the process followed was sound. The report is available in the Library, and I commend it to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Gibb: Is the Minister aware that one of the leading campaigners on the issue—my constituent, Group Captain Ingle—fought for this country in the Battle of Britain, and was three times shot down and twice wounded in action before becoming a prisoner of war? Why does the Ministry continue to deny the requests of those incarcerated in Germany and Italy in the second world war to be heard and to contribute their first-hand knowledge of the facts of the case?

Mr. Spellar: No one takes away one iota from the record of both Group Captain Ingle and the many other officer personnel who were prisoners of war. Many submitted their views to the Ministry of Defence, and those were considered in the review. The report shows that the facts do not bear out their case. That view was taken by previous Governments. I examined the case with considerable care, and the conclusion was that it did not stand up. It gave me no great pleasure to draw that conclusion, but those were the facts of the matter.

Mr. Rendel: The Minister has told us that he does not agree that the written statements made out the case, but surely the question—to which I should still like an answer—was why those statements, apparently showing that pay that was withheld should now be disbursed, were not, according to those who submitted them, given sufficient weight in the investigation. Would it not have been better to allow the witnesses to give oral evidence, so that they could at least feel that their case had been made directly to the Minister? Perhaps his decision, which is disappointing at best, could thereby have been changed.

Mr. Spellar: A number of representations were made, as well as further follow-up representations. They have been deeply examined, especially in the light of contemporary evidence and the decisions that were taken at the time. Following representations made at the time, those matters were considered by Ministers in the immediate post-war Government, who were much closer to the issue. When we looked back in our review, it appeared that their reasons were sound. That has been the view of successive Governments of different political complexions.

Mr. Winnick: I do not remember many protests from Tory Members in the previous Parliament, or at any time in the past 18 years. That said, is my hon. Friend aware that some Government Members are unhappy—I certainly am—because we are not sure that the right decision was made? Bearing in mind the services of the ex-officers and their bravery in the most just war that this country has ever been engaged in—a war that has been over for 53 years—the matter should be re-examined.

Mr. Spellar: Not only the prisoners of war, but all those who served in the armed forces in the war, deserve our enormous and unending gratitude. We had to consider the facts concerning the deductions of pay from officer prisoners of war and protected personnel and determine whether there was a case for making repayments to them after the war.

Successive Governments have reviewed the case. The previous Government instituted a most thorough investigation, the papers from which were presented to me when we came into office. I looked through those papers with considerable care, and I am afraid that the case that was being advanced did not stand up.

Mrs. May: Does the Minister accept that former officer prisoners of war and protected personnel who had their pay docked when they were incarcerated in POW camps—and their families—feel a genuine sense of injustice? They feel that they have facts that bear out their case and they have—as, indeed, has one of my constituents—raised real questions about the report to which the Minister referred. To satisfy the feeling that there are facts and records to bear out that sense of injustice, is not now the time to call for an independent inquiry, so that people can present their evidence orally, as the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) suggested, and feel that a decision is being made independently of Government?

Mr. Spellar: The hon. Lady should understand that her Government came to a similar conclusion. Her views are not universally held by ex-officer prisoners of war, several of whom have written to the papers expressing the view that they do not wish to be associated with the campaign. There would be a reason for setting up an independent or a different inquiry if all those who had examined the case in depth and in detail had not concluded that the case is not made and that the facts do not bear out the claims. Therefore, I believe that we have come to the right conclusion, as did previous Governments of both political parties.

Ethnic Minorities

5. Jane Griffiths: What targets his Department have set to increase the number of people from ethnic minorities in Britain's armed forces. [31407]

Dr. Reid: The Government are determined that access to the armed forces is open to the widest possible reservoir of talent and, as part of that, the armed forces should better reflect the ethnic composition of our society. As part of that commitment, for the year starting in April, the goal for each service will be that 2 per cent. of new recruits this year should be from the ethnic minorities, with the figure rising annually by 1 per cent., so that it reaches 5 per cent. by the end of the financial year 2001–02 and, in time, reflects the proportion of people from ethnic minority communities in the wider population.

Jane Griffiths: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. What targets have been set for the Household Division, which, under the previous Government, was singled out for criticism by the Commission for Racial Equality?

Dr. Reid: Exactly the same targets have been set for the Household Division. I wish to express my gratitude for the way in which the Household Division has tackled the issue. We are working in partnership with the Commission for Racial Equality, and I have been impressed by the determination of the leadership of the Household Division, which stems from the reasons that I mentioned earlier—the effectiveness of our armed forces and their ability to recruit from the widest possible reservoir of talent—and is nothing to do with political correctness. I have been impressed by the commitment to pursuing that agenda that has been shown by the leadership.

Mr. Soames: I congratulate the Minister on the progress that he is making on a difficult, but essential and worthwhile, task. Does he agree that all three services have long recognised that it was not being done as well as it should be, and that they are determined to achieve much better figures? Is it not important that, when possible, members of the ethnic minorities should be able to serve together in bigger blocks than just one or two, which would make them feel more comfortable and perhaps would give them a better start?

Dr. Reid: Yes, I am glad to respond positively to both those points. No one should be under any illusions that the issue is not difficult and complex. The answer does not lie entirely with the armed forces, and we are building on the previous relationship with the Commission for Racial Equality. On the hon. Gentleman's second point, as we move on from a situation in which individuals are isolated, and therefore more exposed to those elements whom we wish to remove from the armed forces, it is better if larger numbers can be kept together for the sake of solidarity in the wider group. The hon. Gentleman's point is well taken.

Persian Gulf

7. Mr. Miller: If he will make a statement on the deployment of British troops to the Persian Gulf. [31409]

Mr. George Robertson: HMS Invincible, now relieved by HMS Illustrious, and all our service and civilian personnel deployed to the Gulf, have made a valuable contribution in helping the United Nations Secretary-General achieve an agreement with Iraq. Our forces will remain there to ensure that the agreement Saddam Hussein's Government have entered into is tested, adhered to and obeyed.

Mr. Miller: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Does not the agreement signed between Saddam Hussein and Kofi Annan represent a victory for diplomacy backed by the threat of force? In the light of my right hon. Friend's remarks about what is happening now, is it not important that our troops remain deployed until we are certain that Saddam Hussein meets his agreement?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is right to say that the lesson of the agreement achieved by Kofi Annan in Baghdad is that diplomacy without the threat of force would not have produced the result that the world felt so relieved about. The United Nations Secretary-General's words—

"You can do a lot with diplomacy but of course you can do a lot more with diplomacy backed up by firmness and force"— are the ultimate vindication of the decision of the United States and Britain, along with a growing coalition of others, to ensure that such force was put in place.

My hon. Friend is also right to say that we cannot take Saddam Hussein's word for granted. Others have done so, and his people may have taken his word. The reality is that, unless the potential for the use of force is still there, until we are sure that he will adhere to the agreement, we cannot be certain that he will behave in accordance with what the United Nations has laid down as the norm for the future.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Is the Secretary of State aware that to deploy forces in far-flung theatres such as the Persian Gulf, it is vital to have anti-submarine warfare capabilities? Will he comment on the grave concerns expressed in a letter in The Times on 5 March by Sir Patrick Duffy, a Navy Minister in the previous Labour Government, about the proposal that the 12-strong hunter-killer submarine fleet is likely to be cut in the strategic defence review?

Mr. Robertson: Sir Patrick Duffy, who is a good friend of mine, was one of those consulted during the many discussions that we had in the strategic defence review. I know his strong view about naval power in the future. The strategic defence review will take account of all potential threats to Britain's security interest, and will reach a balanced outcome.

Mrs. Gilroy: Will the Secretary of State confirm that, since the end of the Gulf war, Saddam has spent some $1 billion developing 45 so-called palaces while his people are starving? Do not that and the expenditure on the programme of weapons of mass destruction show that Saddam, not the west, is responsible for the suffering of the Iraqi people?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is right. There is an iniquitous aspect to the propaganda put out by Saddam that we in the rest of the world are responsible for the suffering of his people because of the imposition of sanctions. He alone is responsible for the sanctions regime being in place, and for it being in place so long. As she rightly says, an expenditure of some $1.2 billion since the Gulf war on building 40 lavish presidential palaces is astounding. His people would be appalled if they knew of it. The new oil-for-food resolution, 1153, allows the Iraqi regime to spend $5.2 billion every six months on essential food and medicines. The track record suggests that he will not use it correctly but we must hope that, having been given that flexibility, the poor people of Iraq will benefit from it.

Mr. Key: The whole House was immensely proud of our forces in their recent deployment to the Gulf, and we remain concerned for their safety. Given the changing nature of the threat, the increased threat of chemical and biological weapons, and the fact that our main ally, the United States, is embarked on a programme to inoculate all its service men and women against anthrax in the next couple of years, can the right hon. Gentleman explain why the offer of inoculation to our troops in the Gulf was left so late this time? Is it his policy that inoculation will remain voluntary, and will those inoculations be recorded by a new system, as envisaged by the previous Government?

Mr. Robertson: In the spirit of bipartisanship, I shall simply respond factually to those questions. I hope that the hon. Gentleman has noticed that the announcement of the decision to vaccinate against anthrax was taken simultaneously by the American Government, the British Government and the Canadian Government last week: that was not an accident. Although the threat assessment is still low, the danger still exists.

The independent medical panel of experts that I set up advocated the inoculation of those in the theatre with anti-anthrax vaccine, and that has now gone ahead. The Americans will use their own vaccine, but we were able to supply the Canadians with the vaccine that will be used for our troops. We believe that it is safe: indeed, so satisfied was I of that, that I, the Chief of the Defence Staff, my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces and the Surgeon-General all took the vaccine last week; we shall continue with the other three injections required for the course.

There will be complete documentation of all inoculations given. I am strongly urging all our troops in the area voluntarily to have the vaccination on the ground that it will be good for them and give them a protection that they require.

Land Mines

8. Mr. Sarwar: What action his Department is taking in relation to anti–personnel land mines. [31410]

12. Ms Southworth: What steps his Department is taking to help those involved in humanitarian demining. [31414]

Mr. George Robertson: The Government have been at the forefront of international moves towards a global ban on anti-personnel land mines and in providing assistance to humanitarian demining. We shall soon destroy about 1 million anti-personnel land mines, keeping only a very small number needed for training in mine clearance. We have also established a mine information and training centre.

Mr. Sarwar: Will my right hon. Friend join me in paying tribute to the late Diana, Princess of Wales for her contribution to raising awareness of land mines, which have killed thousands of innocent men, women and children throughout the world? Does he agree that the British Army is doing an excellent job and playing a major role in eradicating land mines? Will he tell the House what further steps he intends to take during our presidency of the European Union to eradicate land mines, which are killing almost 70 people a day?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is right to point to the pioneering work of Diana, Princess of Wales in drawing attention to the land mine menace, which still plagues our planet. Her legacy will continue through the Ottawa treaty, which was signed by many countries that are now dedicated to eradicating the weapon from the earth. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall continue to use the formidable expertise of the British Army and to ensure that it is able to help not only other military agencies but the civil and humanitarian charitable community in dealing with a weapons system that has damaged or killed many millions of people and has the potential to continue to do so in future.

Ms Southworth: My right hon. Friend will not be surprised to learn that I have received considerable representation from my constituents, who share my horror at the threat land mines pose to the life and health of children living in many countries. Will he investigate the possibility of his Ministry providing equipment to people working on humanitarian de-mining, so that we can make progress toward ending the tragedies that happen every day?

Mr. Robertson: I welcome my hon. Friend's concern, which is shared by many thousands of people in this country and millions around the globe. Her horror and outrage is well reflected within the Government. I can announce today that we are about to gift to the Halo trust—an organisation with which Princess Diana had much to do—10 surplus Volvo medium-wheel tractors, valued at £125,000. They will increase considerably the rate of mine clearance and the safety of operators once the Halo trust has suitably armoured them. We believe that this is a good and meaningful contribution to the work being done by that agency, and we shall look at what else we can do. I am extremely proud that this Government have led the way in the campaign against anti-personnel land mines. They are a blight on the face of the earth, and the sooner they are outlawed for ever, the safer our world will be.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am glad that the Secretary of State mentioned the Halo trust. Is he aware that that trust and other non-governmental organisations are doing much brave and dedicated work clearing anti-personnel land mines throughout the world, including Afghanistan? Is he also aware that British troops in Bosnia are clearing a large number of anti-personnel mines? It is difficult and dangerous work, and there does not seem to be any co-ordinated effort between the stabilisation force and the large number of countries that are participating in the work in Bosnia. Will the Secretary of State undertake to raise that matter in the United Nations to see whether there can be a co-ordinated effort to have a strategic plan to clear the mines?

Mr. Robertson: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's interest and concern and agree that a bipartisan approach, which should be built on, is being taken on anti-personnel land mines. The expertise of our armed forces in the area can rightly and properly be put to much use, which is what I have tried to do since Labour came to office 10 months ago.

I am a bit baffled by what the hon. Gentleman said about Bosnia, as I know of the distinguished work done by the British services in Bosnia on the appalling legacy of land mines there. I know because I was there and saw British Army officers teaching local de-miners how best to go about their job. British forces in the stabilisation force in Sarajevo are part and parcel of a well-co-ordinated United Nations operation in the mining information centre in the SFOR headquarters. The British play a strong part in that co-ordination, and we shall continue to ensure that the maximum effort is devoted to making that country safe again.

Parachute Regiment

9. Mr. St. Aubyn: What assessment he has made of the current operational roles of the Parachute Regiment. [31411]

Dr. Reid: The operational roles of all elements of the Army are being looked at as part of the strategic defence review.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I thank the Minister for his reply, which was not as comprehensive as the leaks to the press over the weekend. Will he confirm that the identity, traditions and, above all, command structure of the Parachute Regiment will not be changed as a result of his Department's strategic defence review?

Dr. Reid: I am delighted to pay tribute to the glorious history of the Parachute Regiment and the contribution that it has made to the armed forces in a relatively short space of time.

I should not have to tell the hon. Gentleman not to believe everything that he reads in the newspapers. My answer may not have been as accurate or as long as the leaked report, but at least it was my own. The leak had nothing to do with any Labour Member of Parliament. Contrary to the ill-informed speculation in the leak, no one is talking about disbanding the Parachute Regiment or, for that matter, the Marines, but like all other elements of the ground forces, the land command and the wider forces, they are being subjected to scrutiny. The whole purpose of the foreign policy-led review is to ensure that we have a force configuration that relates to today's security analysis, not the past. We want to have useable, effective forces for the future, and even those which have had a glorious past may have to adapt owing to the new security situation.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. I call Mr. Brazier, who served in the Parachute Regiment.

Mr. Brazier: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Does the Minister agree that the special qualities and military skills of the Parachute Regiment and of its supporting airborne, engineer, artillery and logistic units go far beyond their means of delivery on to the battlefield and should be highlighted, not watered down, in the review? Does he also agree that the two Territorial Army Parachute Regiment battalions and other airborne and commando units are among the best and most flexible units in the TA?

Dr. Reid: Thank you for the background information, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: My research is very good.

Dr. Reid: Yes, the hon. Gentleman is a fine big man.

The qualities, character and ethos of the Parachute Regiment are well known, and I have the highest regard for it. The hon. Gentleman ran through the capabilities of various units associated with the regiment, but he will not expect me to guarantee that nothing will ever change, for the Paras or for any other unit. However, I assure him that the qualities of the Paras are well known and appreciated, and that no one is talking about disbanding this famous regiment. We want to build on the abilities of our units to enhance their effectiveness in the face of new security threats and our response to them. The Parachute Regiment always played an honourable role, and it will do so in the new configuration.

Mr. Bob Russell: If newspaper reports prove correct and the Parachute Regiment, in a new form, moves to the garrison town of Colchester, where 24 Air Mobile Brigade is based, I can say that it will be given a warm welcome. Does the Minister agree that the traditions of the Parachute Regiment will continue, as did those of the cavalry regiments following mechanisation? I believe that there is a future for the Parachute Regiment, albeit in a different guise, and welcome the Minister's assurance that it will live on.

Dr. Reid: I thank the hon. Gentleman and note his comments. If those press reports are accurate, I must have spent the past eight months undertaking a different defence review from the one the newspapers have reported.

Defence Medical Services

10. Angela Smith: If he will make a statement on Defence Medical Services. [31412]

Dr. Reid: Defence Medical Services continues to carry out its duties with professionalism and dedication, both in peacetime and in support of operations. We are urgently addressing shortfalls in manpower and operational medical equipment in the context of the strategic defence review. We are also reviewing the future arrangements for secondary care.

Angela Smith: Does my hon. Friend agree that the state of Defence Medical Services is an indictment of the condition in which it was left by the Conservative Government? What steps are being taken to rectify equipment and personnel shortages?

Dr. Reid: We knew in opposition that there were problems with Defence Medical Services, and just before the general election, the Defence Committee highlighted its parlous state. Detailed scrutiny has revealed that we had not realised how bad things were. There are severe manpower shortages and such a lack of proper investment that we could not properly support a single operational brigade without implementing wider measures such as the use of reserves.

I shall not pretend that there are no difficulties, but the matter is a priority in the strategic defence review: the shortages constitute one of the potholes that we will have to fill before we enhance other capabilities. I have commissioned an urgent review of secondary care in the United Kingdom, and am treating the matter seriously.

Mr. Wilkinson: The Minister's statement that steps will be taken to improve the capability of Defence Medical Services is welcome, not least because it shows that the Government are responsive to Select Committee recommendations. Will he improve the quality of Defence Medical Services by taking three comprehensive steps: by providing an adequate career structure for medical officers in the three services; by increasing the number of defence medical units in general hospitals; and by augmenting the capacity and range of responsibilities of medical reservists of all three services?

Dr. Reid: The hon. Gentleman asks about the career structure. He will know that this year's settlement for dentists, for instance, was widely welcomed. We are considering the reintroduction of distinctions in the medical services that are comparable with what is outside. There is a range of instruments at our disposal, including, as he said, the wider and perhaps earlier use of the reserves in the Defence Medical Training Organisation.

All those matters are being seriously considered, but I should not like to lead the House to think that there are easy answers, first, because of the inherited position from which we start and, secondly, because of the changing nature of the health service and trusts, which are now much more competitive than before. Because of the reduction in armed forces personnel, it is difficult to keep a range of tasks that employ the expertise of the medical services.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The President of the Council was asked—

Human Rights Select Committee

33. Mr. Corbyn: If she will examine the case for establishing a human rights Select Committee. [31438]

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Ann Taylor): The White Paper "Rights Brought Home" said that the Government favoured the establishment of a new parliamentary Committee with functions relating to human rights. We intend to take into account what is said during the passage of the Human Rights Bill before deciding what form of parliamentary Committee to recommend to the House.

Mr. Corbyn: Is my right hon. Friend prepared to meet a group of hon. Members who take a particular interest in human rights issues to discuss how that Committee might be set up? Will she recognise that, as human rights are now at the forefront of the Government's foreign policy, it is quite difficult for the Foreign Affairs Committee to deal with human rights issues around the world as well as British foreign policy interests? Does she agree that we would be better off if we did what many other Parliaments do and had a separate, dedicated human rights committee that can take up and investigate human rights issues in the world and try to bring them to the attention of the British Parliament and, obviously, the Government?

Mrs. Taylor: I think that my hon. Friend anticipates some of the discussions that will take place in Committee on the Human Rights Bill. I am always available to meet hon. Members who wish to speak to me about these issues, but we should judge the timing of any such meeting by what is said in Committee on the Human Rights Bill.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I thank the President of the Council for her answer to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) and join in pursuing his request. Is she as convinced as I am that it would do a great service to the House and to Parliament if we were seen to use the best experiences of other Parliaments to set up a body, potentially involving Members from both Houses, to examine human rights matters in this country and abroad? If the right hon. Lady is willing to come to a view after the Human Rights Bill has left Committee, that would be hugely welcome and could lead to a long overdue reform of the processes of this place.

Mrs. Taylor: I said in my original reply that the White Paper states that we favour the establishment of a parliamentary Committee. However, we should not prejudge what form it might take or whether it might be a Joint Committee but should wait until the Human Rights Bill has left Committee. Those matters are all aspects of the discussion that we shall take into account, and, of course, we shall consult widely.

Private Members' Bills

34. Mr. Hanson: What proposals she has to review the procedure for consideration of private Members' Bills. [31439]

Mrs. Ann Taylor: I have no current plans to do so.

Mr. Hanson: In the interests of modernisation, which I know she shares, will my right hon. Friend consider the possibility of timetabling private Members' Bills so that all stages of Bills that have the overwhelming support of hon. Members, such as that promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster), have an opportunity to be considered and voted upon, and a small number of hon. Members do not have an opportunity to filibuster them out of existence?

Mrs. Taylor: I share my hon. Friend's deep disappointment at the antics of Conservative Members on Friday. He knows that the time that is available for private Members' Bills is established by the House. If the Government sought to change the rules, there would be a great deal of interest in the House. For example, if we changed the rules for one Bill, there would be legitimate arguments by the promoters and sponsors of others that they had been treated unfairly. In its first report, the Modernisation Committee said that it may wish to give attention to how private Members' Bills are treated.

Sir Teddy Taylor: As the Government have made it clear that hunting with hounds is not an issue that will be dealt with by public legislation, is it not an insult to democracy for them to make no time available for further consideration of the Wild Mammals (Hunting with Dogs) Bill, particularly bearing in mind that only one weekday is needed? Rather than engaging in political exchanges, does the right hon. Lady appreciate that hon. Members on both sides of the House who feel strongly about this issue believe that they have been sold down the river, basically because assurances were given in writing by people who now serve as Ministers?

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman should bear in mind that one day is still available for the Bill and that, if matters were as simple as he suggests, the Bill would make further progress this Friday. Ministers' assurances that there would be a free vote on the issue have been upheld—Labour Members have had a free vote—but there would be great problems in giving extra time at this stage and adverse consequences for the passage of the Government's business, which must take priority.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will my right hon. Friend arrange a seminar for Back Benchers in which she can explain that Back Benchers' ability to hold up legislation or to progress it is one of their last remaining powers and that those who talk about timetabling Bills do Back Benchers, irrespective of their party and certainly of the rubbish that goes on, a great disservice? Under the guise of modernisation, Back Benchers have already lost the power to vote on a number of Back-Bench issues, and have gained in return Adjournment debates that give them no power.

Mrs. Taylor: The changes have helped many Back Benchers to have important Adjournment debates on Wednesday mornings, and that provision is widely appreciated by the House; but my hon. Friend is right to point out that private Members' Bills depend on the overall will of the House. It would be difficult .o reach agreement that there should be the type of timetabling that has been suggested. If I were to organise a seminar on these matters, I would ensure that she was one of the speakers.

Mr. Hancock: I am sure that the President of the Council shares the view that a majority of hon. Members are disenchanted with what happened last Friday and that a majority of people in the country are disappointed with the way in which Tories and others behaved. Will she consider proposing that the House should sit on Tuesday and Thursday mornings to give the Wild Mammals (Hunting with Dogs) Bill a fair chance of succeeding in all aspects of its passage through the House and that that should set a precedent for other private Members' Bills that might be similarly affected by the bizarre behaviour of hon. Members who want to frustrate democratic processes in the House?

Mrs. Taylor: I am aware that there is considerable concern about the Bill both inside and outside the House. I was one of the people who stayed here last Friday to vote for the Bill and I shall do so again this Friday. As the hon. Gentleman appreciates, were the Government to seek to change the rules for one Bill, promoters and sponsors of other Bills would have legitimate objections. We have to deal with these matters fairly. As I have said, it is one of the topics to which the Modernisation Committee may wish to turn its attention in the not too distant future.

Parliamentary Year

35. Mr. Bradshaw: What proposals she has to reform the parliamentary year; and if she will make a statement. [31441]

Mrs. Ann Taylor: The Modernisation Committee will consider the matter shortly, now that it has completed its work on the two reports that were published this morning: one on conduct in the Chamber, including recommendations on short speeches, precedence for Privy Councillors and the use of top hats; the other on the carry-over of Bills. I commend both reports to the House.

Mr. Bradshaw: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply and I congratulate her on her reports. Am I right in thinking that, with Easter barely a month away, we still do not know if or when there will be an Easter recess, let alone a Whitsun or summer recess? Does she accept that many hon. Members would gladly settle for shorter recesses if they were more predictable, so that we could plan our lives?

Mrs. Taylor: I did indicate, in the first week the House sat in January, the likely dates of the Easter recess. My hon. Friend and other hon. Members will appreciate that, with the business ahead of us and the fact that we sometimes have to wait for Committees to finish or for Bills to come back from the House of Lords, it is difficult to anticipate the details of business a long time in advance. However, we are now giving two weeks' notice of business wherever possible and an early indication—even if it is sometimes in general terms—of other major events and when recesses are likely to be.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I thank the right hon. Lady for the leadership she has given to the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons. Does she accept that the agreement on the carry over—and it has to be with agreement that Bills are carried over—will make it easier to define a parliamentary year? While I do not necessarily associate myself with everything the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw) said, does the right hon. Lady accept that there would be a widespread welcome for a more structured parliamentary year?

Mrs. Taylor: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments. It will be for the convenience of the House if we experiment with the carry-over procedure, and I believe that we will be able to make progress on that. The hon. Gentleman was right to say that, if we manage to use that procedure successfully, it may be possible to anticipate, with greater certainty, the likely pace of the parliamentary year and when the recesses might occur.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. My point arises from some articles in the press on Sunday, which speculated, clearly on an informed basis, that there would be changes to the mode and ceremonial of the state opening of Parliament and other matters relating to the House.

Do you agree, Madam Speaker, that it is for the House to make those decisions? As the champion and guardian of Back-Benchers' rights, will you ensure that no changes are made before they have received the most detailed scrutiny in the House?

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it not right that we should be given the details of the full cost of the state opening of Parliament? They were denied to us in the last Parliament, but we know that police costs are at least £300,000 for the day—in addition to the disruption of traffic in London. Should we not consider having one state opening per Parliament, rather than one a year?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman's last point was not a point of order.

I want to deal with the original point of order from the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames). He should not indulge in newspaper speculation—I do not. Any changes of the nature suggested are a matter for the House. I have not yet been asked my views on the matter, but I have very strong views and I am ready to give them as soon as I am asked.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. While it is right and proper that you should have full opportunity to comment on any suggested changes, do you agree that the official Opposition and other parties should be consulted widely on any such matters?

Madam Speaker: As far as I am concerned, all Members and all parties should be invited to comment whenever there is any suggestion that major changes should be made.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I have dealt with the matter.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I make no complaint that question 38 was not reached, but have you by any chance received a request from the Foreign Office to make a statement clarifying the difference of opinion between, on the one hand, Mr. Kofi Annan, Russia, China and France, and on the other, the United States and, possibly, the British Government, on the authority that is needed for a military strike against Iraq?

Madam Speaker: I have had no such request. Of course, it is Foreign Office questions tomorrow. I do not know whether there is a question that covers the point that the hon. Gentleman is trying to make, but, if there is, he may try to catch my eye at that time.

Orders of the Day

National Minimum Wage Bill

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New clause 1

VOLUNTARY WORKERS

'.—(1) A worker employed by a charity, a voluntary organisation, an associated fund–raising body or a statutory body does not qualify for the national minimum wage in respect of that employment if he receives, and under the terms of his employment (apart from this Act) is entitled to,—

(a) no monetary payments of any description, or no monetary payments except in respect of expenses—

(i) actually incurred in the performance of his duties; or

(ii) reasonably estimated as likely to be or to have been so incurred; and

(b) no benefits in kind of any description, or no benefits in kind other than the provision of some or all of his subsistence or of such accommodation as is reasonable in the circumstances of the employment.

(2) A person who would satisfy the conditions in subsection (1) above but for receiving monetary payments made solely for the purpose of providing him with means of subsistence shall be taken to satisfy those conditions if—

(a) he is employed to do the work in question as a result of arrangements made between a charity acting in pursuance of its charitable purposes and the body for which the work is done; and

(b) the work is done for a charity, a voluntary organisation, an associated fund–raising body or a statutory body.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (1)(b) above—

(a) any training (other than that which a person necessarily acquires in the course of doing his work) shall be taken to be a benefit in kind; but

(b) there shall be left out of account any training provided for the sole or main purpose of improving the worker's ability to perform the work which he has agreed to do.

(4) In this section—

"associated fund–raising body" means a body of persons the profits of which are applied wholly for the purposes of a charity or voluntary organisation;

"charity" means a body of persons, or the trustees of a trust, established for charitable purposes only;

"receive", in relation to a monetary payment or a benefit in kind, means receive in respect of, or otherwise in connection with, the employment in question (whether or not under the terms of the employment);

"statutory body" means a body established by or under an enactment (including an enactment comprised in Northern Ireland legislation);

"subsistence" means such subsistence as is reasonable in the circumstances of the employment in question, and does not include accommodation;

"voluntary organisation" means a body of persons, or the trustees of a trust, which is established only for charitable purposes (whether or not those purposes are charitable within the meaning of any rule of law), benevolent purposes or philanthropic purposes, but which is not a charity.'.—[Mr. Ian McCartney.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.33 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian McCartney): I beg to move, That the clause be now read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment (a) to the proposed new clause, in subsection (1), leave out from 'he' to end of subsection (2)(b) and insert—

'(a) works less than 20 hours per week in that employment,

(b) receives remuneration and allowances (including the value of any benefits in kind except subsistence and accommodation which are reasonable having regard to the circumstances of the employment) which amount in aggregate to less than the equivalent of 10 times the hourly national minimum wage per week, and

(c) is not in receipt of any state benefits other than the state retirement pension.

(2) Any payments made in respect of mileage allowance within the limits prescribed by Inland Revenue from time to time in respect of the Fixed Profit Car Scheme shall be disregarded for the purpose of calculating remuneration under (1)(b) above.'.

Amendment (b) to the proposed new clause, in subsection (1)(a)(ii), after 'incurred' insert

'or

(iii) paid as mileage allowance within the limits prescribed by the Inland Revenue from time to time in respect of the Fixed Profit Car Scheme;'.

Government amendment No. 20.

Mr. McCartney: Today's debate is another milestone in establishing a national minimum wage and in tackling poverty across the United Kingdom. The debate follows a failed filibuster by the official Opposition in the Standing Committee, where we had occasionally to debate for 26 and a half hours to make some proper progress on the Bill. Today, we see on the Opposition Benches a bedraggled army of fat cats, former fat cats and wannabe fat cats, who—both today and in the early hours of tomorrow morning—will undoubtedly try to promote their low-pay and no-pay strategy. The truth is that the official Opposition have lost the argument in the country and in Committee, and that they will lose it on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it in order for the Minister to refer to a filibuster in Standing Committee? That implies that some of the Standing Committee's debate was out of order. As a member of that Committee, I can say that at no point was the discussion substantially out of order.

Madam Speaker: I doubt very much whether there could have been a filibuster in Committee, as my Chairman in that Committee would not have allowed such a thing to happen.

Mr. McCartney: Madam Speaker, I did say that there was "a failed filibuster." The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) would not in any circumstances have been able to hoodwink my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), who—with the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson)—brilliantly chaired the Committee. It was a failed filibuster—the attempt was abysmal—which is why we are now considering the Bill's Report stage on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): In the middle of the Minister's various bits of rhetoric, he mentioned those who have failed not only in a filibuster but in being fat cats. As I presume that, at some stage, he will get round to speaking to new clause 1, would he like now to concede that, on the Opposition Benches, he is addressing a former chairman of the all-party group on charities and the voluntary sector?

Mr. McCartney: The hon. Gentleman is a bit of a wounded soldier; but I have not yet started. I did not mention any names, but we will undoubtedly be able to determine from the speeches made in the debate who are the fat cats, the wannabe fat cats and the failed fat cats.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): Who is fat?

Mr. McCartney: I am fat, but I am not a fat cat.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Will my hon. Friend give way on that point of delay?

Mr. McCartney: I give way.

Mr. Sheerman: Everyone knows that the official Opposition are opposing the Bill tooth and claw. Will my hon. Friend confirm that there has already been delay in passing a measure which is hugely popular among the public? Will he tell the House by how much the Bill has been delayed by the official Opposition? Some hon. Members would like to know when, at the earliest opportunity, we can implement a minimum wage.

Mr. McCartney: I can reassure my hon. Friend that they have not delayed the Bill—they have failed to delay it. Furthermore, they will not be allowed to delay the Bill, because the Government regard its passage as an absolute policy priority. That is why we have so quickly brought the Bill back to the Floor of the House for its Report stage and Third Reading, after which it will proceed to the other place, and then—in double-quick time—on to the statute book. Its provisions will then be enjoyed by countless numbers of low-paid workers in the United Kingdom.

Government amendment No. 20 and new clause 1 would replace clause 42 on voluntary workers. I am pleased to say that the entire approach to the clause has been marked by a consensus both on our aims and on the means of achieving them. We want to ensure, first, that genuine volunteers—who give their time to good causes—are not caught up in the Bill's provisions. We want to ensure also that voluntary organisation staff members—all 485,000 of them—are entitled to the national minimum wage. I believe that there is a consensus on those aims, both within voluntary organisations and on both sides of the House.

When we discussed the volunteers issue in Committee, I made a commitment to re-examine clause 42, to ensure that it would work as we want it to. We have subsequently had intensive discussions with voluntary organisations. I have discussed the position also with the hon. Members for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) and for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey). I am pleased to say that the voluntary organisations have said that they support our approach. I think that we have got the matter right, and that our proposals incorporate in the Bill the reality of volunteering.

Before explaining the main differences between new clause 1 and the original clause 42, I should emphasise how the new clause is designed to work and how the Bill relates to volunteers, thereby clearing up any lingering confusion on the matter. The main point is that the Bill will apply only to workers, and that none of its clauses will apply to volunteers. Our judgment is that the vast majority who do volunteering work of one sort or another will not be affected in any way by the Bill, because they are not workers. That is what we want to achieve.

We are conscious, however, that there is a grey area. The definition of "worker" in clause 52 is quite wide, although no wider than the definition used for the purposes of provisions on unauthorised deductions in the Employment Rights Act 1996, which originated in the Wages Act 1986. Because of that, some genuine volunteers—although, we think, only a small proportion—might work under arrangements that would amount to a worker's contract. It is precisely those people—the Bill calls them "voluntary workers"—who are included accidentally, and whom we want to exclude through the "exit" of clause 42.

Let me briefly explain the main effects of new clause 1, and how it differs from the original clause 42. The overall effect is to broaden slightly the definition of "voluntary worker" to reflect the reality of volunteering. Subsection (1) broadens the range of bodies for which a voluntary worker may work while still falling within the exemption from the national minimum wage. It will now include not only charities and voluntary organisations, as before, but any "associated fund-raising body"—that is, a body separate from a charity or voluntary organisation but whose profits go to that organisation, such as a body running a charity's shops—and any "statutory body". Therefore, volunteers who work for charity shops, schools and hospitals, as well as for charities and voluntary organisations, and who happen to be workers, will be exempted from the national minimum wage.

Broadly speaking, the range of bodies covers volunteering in the whole statutory sector, but it does not cover volunteering in non-charitable commercial enterprises. To include that would undermine the Bill, and would go against the principle that volunteering should be for social good rather than a form of cheap labour for commercial profit.

In Committee, some technical questions were asked about the drafting. I have no difficulty with that. Just in case a sharp-eyed but puzzled Member is present, let me take the opportunity to enlighten him or her about a particular technical point of detail in the new clause: the inclusion in subsection (1) of the words "apart from this Act". The purpose of that is to prevent the exclusion provisions in clause 42 from being negated by the worker's entitlement to the national minimum wage under clause 15.

Subsection (1)(a) maintains the provision in the original clause that a voluntary worker may receive, or be entitled to, expenses actually incurred, or "reasonably estimated as likely to be or to have been so incurred".

That ensures that voluntary workers can be paid travel or out-of-pocket expenses without becoming "workers" entitled to the national minimum wage.

Subsection (1)(b) adds a new provision extending what a "voluntary worker" may receive while still being regarded as a voluntary worker, beyond "expenses", to include reasonable "benefits in kind". That consists of "subsistence"—the direct provision of day-to-day sustenance, but not monetary payment—or accommodation. It would cover, for example, the position of voluntary workers employed in youth hostels.

Subsection (2) further extends what a "voluntary worker" may receive to include a monetary payment of subsistence, but only in particular, narrowly defined circumstances. First, the voluntary worker must be employed by a "host" employer, having been placed there by a charity. Secondly, the host employer must be a charity, a voluntary organisation, an associated fund-raising body, such as a charity shop, or a statutory body such as a school or a hospital.

The provision is intended to cater for the position of organisations such as Community Service Volunteers—CSV—which place volunteers, often away from home, with schools, hospitals or voluntary organisations. Such volunteers receive a subsistence allowance to cover laundry expenses, toiletries and other basic day-to-day needs. The circumstances in which a subsistence payment is allowed, without generating an entitlement to the national minimum wage, are deliberately drawn narrowly to minimise the scope for evasion by employers claiming that they were paying their "volunteers" a subsistence allowance.

Subsection (3) extends what a "voluntary worker" may receive without generating an entitlement to the national minimum wage to include training, as long as that training is geared to the activity in which the voluntary worker is engaged. It would include, for example, first aid training for voluntary workers who care for old people or work with children. The provision is included to reflect the fact that voluntary workers often receive training, which may be regarded as generating a contractual arrangement.

Finally, subsection (4) contains definitions of terms used in new clause 1. Amendment No. 20 would delete the existing clause 42, which new clause 1 replaces.

I hope that, following the Government's open and consultative approach on the matter and the constructive input from voluntary organisations and hon. Members on both sides, the House will readily accept the Government amendments. They are good for volunteers, good for the Bill and entirely in line with the Government's approach to the national minimum wage. We have received a letter from the voluntary organisations accepting the amendments, which they believe meet their concerns and needs. I hope that the House will agree to them.

3.45 pm

Mr. Boswell: I sometimes feel that the Minister of State feels better once his press release is out of the way. If he has got it out of the way now, rather than delivering it on Third Reading, perhaps we can get back to today's business. Having been uncharitable about us in a way that was less worthy and convincing than usual, he then proceeded to deliver a new clause which included a measure of consensus. I would not advise my hon. Friends to contest the new clause and the associated Government amendment. No doubt they will wish to speak to their own amendments, and I shall embrace in my remarks some of the concerns on which they touch.

I thank the Minister for trying to bring forward a measure of consensus and for recognising the best traditions of the House in the commitment of hon. Members on both sides to the charitable and voluntary sector for which we feel a great deal of affection. However, in doing so, he managed to deny the argument in his quasi-press release.

If, as the Minister commented, there was a failed filibuster in Committee, he conceded almost in the same breath that the concerns that were expressed by my hon. Friends and me were essentially technical. In respect of the highly legal and complex matters involved—as I mentioned to the House, I had some involvement in charity law, although I hasten to say that it was as a lay person—it is essential that we get it right. Whatever purposes the Government have, we must ensure that they are not frustrated by some technical error.

Turning to the new clause, I should like to draw to the attention of the House a certain distinction. Although it is not a precise one, it is important that we should have at least the thrust of the argument in mind. There are what might loosely be called, to use a slightly Irish phrase, professional charities and amateur charities. The former are large, well-organised charities that employ staff, human resource directors, lawyers and others to advise them and are not represented by, but, in a sense, are reflected by, the National Council for Voluntary Organisations, with which I have had a constructive relationship on this Bill and others. In a way, they are not the problem, although they are the subject of the new clause.

Problems are much more likely to arise in respect of what might be called the amateur sector—although they are not amateurish—which comprises smaller charitable organisations that do not have full-time salaried staff, probably cannot afford access to the best legal advice, may go the Charity Commission from time to time and may be members of the NCVO, but are less closed with their definitions because their concern—goodness knows, it is the concern of us all—is to get on with the job of helping people through the various heads of charity.

That distinction is relevant to several aspects of the Bill that we shall consider. The big organisations that are professionally advised and have made an input to the Government will be able to steer around—or perhaps through—the new clause. They will manage. I am concerned about how the less sophisticated organisations that are less directed towards the day-to-day business of compliance with legislation will manage.

The Minister rightly said that there is no reason in principle why workers employed by a charity should not have the same right as others to receive the national minimum wage. He accurately quoted the NCVO's estimate of 485,000 people employed by charities. That is a significant number of employees. I am not suggesting that we should make an exception for them. In Committee, the Minister introduced a radical exemption for the armed forces, affecting fewer people than half the number in the charitable sector. We have already had that argument.

Mr. Ian McCartney: The armed forces are covered by the armed forces pay review body. That is an entirely different issue from volunteers.

Mr. Boswell: It has been a sadly prevalent practice of Governments of both colours for several years that the recommendations of the various review bodies are not always implemented immediately and in full. That could give rise to different treatment. However, that is the subject of a later amendment.

Mr. Hammond: Would my hon. Friend care to question the Minister on whether he would like to exclude nurses because they have a pay review body?

Mr. Boswell: I note my hon. Friend's suggestion, but I shall not be tempted at the moment.

I am not arguing that it is wrong for the salaried, professional—if I may use the word—employees of charities, many of whom are professional people, not to be able to enjoy the benefit of the national minimum wage.

The second category is volunteers who help charities. The Minister is nodding. He sees the clear distinction. I kick myself because only afterwards did I remember that probably the best example that we could have brought forward in Committee was the Low Pay Commission. The Minister's press release says that its members have undertaken to serve without remuneration. They are entitled to do that. I have not probed the point with the Minister, but I hope that they are receiving appropriate subsistence and expenses and do not have to pay their hotel bills wherever they go. Before the Minister says that I have it wrong, I wish to acknowledge the work of the Low Pay Commission—done on a voluntary basis.

Many people volunteer. I think that the NCVO's figure is about 3 million people. That is different from being paid to work for a charity. The Minister will know from our debates in Committee that the problem arises in between.

The Minister, who is nothing if not a practical man when he is in the mood, keeps saying that it is a matter of common sense to know whether a person is paid. However, on this issue as on others, the Government have found it difficult to ram the protean reality and constant complexity outside this place, which is well exemplified by the charity sector, into the mould that they have set for the national minimum wage, with a series of entitlements and criteria. If that mould does not fit, charities and the people who work for them have two choices. They can either change their arrangements or turn a blind eye to the legislation. One will probably end in tears, and the other will certainly result in difficulty. In the context of the new clause, it is difficult to make an absolute distinction between those who are volunteers and those who are not.

I know that there is a wish—it is a strong doctrine, certainly in professional parts of the charitable sector—that people should be remunerated on a professional basis for their professional services for charity and should, as it were, keep their charity for whatever else they choose to do. I understand that argument; it is certainly easier to sustain with a larger organisation than it is with a small one.

Some years ago, I made inquiries of a well-known charity about its terms and conditions of employment because I was thinking of applying for a job. I did not, in the event, pursue it—not because of the answer that I was given, I hasten to say. The charity suggested that its going rate was somewhat below the traditional going rate. I think that a figure of 25 per cent. was mentioned. That was at the beginning of my career. Such a rate is not by any means characteristic of all charities, although it is not unknown, even in larger charities.

The difficulty with which my hon. Friends and I have been wrestling in Committee is that some people would perfectly like to be associated with a charity on a professional basis. Indeed, the charity might benefit from that and welcome the professional status of workers who do not necessarily want to draw a full salary. Again, no doubt there might be ways of getting round the problem. It might be possible for citizens advice bureaux, for example—I heard this recently, and I think that the Minister did, too—to have a split contract. A body could have a charitable contract for, say, two days of the week, and a paid-for contract for three days. One's remuneration could be concentrated in such a way as to take it over the level of a national minimum wage. None the less, that would be a hassle and not always reflect reality. The Opposition therefore retain that concern.

I turn to the question of honoraria. The Minister seems to think that people who receive honoraria are not workers. I am pleased to hear that, in his terms, they are not. The nature of honoraria is such that they are paid probably on an eclectic basis and after the event. I envisage a situation in which a lady has looked after the village hall for years, probably paid for the stamps and written the letters. Suddenly, somebody says, "Good Lord, Mrs. X—or Miss Y—hasn't had any money for years! We have had a slightly better year than we thought and we want to send her a cheque or a bunch of flowers."

Such a situation would not normally be pursued by the tax authorities, and I particularly want it not to be pursued in the context of a national minimum wage, because it is a reality, certainly in the smaller charity sector. Not only money or principle comes into play. If it were necessary to compute the number of hours worked by that person and in what circumstances, it would be almost impossible. We may well—this may be the Minister's answer—have to turn Nelson's eye to such situations. We do not want to pursue such people, and I doubt very much whether they would want to assert their ultimate rights under the national minimum wage. Such situations are an uncomfortable irritant—even under the new clause.

Mr. Lansley: Does my hon. Friend recognise that disagreements among such persons—although they may be volunteering happily to work for the kind of village hall committee that he describes—may lead to one disgruntled former volunteer asserting that they were, in fact, employed and a worker for the purposes of the Bill?

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend is right to cite such a hard-line case. In such unpleasant circumstances, a decent and informal relationship breaks down into two camps—the Big-endians and Little-endians on the village hall committee—at which the book will be thrown. There may be difficulties.

My other concerns relate to the definition of allowable expenses. My hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) has tabled amendment (a) to the new clause to rehearse that. I share some of his unease about whether the criterion is sufficiently generous to meet the realities of the charitable sector.

There is also a question about the definitions of "associated fund-raising body" and "statutory body". The Minister covered that subject at some speed. I do not complain about that, but, as I understood it, he said that an "associated fund-raising body" would be, as it were, a fund-raising body attached to, but not part of, the charity, and that it would not be a charity shop, because if a person went to work for a charity shop as a volunteer for nothing, that was down to them, but if a person did take a salary or a wage, it would have to be at the national minimum wage because, otherwise, by implication, it would be out of line with the practice in other parts of the retail sector.

Mr. Ian McCartney: The position is clear, is it not? We have tabled new clause 1, which clearly says that people who work for charity shops as volunteers will not fall under the terms of the Bill; but where a charity provides a full-time worker to manage a shop or a range of shops as part of their duties, they are clearly a worker and would be covered by the Bill. I believe that the amendment makes a clear and helpful distinction.

Mr. Boswell: That is clearer, and I am grateful to the Minister for that. The other question—

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): The Minister has just offered us a cast iron distinction, which may well be applicable in most cases, but does my hon. Friend accept that it may not apply in certain cases? Are there not instances in which a person works in a charity shop, not for an honorarium but for a modest but regular payment that is below the national minimum wage, and in which, if the shop were obliged to pay that person the national minimum wage, it would have to cease to employ that person? Would not that be a most undesirable state of affairs?

Mr. Boswell: That is the substance of our concern.

Mr. Ian McCartney indicated dissent.

Mr. Boswell: The Minister of State shakes his head, but I am sure that such cases will arise, and I am sure that such shops will fold, because, in some cases, they are at the margins of profitability, and they will no longer be able to do their service for the charity. We are worried about that.

Mr. McCartney: I am sorry to interrupt again, but, at the end of our discussions with the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey), the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) broadly agreed that the concept of the new clause met the objectives that we all wanted to achieve. The hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) said, in his short contribution, that that was not the case, and the hon. Member for Daventry has just agreed with him. If he agreed with me and the hon. Member for Eastleigh in my office, has he changed his mind since?

Mr. Boswell: I did make it clear to the hon. Gentleman—I do not renege on that—that I agreed that the new clause was a substantial improvement and met most of our objections. I said, however, that we had continuing anxieties in relation to minor payments—we may call them honoraria or whatever—about which I have spoken, and about the fact that persons might choose, or continue to choose, to work at what might be termed "non-fully national minimum wage rates". They will have to find a way of doing so.

The Minister has taken a firm view, as he is entitled to, saying that there will be no exceptions when persons are employed. I understand that. If that is the case, such people will have to find a device, either by the on-off, "switch the light bulb on" type of payment, which I have described, or by some type of covenanting back, if the Inland Revenue will allow it.

Mr. Bercow: I do not wish to delay my hon. Friend for a moment longer than is necessary, but will he accept—for the avoidance of doubt—that the situation that I described is not hypothetical, but relates to a constituent who has raised that point with me, and first did so several months ago?

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend is right. I recall that he mentioned his constituent in Committee.

Mr. McCartney: His mother.

Mr. Boswell: It was not his mother, as I recall, although the Minister of State is, as ever, trying to be helpful. In effect, we are trying to set out the sort of advice that we will have to give my hon. Friend's constituent.

The difficulty, particularly when dealing with sensitive areas such as charities, is that people do not want their generosity to be trespassed on, and will say, "If it's got to be done like that, I've never had a covenant with anyone." Or they will say that they will not work two days on one basis and one day on another, when that is not how they see their job. They will end up crashing out of employment. That is our wider concern with other parts of the Bill, and we certainly have that concern over this aspect of it, although that is in no sense to resile from the improvement that the Minister has made in the new clause. That is why I have invited my hon. Friends not to oppose it.

Mr. Lansley: Before my hon. Friend concludes on that point, did he observe that the Government asked the Low Pay Commission to consider the point at which an honorarium shades into a wage? Clearly, the Government have not received advice on that matter. Would it not have been advisable for Ministers to wait until they had such advice?

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend performs a service in reminding me that that is exactly what the Government did, and I endorse his advice. Later, I shall say that the whole business is back to front—it would have been better to set up the Low Pay Commission, await its advice and then debate its conclusions, not the other way round. No doubt, the commission will produce something and, in a modest way, our discussions will help to inform that.

Finally, on the overall impact of national minimum wage legislation on the charitable sector, the Minister has not sought to deny that there might be some such impact—as my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) said, it was implicit in the Government's advice to the Low Pay Commission. Indeed, I suspect that the Minister would want to make a virtue of that in relation to persons employed in that sector.

Before he takes that wrongly, I am not arguing that the Opposition should object on principle to those extra costs. They will fall and they will be substantial. At one stage, I was minded—I resisted the temptation—to table an amendment asking for a deferment for charities and the voluntary sector. However, I understand that the Minister wants to have his Bill at one go, and we will not resist that. In turn, he needs to acknowledge that there will be some impact effects.

Again, I must quote the National Council for Voluntary Organisations, which has assessed the problem and suggested that, if the national minimum wage is set at £4.50 an hour, the sector is likely to require an additional £165.6 million to meet the increased salary bill.

Mr. Ivan Lewis (Bury, South): As someone who has worked in the voluntary sector all my life and served on management committees, I find the hon. Gentleman's attitude towards the sector patronising. People who run and work for voluntary organisations and who really care about the voluntary sector strongly believe that we ought to encourage good practice. Part of that is paying properly people who work for voluntary organisations, thus ensuring that the people who depend on their services get the appropriate quality care.

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that people who care about the charitable sector should encourage good practice and have faith in the people who run voluntary organisations to understand the difference between those who are paid and those who are voluntary, and to stop pretending that those paid people are not capable of making such a distinction? The people who run voluntary organisations and who want them to provide the highest quality of care and introduce good practice in terms of employment law will welcome the national minimum wage.

Mr. Boswell: I shall reply briefly to that rather long intervention. First, we certainly accept that the charitable sector should have highly professional standards. I have told the House why it might be more difficult for the smaller and what I will in shorthand call the less professional charities. Secondly, I have not sought to resile from the principle of the national minimum wage that the Government are producing as regards the voluntary sector. Thirdly, I have just told the House that, on reflection, I decided not to table a dilatory amendment for the charitable sector. I was about to say that there would be some acknowledged costs.

I cited the figures from the NCVO research of £165 million if the rate is set at £4.50 an hour, and £87 million if it is set at £4 an hour—I round down the figures. If the rate is set at £3.50, the cost would be an extra £41.8 million. There will also be additional costs involving the public sector, which is the subject of a later debate.

The NCVO also says that there will be a differential effect on the smaller organisations—those with annual incomes between £10,000 and £100,000 will face costs amounting to almost 5 per cent. of their current expenditure on staff. For larger organisations, the cost of a £4 rate would represent some 2.5 per cent. of current expenditure.

The question will arise—I do not want to go on about it now—how the voluntary organisations will seek to recover those costs. Will they receive money from local authorities? What will happen in relation to Government Departments?

Mr. Lansley: Before my hon. Friend leaves that point, will he acknowledge that the costs that voluntary organisations and charities may face could, to some extent, be offset by job substitution between paid, professional employees and volunteers? That could have deleterious effects for the charities—along the lines suggested by the hon. Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis)—by diluting professional input.

Mr. Boswell: I think that it is self-evident—my hon. Friend performs a service in saying it—that if there is choice between two kinds of employment—one paid for, and the other not—and the costs of the paid-for employment are artificially raised by the operation of a national minimum wage, the balance between the two kinds of employment will be affected.

There will be a real impact on some of the larger charities. The Royal National Institute for Deaf People, which carried out some very helpful work in its submission to the Low Pay Commission, referred to the substantial impact on certain similar voluntary organisations. The costs will have to be met from somewhere, especially in cases where charities have entered a contract to provide services to a local authority or Government Department, for example.

Although most of those contracts are probably renegotiated annually, in relation to wages, one or two will have a longer tail—they will be in force for three or even five years—and the whole economics of the business will be upset by the introduction of the national minimum wage. If Government are not prepared to meet those obligations one way or another, the charitable sector will deliver less care.

Although we welcome the new clause, which provides a better definition than was available before, it leaves us uncomfortable on some points, which will require some kind of accommodation. I hope that the Minister will respond to some of the matters that I have raised and those that will be raised by my hon. Friends. The Bill will have a significant impact on the voluntary sector. The costs that will be incurred will need to be funded sooner or later by someone other than the charitable sector itself if the quantum and quality of care are not to be diminished.

Angela Smith (Basildon): I welcome new clause 1, as it recognises the special nature of charities, voluntary organisations and the voluntary sector generally. As a former employee in the voluntary sector, a former volunteer and an officer of the all-party group, I take a special interest in the subject. The House should note that the umbrella organisations of the voluntary sector have never argued for their workers to be exempted from the minimum wage. As new clause 1 acknowledges, however, they have asked for a recognition of the special role of volunteers. The new clause recognises that volunteers receive, first, expenses and sustenance, and, secondly, training.

On Saturday evening, I attended a fund-raising event for St. Luke's hospice in my constituency. The number of volunteers who were present was incredible—people who freely give up their time, effort and energy and make a great commitment. Some of them were not only volunteers at St. Luke's hospice, but serial volunteers. At many events in my constituency—I am sure that other hon. Members have similar experiences—I meet the same people who volunteer to help others day in, day out.

If people give their time, energy and commitment, it is right that they should receive expenses if they wish. Many choose to take no reward for their activities, but the difference between expenses and remuneration—wages—should be recognised.

The new clause recognises the situation of those in training. I recently attended an event organised by the south-east Essex office of Relate. As the former Marriage Guidance Council, Relate has to ensure that its volunteers undergo proper training. Despite some of the comments of Conservative Members, being a volunteer does not mean being unprofessional or unqualified.

Volunteers have many skills and are often extremely professional. They should not be taken any less seriously because of their volunteer status. The people whom they seek to help and support have to be assured that they are being counselled or helped by someone who is fully trained.

Amendments (a) and (b) are misguided and designed to avoid the minimum wage by the back door. It is wrong to suggest that someone who works fewer than 20 hours should be exempt. Those who do part-time work should receive the minimum wage, as should those involved in job sharing.

Mr. Bercow: The hon. Lady is making a general point, but will she consider the specific example of someone who works 15 hours a week for a charity shop, for a consideration of £2.50 an hour, thereby earning £37.50 a week? If the charity shop were obliged to pay the national minimum wage, at £3.50, £3.60 or £3.75 an hour, it would not be able to afford that person's services.

Angela Smith: The first thing I would say is something that we heard often in Committee: I blame myself for taking that intervention. Conservative Members clearly do not understand the difference between those who give their time, effort and energy and ask for recognition but not remuneration, and those who should be paid the minimum wage.

Mr. Bercow: Answer the point.

Angela Smith: I have answered it.

Amendment (b) represents another attempt to avoid the minimum wage by the back door. It would make it difficult to give appropriate training for volunteers.

Mr. Lansley: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Angela Smith: I have already given way once, and I want to make progress.

Mr. Bercow: Very wise.

Angela Smith: I am certainly wise not to take silly interventions from Conservative Members.

The new clause draws a careful distinction between those who should be treated as volunteers and not caught up in the minimum wage and those who are employed and should receive the minimum wage. I remind hon. Members of the views of voluntary bodies. The voluntary sector does not want exemptions that would allow it to avoid paying its staff the minimum wage, and Conservative Members should not try to foist those exemptions on the sector.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): The Minister opened the debate in his usual, perhaps almost charming, but certainly endearing and robust fashion.

Mr. Bercow: Rumbustious.

Mr. Chidgey: That is an even better word. We have become used to the Minister's style in the weeks, if not months, during which we have been locked together in Committee. I hope that the lasting impression does not prove too painful for his future career or his peace of mind. I do not want to be accused of filibustering, so I shall come to the point.

We welcome the new clause. The Bill as it stood would not have excluded millions of volunteers—in the public sector, in hospitals and schools, or working for charitable organisations—from the minimum wage. It would not have excluded volunteers who receive benefits in kind—expenses for meals, travel, accommodation, and health and hygiene when they are away from home, for example—that are essential to enable them to continue volunteering.

It is important that that issue be addressed. Both sides of the House accept that it is essential that volunteers should be able to perform the services they offer in the voluntary sector. It is also generally accepted that volunteers should never be used as a substitute for paid staff; that issue has been addressed in our discussions both inside and outside the House.

Volunteers add value. They make a valuable, indeed crucial, contribution to the level and quality of service that voluntary organisations, as well as some public sector organisations, provide in our communities. Many examples could be cited, and I listened with interest to the comments of the hon. Member for Basildon (Angela Smith). I am sure that all Members of Parliament work closely with their local charitable organisations. We could all talk at great length about the valuable services they provide, and how important it is for us to support them.

New clause 1 contains a number of issues that are worthy of further discussion, and I hope that we will learn a little more about the Minister's proposals in the course of our debate. In particular, I wish to address the issue of training provided to volunteers while they provide voluntary services. That is a grey area.

Mr. Lansley: On the question of training, does the hon. Gentleman agree that new clause 1 makes a spurious distinction between training that is specific to the work undertaken by a volunteer and training that is generic? It might be better for volunteers in the charitable sector if all training, specific or generic, were left out of account, so that they could benefit from training more generally.

Mr. Chidgey: The hon. Gentleman has a habit of second-guessing my remarks before I can make them.

[Mr. Chidgey]

He raises an important point. As new clause 1 stands, it refers to limiting training to that required to perform the volunteer's duties. It is difficult to be so precise in that distinction. I am anxious that the new clause should not deprive volunteers of training in basic social skills, including numeracy and literacy, that might enable them to enter the job market and gain employment or undertake further training and education.

As I have mentioned to the Minister on an earlier occasion, the Prince's Trust has a fine record in training. People who have previously escaped the net of employment have found fulfilment in paid employment or further training after they have finished a project with the Prince's Trust. I am anxious that nothing in the new clause would preclude volunteers who work with the Prince's Trust from receiving that basic training in additional skills to enable them to achieve further fulfilment in their lives.

Mr. Ian McCartney: I can give the hon. Gentleman the reassurance he seeks, and I can go further. The Bill contains enabling clauses to deal with training issues, which the Low Pay Commission has been asked to consider and report on. It is worth while for the hon. Gentleman to raise those issues, but the Government have gone to great lengths to ensure that they are all addressed.

Mr. Chidgey: I am grateful to the Minister for that reassurance, but he will understand that it is difficult for Opposition Members to be sure of the Government's intentions, because we have been told so often that the Low Pay Commission will address the issue, but we are still waiting for it to report on so many issues. I am sure that the Government's intentions are honourable, but it is difficult for Opposition Members to be sure what will happen when we do not have the necessary information before us.

At the beginning of the debate, the Minister mentioned the status of limited companies that are set up as an adjunct to a recognised charity. Many of the national charities—including Oxfam and Age Concern—have limited companies that act independently as separate, commercial enterprises with the sole objective of raising money for the charity concerned.

I hope that the Minister can assure me that, under the new clause, the distinction between workers for the charity, workers for the enterprise and volunteers for both will be clear. That is important, because I agree with him that people who should be paid a wage must not be denied one because they are classified as volunteers.

The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) touched on a category that is better entitled "dual-capacity workers". Such people work some hours as volunteers and some as paid staff. There must be a clear distinction in the Bill between volunteering and employment. Such people should have employment contracts for the hours they agree to work with their employers as paid members of staff, but should also have volunteering agreements for the additional time that they wish to give voluntarily to the charitable organisation.

Examples come readily to mind. A scout leader may work some time for the Scout Association as a paid member of staff but readily volunteer his time at evenings or weekends as a scout troop leader—a clear distinction between volunteering and paid employment.

Mr. Boswell: The hon. Gentleman is making a good case. Does he accept that his suggestion of a contract for working and an agreement for voluntary work is probably, on my reading of the new clause, the only way forward for people in that situation?

Mr. Chidgey: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. That is precisely the point, and I look forward to the Minister clarifying it.

Hon. Members have also mentioned people who are semi-retired. I shall refer to such people as semi-retired, although there are other descriptions, such as "prematurely redundant", or that they have been given an opportunity to seek other employment—sacked, in other words. Many people, at a fit and robust age, earlier than they expected to retire, are able to contribute to society, but find that their remuneration through pension or redundancy is not enough to live on.

Angela Smith: Like Tory Ministers and MPs.

Mr. Chidgey: I shall refrain from responding to that remark. Hon. Members all start as volunteers. There is always a queue of people volunteering to take our jobs come general elections. I suppose that we are paid volunteers in that regard.

Many robust, fit people with much to offer society are not in full-time employment and have income from pension or redundancy payments that is not enough for them to live on comfortably. They want to be able to work for the voluntary sector but also need some remuneration.

It is for such people that contracts of employment and agreements for volunteering are so important. If they wish to work a number of hours per week at not less than the minimum wage to earn sufficient for their needs, we must distinguish between paid hours under working contracts and additional hours that people may wish to volunteer for under volunteering agreements. There is always a danger of coercion with such agreements. I should like some comfort from the Minister that the new clause will ensure that volunteer hours are a genuine gift of the time, not the result of coercion to work extra hours for what would be less than the national minimum wage.

It was an oversight that the Bill did not adequately address the treatment of volunteers. I am grateful to the Minister for the way in which he recognised that, and for how the Government have listened to the Opposition's arguments. As a result, the new clause goes a considerable way to allaying the concerns of the Opposition and of many people in the voluntary sector about the treatment of volunteers. We welcome the Bill and will support it, but I look forward to the Minister clarifying my concerns.

Mr. Hammond: As the Minister said, Conservative Members have opposed the principle of the Bill, but I hope that he recognises that, in Committee, we engaged constructively in seeking to improve the Bill and in identifying some of the areas of weakness within it. He accused the Opposition of having mounted a failed attack with a filibuster: in fact, we had a long, but extremely constructive and important, discussion, and one of the results is that we have three Government new clauses and 35 Government amendments on Report. I hope that the Minister has the good grace to recognise that the Committee discussion has given him an opportunity to deal with many issues.

Mr. Ian McCartney: I have to put it on record that most of the Government amendments are clarifications relating to other legislation passing through the House. There are few or no amendments of major substance, and, where such amendments have been tabled, that is down to the Government seeking to improve the Bill from our own perspective.

4.30 pm

Mr. Hammond: There we have it: the Government were not informed or illuminated at all by the debate in Committee, and all their new clauses and amendments would have been tabled anyway.

Mr. Bercow: Notwithstanding the Minister's intervention, will my hon. Friend confirm that, to his knowledge and from his recollection, not a single Labour Back Bencher sought to introduce a new clause or an amendment to an existing clause? All the pressure came from Opposition Members, which is testimony to the effectiveness of their contribution to the debate.

Mr. Hammond: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. I believe that he is correct, but I am pleased to note that that reticence has now evaporated, and that we are to consider later an amendment tabled by Government Back Benchers.

Notwithstanding the Minister's remarks, new clause 1 is the result of a constructive discussion held in Committee, and, as he said, the issue with which it deals commanded a real consensus on both sides of the Committee. The Minister has recognised the issue of voluntary workers and the special needs of the voluntary sector; however, his new clause does not deal with all the issues raised in Committee. In the opening sitting, the Minister said that there was no point in having a Standing Committee if it was simply going to be

"a dialogue of the deaf."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 13 January 1998; c. 22.]

His response in the form of new clause 1 suggests that, if not a dialogue of the deaf, our Committee was perhaps a dialogue of the hard of hearing.

I am pleased to see that the Minister has dealt with the issue of subsistence. I raised that in relation the Youth Hostels Association and the problem of subsistence for those working for voluntary organisations. If included in the remuneration that they are considered to receive, it could result in their moving from being volunteers to being paid workers. The Government are clinging to the dogma of universality by insisting that there are only two possible categories of person working for a voluntary organisation: pure volunteers and people who are fully employed by that voluntary organisation. Common sense suggests that that is not the case, and that there are people who fall between those two categories.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend and I have discussed this matter at length and on several occasions. Will he confirm that a number of individuals who straddle the divide to which he has referred work in his constituency?

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In Standing Committee, he and others of my hon. Friends were able to point to specific examples from within their own constituencies. Later in my speech, I hope to be able to deal with a specific example in my constituency and to ask the Minister to consider a case that I fear would be adversely affected, notwithstanding the fact that the drafting of new clause 1, which deals with voluntary workers, has been very much improved.

Someone who is in the fortunate position referred to by the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey)—perhaps in receipt of a pension and prematurely retired, with a little time available—may wish to help a voluntary organisation, but he may be unable to give his time entirely freely. There is a continuum between the pure volunteer, who works without any consideration, and the fully employed worker, whose primary motivation in working for an organisation is the remuneration that he receives. I had hoped that, in the time between Committee and today's debate, the Minister would address that issue as he considered the treatment of voluntary workers.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): There has been quite a lot of talk about being prematurely retired. One of the points we need to remember when talking about volunteering and volunteer organisations is that many people who retire at a perfectly reasonable time may well have 25 or 30 years of active life still ahead of them—and during some parts of that time, a small remuneration is often useful.

Mr. Hammond: I thank my hon. Friend for his contribution. A significant and growing number of people who may be able to contribute to a worthwhile cause, not just for a couple of years, but on a fairly long-term basis, would be prepared to do so for a wage or remuneration far below what they would be prepared to accept if they were working for a commercial organisation.

There may be a blend of motives between the desire to earn money and the desire to do worthwhile work for a worthwhile organisation. My hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) and the hon. Member for Eastleigh have suggested that one solution would be for people in such positions to work part of their time as a volunteer, for nothing, and part as a paid worker. Such an artificial arrangement smacks of avoidance, and hardly brings the legislation into better standing. It would be far better were the Government to recognise explicitly that there may be a blend of motives between pure altruism and the desire to earn money, and to deal with that in a way that does not cause artificial avoidance.

Mr. Boswell: Does not my hon. Friend consider that clause 39, which involves the extension of the Act, under regulations, to certain other categories of workers—or persons who are treated as if they were workers—poses potential difficulties, even in relation to the suggestion that I put to the House?

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend is exactly right. A number of difficulties and potential pitfalls, not least relating to taxation and national insurance, might arise were people tempted to arrange their affairs in a strictly artificial way to deal with the absurd notion that the Government will not allow someone to have a mixed motive in seeking employment or work with a charity. They will not allow the halfway house.

Many decent, respectable people who are willing and anxious to make a contribution to the society in which they live, but who cannot, for one reason or another, afford to give their time totally freely, would be greatly offended by the measure as it now stands. It would be a gross infringement of their liberty and their right to provide good work in society in a way that is practical and convenient for them.

Mr. Lansley: I am listening carefully to my hon. Friend, and I realise that the difficulties proliferate. The new clause refers to statutory bodies. I know from my experience that honoraria paid to members of national health service trust boards are unlikely to correspond to the national minimum wage rate because of the number of hours they work. How does the new clause exclude such people from the definition of "worker"?

Mr. Hammond: I shall discuss later the jeopardy in which people will be placed if any sum they receive is considered to be remuneration under the Bill. The results would be dramatic: any money other than subsistence payments and reimbursement of expenses would be subject to the national minimum wage provisions.

Mr. Ian Stewart (Eccles): Does not the hon. Gentleman understand that existing machinery will test the employment status of workers who qualify for the national minimum wage, and that there is a distinction between permanent or fixed-term contracts, whether they are full time, part time or casual, and unpaid voluntary work? The level of the minimum wage will not alter that one bit.

Mr. Hammond: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. Such machinery may exist, but the new clause will introduce new machinery. It states:

"no monetary payments of any description"

may be made

"except in respect of expenses—

(i) actually incurred . . . or

One of our concerns is that payments may not be made entirely and exclusively in respect of expenses that have been incurred.

I was not present at the Minister's meeting with my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry and the hon. Member for Eastleigh. I thank him for his invitation, but I was away on an all-party trip when it took place. Had I been present, I would have pressed the Minister about people who work few hours for low remuneration, whom we had in mind when we tabled amendment (a).

As the hon. Member for Basildon (Angela Smith) said, amendment (a) is a relatively blunt instrument to deal with the problem that we have identified.

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): My hon. Friend is making a persuasive case in respect of employees, but will not employers have to spend a great deal of money on legal advice to prevent enforcement notices from being served on them, which would be embarrassing, especially to public bodies?

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend is right: the cost, inconvenience and embarrassment may be significant. How will organisations that are affected as "employers" react to the jeopardy in which the new clause will place them?

Mr. Bercow: Before my hon. Friend leaves that important matter, has he taken on board the significance of the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms)? The loss that we are considering is of a different character from one that might be sustained by a commercial organisation—it is a monetary loss, and it would represent a deprivation to charity beneficiaries. The neediest people would lose because of these additional costs.

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and I assure him that I had not failed to take account of the significance of our hon. Friend's intervention. In anticipation of problems, charitable employers and voluntary organisations that employ people under arrangements that leave in doubt those employees' status as volunteers under the Bill might dispense with their services and immediately make the provision of service to the community less effective.

4.45 pm

The amendments propose a crude means of dealing with the problem. They highlight the fact that we are discussing not conventional full-time workers but people who work at charitable or voluntary organisations for a day or a few hours each week for nominal sums or for honoraria. We foresaw the objection, which has been made throughout the passage of the Bill, that the state, through the benefits system, should not have to pick up the tab for low wages or low remuneration. We agree, which is why amendment (a) deals with people who are "not in receipt of any state benefits".

The hon. Member for Eastleigh referred to people in their late fifties or early sixties who have retired early from professional careers. Many of my constituents are such people, and we had them in mind when we tabled the amendment. They may have considerable skills to offer to a voluntary organisation. Although they may be prepared to give of their time generously, they may be unable to do so without being paid.

Amendments (a) and (b) refer to mileage allowances. I should like the Minister to deal with the specific matter of volunteer hospital car drivers, which has been drawn to my attention. The new clause states that expenses may be paid to a volunteer, provided they are "actually incurred" or reasonably expected to be incurred, but what would happen if different volunteers who drove different sizes of car in different circumstances were paid a fixed mileage allowance that did not reimburse direct costs, but compensated for fixed costs that were not incurred as a result of their voluntary activities?

A significant number of people, many of whom are pensioners, undertake voluntary activities such as car driving for a hospital. That useful and worthwhile community service allows them to continue to run a motor car, which they might not otherwise be able to afford to do on a pension. There is nothing unworthy about such a mixed motive, but the failure to recognise it has been at the heart of the disagreement between Conservative and Labour Members. If the legislation referred to the methods used by the Inland Revenue in deciding whether an amount is part of remuneration, we would not have had to raise the issue. The legislation does not refer to symmetry of treatment in terms of minimum wage calculations and Inland Revenue calculations. When we said in Committee that it might have been better and simpler for the Bill to provide such symmetry, the Minister rejected that notion.

Amendment (a) seeks to include in the Bill the concept of the Inland Revenue's fixed profit car scheme. That scheme will be familiar to hon. Members, because many of them are in it.

Mr. Syms: Those of us who represent rural counties such as Dorset are aware of the tremendous benefits that are conferred by hospital voluntary car drivers. Any suggestion that such services might be imperilled by the Bill must be squashed.

Mr. Hammond: I agree with my hon. Friend. My constituency is not as rural as his, but I understand that my local hospital has 80 volunteer car drivers, all of whom are paid a flat per-mile rate regardless of the size of their vehicles. As there is a single rate for all drivers regardless of the expenses they incur, there must be an element that is considered as remuneration and not reimbursement of expenses, and that would deprive those people of exemption from the legislation. As my hon. Friend suggests, the effect would be catastrophic.

Perhaps the Minister and even local enforcement officers would turn a blind eye to such cases. However, it cannot be a good principle to draft legislation in the hope that it will work because those who are charged with its enforcement will ignore its provisions if that seems sensible.

Mr. Lansley: I am not entirely clear, and perhaps my hon. Friend or the Minister will elucidate. The new clause seeks to exclude people from the national minimum wage, but there seems to be no mechanism for making a declaration or for determining whether a person is excluded. People may assume that they meet the criteria for not qualifying but suddenly find, for reasons that they do not understand, that they are qualified but that no records have been kept.

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend raises an important point. An employer would face many perils in such a situation. He may find that he has fallen foul of the Bill's specific record-keeping requirements, and the penalties for failing to keep records are severe. An employer who is in doubt about the status of payments to a worker has no mechanism for seeking a definitive clarification, and would not be able to rest easy.

I think that it was my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry who said that an arrangement that worked in practice between an employer—I use the word "employer" in the Bill's terms—and a voluntary worker might rumble on for years unexceptionally. However, as the result of a disagreement, the voluntary worker might present his employer with a statement to the effect that he had been reimbursed beyond the amount of his expenses and lay a claim on that employer to be paid at the minimum wage rate for all the hours that he had worked since the start of employment. No doubt the Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but that is my understanding.

Retrospectively, if it were established that a payment that had been made to meet expenses which turned out not to be expenses as defined by the Bill, the worker would have a claim against the employer. That is an onerous situation for a voluntary organisation.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Does he agree that one possible way out of the serious dilemma would be to indemnify charities and other organisations in advance?

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend builds upon the suggestion by hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), that perhaps there should be some system of certification in advance so that the charitable organisation and the worker in question would be clear about their status and about whether there was any risk. By accepting subsection (2) of amendment (a), the Minister would deal with that issue once and for all by accepting the methodology of the fixed profit car scheme and agreeing that a fixed mileage payment that fell within the limits that are prescribed by the Inland Revenue would be discounted.

My understanding is that, if any part of any payment to a voluntary worker was deemed not to be subsistence or reimbursement of expenses—

Mr. Syms: My hon. Friend asked whether an employer might face a claim for back minimum wages because there had not been a clear contractual arrangement. Such a claim would cause the employer problems with the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise, because tax implications would arise.

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend's intervention reinforces the points made by my hon. Friends the Members for South Cambridgeshire and for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow).

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend is coping stoically with the frequent interventions in his excellent speech. Does he agree—[Interruption.] Labour Members who chunter unintelligibly are not assisting the quality of the debate. Does my hon. Friend agree that the discovery of earlier non-payments in the public sector will give rise to the serious danger of public finances falling into disarray? The Chancellor will get into a frightful pickle, will he not?

Mr. Hammond: It is interesting to speculate how my local hospital trust, for example, would deal with the discovery some years down the line that a person who had worked as a volunteer for many years should have been paid the minimum wage throughout that time. I do not suggest that such a scenario will occur regularly, but people sometimes fall out, and working arrangements that are based on mutual trust may fall apart if there is a dispute or disagreement.

Mr. Lansley: Does my hon. Friend agree that difficulties may arise when bodies, including perhaps public sector bodies or voluntary organisation, substitute the work of volunteers for the work of paid employees? The Government acknowledged that possibility in their evidence to the Low Pay Commission.

The difficulty may arise not because volunteers subsequently take issue with their employers, but because their representatives—trade unions for example—may seek to challenge in the courts the use of volunteers. They may assert that they are workers for the purposes of the legislation if they are paid expenses over and above those that were incurred.

Mr. Hammond: I had not considered specifically that point, but I am sure that my hon. Friend is exactly right. Earlier, in relation to hospital car drivers, I had meant to mention precisely the point that other parties may be minded to intervene, even though the Minister and his officials are minded to turn a blind eye. For example, the local taxi firm may like to take any opportunity it can to take a swing at the hospital voluntary car service.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend is being extremely generous in giving way again on this point, but it brings to mind a specific instance in my constituency. Considerable savings, measured in terms of more than £100,000, are expected to be made in the budget of Addenbrooke's hospital by reducing the use of ambulance services and increasing the use of hospital car services. The trade union that represents ambulance drivers may conclude that that is substituting volunteer work, or reimbursed volunteer work, for their work. I hesitate to think what some of the difficult consequences might be of the interplay between those two bodies.

Mr. Hammond: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. We are suggesting not any sinister purpose in what the Government are doing, but that there may be unintended consequences, which could have serious unforeseen effects.

I should like to finish now—

Mr. Andy King (Rugby and Kenilworth): Hear, hear.

Mr. Hammond: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his sedentary encouragement.

I draw attention to one additional point, again relating to my local hospital car service. On Friday, I questioned it very hard about how it operates. I asked whether it was sure that the mileage allowance is all it pays its volunteer drivers. "Yes," it said, "we pay only the mileage allowance." As I was going out of the door, someone called me back and said, "Oh, I have just remembered. At Christmas time, we send them all a £20 gift voucher." Is it Her Majesty's Government's intention to criminalise such gestures by an employer to voluntary workers? Ministers are shaking their heads, but my understanding of the new clause is that any payment to a person called or claiming to be a volunteer that was not a reimbursement of expenses incurred and not subsistence, would remove that person's exemption from the scope of the Bill, and make him liable to be paid the national minimum wage for all the hours he had been working.

Mr. Bercow: As my hon. Friend was making his point, did he hear the Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry say from a sedentary position, "It is a gift"? Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a danger that it might not subsequently be so interpreted in a court of law, especially if it is provided regularly and unfailingly over a period of years? Might it not be considered to be other than a gift? Is that not a serious problem with which we must deal?

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. I have been advised that the Inland Revenue would treat a regular Christmas gift to an employee of a substantial value as part of remuneration. [Interruption.] If the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry wants me to give way, I should be happy to do so.

I think that I have made the points that I wished to draw to the Minister's attention.

Mr. Syms: Is not the implication of my hon. Friend's speech that many charities will formalise their agreements with volunteers, and is there not thereby great potential not only for expense, but for upset between a charity organisation and volunteers, who may have a different idea of their role within that organisation?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I remind the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) that his remarks should be made in the direction of the Chair.

Mr. Hammond: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Poole for his intervention. That is one of the issues about which we are all concerned. All hon. Members have experience of working with volunteers in a voluntary organisation, because, by their nature, all political parties are voluntary organisations.

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Tories do not have many left.

Mr. Hammond: I think that we have rather more than Labour, at the last count. In passing, I take it that the Minister's legislation has not been drafted with the intention that political parties should be included within the definitions of worthwhile organisations that fall within the scope of the new clause.

We all understand the difficulties of working in a voluntary organisation, particularly at the interface between professional paid workers in that organisation and volunteers. That is always an area of some tension. If, as my hon. Friend the Member for Poole has suggested, the new clause causes charities and voluntary organisations to formalise their agreements and to seek to lay down specifically what is and is not required of each party, that may cause considerable dissent and unrest among a group of people who, by and large, have the best of motives in wanting to assist charities and the communities in which they live.

It is vital that the Government recognise those issues and deal with them. I had hoped that the hybrid motive—the halfway house between a pure volunteer and a full-time worker—would have been recognised and addressed by the Minister when he proposed his new clause and amendments for Report. Sadly, it has not. As I understand it, because of the structure of the Bill, there is no opportunity for Ministers to deal later, by means of regulation, with the issues surrounding the voluntary sector. That is why it is necessary for the Minister to address those issues now. I hope that he will not miss the opportunity to deal with those important points.

Mr. Rowe: I come to the debate without having had the benefit of serving on the Standing Committee and so as to be absolutely certain that my particular preoccupation has been met. I believe that it has been, but I seek confirmation.

For probably more years than is good for the organisation, I have been a trustee of Community Service Volunteers, which still, I think, places more full-time young volunteers in posts than any other organisation in the country. It depends entirely on young people being prepared to accept accommodation and pocket-money subsistence for what they do.

I think that hon. Members on both sides of the House understand the value of the organisation. It has, for example, made it possible for severely disabled people to live in the community: two full-time volunteers undertake to live with a severely disabled person for six months or so, allowing him to conduct a life in the community that would otherwise be entirely beyond him, as no social services department could conceivably provide that sort of 24-hour care.

Of course, the young people learn an enormous amount not only about how to look after disabled people—the disabled person, after a good deal of experience in many cases, teaches much to the young person—but about themselves. Young people who are finding it extraordinarily difficult to get back into the labour market are thus given an opportunity to explore not just one but often two or three avenues in exercising their particular gifts before they hit on the thing that they most want to do.

Plenty of young people who have previously had a life of crime, drug dependency or some other disabling condition are now training to be social workers, to help with mentally handicapped children or to go into teaching. Those young people would otherwise have been lost. That whole process has depended on the fact that they have been able to enter an organisation with a structure, and with 30 years' or more experience of the work involved, and have been able to be taken on, under contracts with local authorities or other employing authorities, for accommodation and subsistence only.

I want the Minister unequivocally to confirm that the intention and practice of the new clause is to safeguard the position of organisations such as Community Service Volunteers, whose value is beyond question. Over the years, it has found places for thousands and thousands of young people, in almost every case to the great advantage both of those young people and of those who employ them for six months or a year.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful for this opportunity to add a little to what has been said in the debate so far. Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe), I have the benefit of having served on the Standing Committee, so I know the purposes behind the new clause. However, remembering the debates in Committee, I fear that there are some outstanding issues that have not been satisfactorily dealt with in the debate thus far, and I wonder whether the Minister would take us through them. It may be for the convenience of the House if I list them rather than talking about them at any great length.

The first is an important issue, which impacts on the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) explained carefully and well. As all hon. Members will know, there is an area of activity that is neither wholly voluntary—that is, as the new clause explains, being undertaken solely for expenses or subsistence—nor being carried out by someone who regards himself as on the same or similar terms as those who expect to be paid normal remuneration, a living wage, for that employment.

That could come about for a number of reasons, which have already been explained in the debate. Retired people or others working for a voluntary organisation or charity purely for benevolent purposes rather than for payment may none the less need some small remuneration to assist them in their work. Essentially, such people are working for an honorarium.

It is clear from the Government's evidence to the Low Pay Commission that they understand the practice of paying an honorarium for certain work. I regard an honorarium as a payment that is not designed to reimburse expenses or provide for subsistence, but is a recognition of work in support of a charity or voluntary organisation. A person doing such work is a volunteer, and it could reasonably be argued that he would not be a worker, as defined in clause 52, for the purposes of the Bill.

I freely acknowledge that we debated that matter in Committee, but it is clear that, under clause 52, the contract that might give rise to the definition of someone being a worker for the purposes of the Bill could be implied rather than expressed, orally rather than in writing. We may be dealing with an oral contract of an implied character.

We then have the difficulty that an honorarium may be legally construed as arising from an oral or implied contract. Indeed, the moment the definition of "voluntary organisation" is stretched—and the new clause, for perfectly good reasons, does that to include not only charities but voluntary organisations and statutory bodies—we move into an area where significant numbers of people are paid an honorarium that is not for a volunteer activity but is clearly designed to recognise work that is done under a clear contract.

The example that comes to mind is that of someone on the board of an NHS trust or similar public body. That person clearly is giving his time for what is, in his view, not a paid position—or certainly not at the level of remuneration that would be appropriate for his skills and qualifications. Often, such a person provides hours of work, even under a contract, considerably in excess of what would be implied by the national minimum wage payment. That suggests that either he would have to be paid a greater honorarium to be a member of that board, or he would have to work fewer hours, or he would have to contract for a given number of hours and then add voluntary hours to that.

A major difficulty that arises from that, which the Government have not resolved—namely, that it will give rise—

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): My hon. Friend is discussing a very important matter, and I am sorry that the Ministers are not listening.

Mr. Ian McCartney: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We have been listening to the debate for an hour and a half, during which time the hon. Gentleman has not even been in the Chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the Chair, but the hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) will have heard what the Minister said.

5.15 pm

Mr. Bruce: Thank you for your defence, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

In the minutes of almost every annual general meeting, including Labour party AGMs, is recorded an honorarium paid to a named accountant for a certain amount of auditing work. Obviously, it takes that person far more hours to do the necessary work than is covered by the small honorarium that he is paid. Under the Bill, will every organisation paying such an honorarium be breaking the law?

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. I am sure that we could find many more such examples. They proliferate in the charity and voluntary sector, not least because organisations are often at pains to establish, in writing, that people have certain responsibilities, and to recognise those responsibilities. The whole purpose of an honorarium is that it is a formal recognition of work done. In those circumstances, it is highly possible that, under the Bill, that will imply a contract being established between the organisation and the person.

The new clause does not provide an opportunity for a voluntary organisation or a charity and the person who, in whatever capacity, does work for it, to make a declaration that that work is being freely done for the charitable purposes of the organisation and therefore should not qualify for the national minimum wage. There is no mechanism by which someone could disqualify himself from the national minimum wage so that he can work for a charity or voluntary organisation for less than the national minimum wage rate.

Mr. Bercow: Does my hon. Friend agree that, unless the Government deal with the issue of honoraria, one or two outcomes will inevitably follow in the case of an NHS trust? Either the trust's wage costs will rise—which would be damaging and no doubt at the expense of patient care—or the person on the board will cease to serve and will be replaced by someone who can afford to serve for nothing, a genuine voluntary worker. Would it not be an extraordinary move to deprive the board of expertise because of the Bill's silliness?

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend paints two scenarios, but I suspect that there is a third. It is that someone contracted to be a member of an NHS trust board will work formally for a relatively small number of hours at the national minimum wage rate, but voluntarily for a number of hours over and above that time. The Minister might think that that is an acceptable outcome, but I think that it would be a rather undesirable one.

Across the voluntary and charitable sector, many people will think that it is very tiresome if they qualify for the national minimum wage in respect of some of what they do for an organisation but are considered a volunteer in respect of other activities. They will be drawn into the panoply of national minimum wage legislation for purposes of qualification, record keeping and providing records; but that may bring the entire system into disrepute in charitable and voluntary organisations. I do not think for a moment that any of Opposition Members' suggestions would have impeded voluntary organisations in pursuing an employment policy in which they provided a national minimum wage on the same basis as any other organisation and complied fully with employment legislation.

Legislation will come into disrepute if it prevents charities and voluntary organisations from recognising that people—millions of people, as the Government's submissions to the Low Pay Commission have made it clear—who serve as volunteers have special characteristics that will occasionally have to be recognised in the national minimum wage structure.

Mr. Syms: Another issue is the status of retained firemen and lifeboat men. How will their status fall within my hon. Friend's arguments?

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend is testing me. As my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) said, the Minister will have to respond to those issues. However, to the extent that such persons are actively employed in the fire or lifeboat service, they should be paid the national minimum wage.

The Bill raises the issue whether one would qualify for the national minimum wage for the period in which one is waiting for a call but not working, but I think that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would say that I was out of order if I explored that issue, which is dealt with in the Bill's provisions on the definition of hours worked rather than in new clause 1, which deals with voluntary workers. Those firemen and lifeboat men clearly would qualify as workers, whereas the new clause would exclude from such a qualification those who work voluntarily for voluntary and charitable organisations.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I think that my hon. Friend has misunderstood the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms), which was that some people who volunteer to work on the lifeboats are paid a call-out fee, which is bound to be below the national minimum wage. I suspect that they—like volunteer coastguards—would work for nothing rather than force lifeboat organisations to pay the minimum wage. Unless Ministers act on those issues, they will find either that they have no volunteers or that they will have to put a lot of money into those activities.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Rather than delaying the debate myself by dealing with the issue, it might be simpler if I directed it to the Minister—who will perhaps reply to the issues raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Poole (Mr. Syms) and for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce). I am sure that, from their constituency knowledge in Dorset, they are especially aware of the circumstances and value of the lifeboat service.

My first point was how we will deal with honoraria—on which I made an intervention earlier. I am surprised that Ministers should have tabled new clause 1 in its present form, as it clearly does not deal satisfactorily with honoraria—on which they have consulted the Low Pay Commission but on which they have presumably not yet received an answer.

The hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Stewart), who has left the Chamber, said that we could solve all those problems simply by using existing legislative machinery. That gives rise to the question of how he envisages such machinery working. If he was referring to the Employment Rights Act 1996—which I suspect he was—why have Ministers not referred to such current legislation in the Bill?

It always assists our debates if we can use existing statutory definitions, as we can not only read previous debates on them but see how such definitions have been interpreted in practice and tested in the courts. Moreover, would should then not have had to examine the new clause de novo. If the hon. Member for Eccles can enlighten us on how existing machinery can be used, perhaps we will be able to suggest to Ministers that they do exactly that, rather than asking the House to devise entirely new machinery.

Although it was not explicitly stated in the Standing Committee, Ministers have gone to the trouble of including in the new clause references to statutory bodies. It is interesting that they should have done so. The second limb of the new clause makes it clear that, when a charity agrees that a person should do work for charitable purposes, that work may be done for a statutory body. Presumably, the work could entail, for example, helping out with work commissioned by a parish council.

The first limb of the new clause—in subsection (1)—excludes from the Bill's provisions not only volunteers in charities and voluntary organisations and their associated fund-raising bodies but persons in statutory bodies. That means that we are effectively creating an entire class of volunteers in the public sector who will be excluded from qualifying for the national minimum wage.

I should be grateful if the Minister will take us through the train of thought—he did not deal with it in opening the debate—that led the Government to abandon the practice proposed in clause 42, which will be deleted by Government amendment No. 20. Why did Ministers feel it right to include in the new clause such a definition of statutory body so wide that it will include every statutory body established by every Act?

Mr. Hammond: In Committee, Opposition Members mentioned volunteers in the public sector—such as classroom assistants in schools and NHS volunteers. Is it not possible that what gave rise to the Minister's train of thought was no more subtle than a telephone call from No. 11 Downing street telling him that he had to include the public sector so as to ensure that there was not a consequent large increase in public expenditure as a result of that sector's not being able to use volunteer workers?

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. As he has raised that point, I shall leave it to the Minister to tell us his precise train of thought. This is another instance in which—my hon. Friend is right—some of the points made by Opposition Members have led the Government to make the changes that they have made. Although the Minister, in response to an earlier speech, ungraciously said that that was not true, I suspect that it is.

I should like to emphasise another point, which was raised by the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey), and with which we will deal later in the debate. It is a great pity that references to training in the new clause include only training specifically designed for people performing a specific voluntary function. I shall not elaborate on the point—the hon. Gentleman has already dealt with it better than I could—but all hon. Members will know of people who undertake voluntary work in a charity or voluntary organisation primarily from altruistic motives but who think that there may be a beneficial secondary gain: work experience and training.

The training that volunteers acquire is by no means necessarily job-specific. From my visits to charity shops in and around my own constituency, I know that some people who work in them—particularly young people with learning disabilities—are acquiring, as the hon. Member for Eastleigh said, much more than job-specific skills: they are acquiring broader social and other skills that are designed to assist them in moving into paid employment in the workplace, where they should be able to attract the national minimum wage. It would be a great pity if, by passing new clause 1, we excluded such wider training, which could be very advantageous to those who are working for charitable organisations. I do not think it likely that any damage or mischief would be done if we included such training.

Let me make a fourth point to the Minister, which I do not think has been raised yet. The Minister has told us that associated fund-raising bodies will be included, and that will allow the inclusion of training enterprises associated with charities; but how far does that go? We know that some charity shops and other organisations remit all their profits to the charities that are, effectively, their sponsors and owners. In certain circumstances, however, charities—I do not criticise them for a moment—are increasingly lending their auspices to bodies that may not remit all their profits to those charities, and are not necessarily owned by them.

5.30 pm

The part of the new clause that deals with associated fund-raising bodies refers to a body

"the profits of which are applied wholly for the purposes of a charity", but it does not say that the body must be wholly owned by that charity, or that there may not be other subsidiary associated bodies that are not necessarily remitting all their profits to the charity. I hope that the Minister will tell us where the boundaries governing associated fund-raising bodies will lie in future, in relation not only to profit but to ownership.

My fifth and last point relates to political parties. The Minister has not responded to my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge, who asked whether political parties would be treated as bodies qualifying by virtue of being voluntary organisations. If it is intended to exclude them, I think that considerable difficulties will ensue—not least, perhaps, for the Labour party. As we have discovered, Labour Members tend to employ a number of researchers and others at what would have been well below the going rate for the national minimum wage in past years, and perhaps still is. If they were required to pay all those researchers the national minimum wage, the bids that would have to be made to the Joseph Rowntree trust would be all the greater, and might embarrass Ministers all the more.

Mr. Rowe: My hon. Friend should understand—indeed, I am sure he does, as he has worked at the heart of a voluntary party organisation—that too much transparency could damage democracy. When I worked for the Conservative party, party workers told us that floods of trade union officials were coming in to do by-election work, and asked us to complain bitterly that that constituted a monstrous breach of the spirit of the legislation. I remember the then chairman of the party—the late Lord Thorneycroft—saying that he had noticed with some delight how many paid agents of the Conservative party had chosen to take their annual holiday at the time of the by-election. I think that to force too much transparency on the operations of political parties is more likely to destroy than to enhance the democratic process.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend tempts me to embark on a discussion of the characteristics of political parties more generally. If by "transparency" he means laying political party organisation open to the wider view of the public, I agree with him to some extent. Political parties are not designed to be agents of the state, and ought not to be such agents. If we construct a system whereby they become simply an extension of the accountability regime applying to public organisations, we shall subvert their essential function, which is not to be part of the state but to operate outside it. As I am sure my hon. Friend agrees, that does not mean for a minute that we should forgo accountability within a political party to its membership, but there may well be a distinction between accountability to membership and accountability to the state. Those who talk about transparency often mean accountability to the state.

We need to know at this stage whether the Minister intends political parties to be covered. If they are to be covered, there will clearly be an opportunity to exclude volunteers in political parties from qualifying, in the same way as those in any voluntary organisation. That is important, not least because—as my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent pointed out—employees of political parties often have to become volunteers at certain times. If an agent wishes to canvass, for instance, he must do so in his own time, because he cannot be paid for canvassing. I feel that such distinctions should be reflected in the legislation.

If for any reason political parties are excluded from the definition of "voluntary organisation" or "benevolent purposes", I think that we shall have serious problems. In many instances, those working with political parties will be treated as "workers" by virtue of the inclusive character of the provisions, and will be unable to carry out their work in a voluntary capacity. In that event, the activities of political organisations will be damaged.

The new clause is rightly designed to respond to points made in Committee, and it has done so to an extent. I was not party to the discussions between those on the Front Benches, but I fear that some difficulties remain. I have a general sense that, if this is to be done right, the process is becoming unduly complex, for two reasons. First, there is the inclusive character of the rest of the legislation, which is designed to ensure that—in all circumstances other than those that are expressly excluded—everyone qualifies for the national minimum wage. I understand why Ministers set out to do that, but it is causing difficulties in relation to charities and voluntary organisations.

Secondly, Ministers have not chosen to take the—possibly—altogether better route of allowing people to reach agreements allowing their exclusion by virtue of their own free will. That would have been much simpler than setting out tortuous definitions that prompt questions.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Lansley: Yes, for the last time.

Mr. Bruce: Surely Labour Governments have always stood for giving people the right to negotiate their wages, and to have them negotiated by others on their behalf. Is it not scandalous that people should be told that they can no longer negotiate their wages, if they want to take less money than the Government think they do?

Mr. Lansley: Yes. It is astonishing that people wishing freely to enter into an agreement with a charity or voluntary organisation to work for less than the national minimum wage—as is perfectly possible—should be legally prevented from doing so. Such people might be forced to choose between not doing the work at all, and doing it at a cost that would significantly impair the return to the charity for its own charitable purposes. Alternatively, they might have to undertake to do the work on a voluntary basis, thus finding themselves considerably disadvantaged. Such people would have been perfectly willing to do their work in a way that would benefit themselves, the charity and its beneficiaries.

Mr. Ian McCartney: We have been debating the new clause and amendments for just over two hours, although at the outset the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) expressed general support for the Government's proposals, following extensive consultation between the political parties and the voluntary sector.

Let me begin by reassuring the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid–Kent (Mr. Rowe). A letter from Community Service Volunteers gives some idea of the charities' view, and of whether they believe that the Government are meeting their needs. I know of no charity that has submitted evidence to the Low Pay Commission, or has commented in the public domain, that does not support the principle of a national minimum wage. They find it wholly inappropriate for Opposition Members to take their names in vain in an attempt to undermine their support for the national minimum wage. On 5 March, CSV wrote expressing its appreciation for the discussions that it had with officials in the Department. The letter stated:

"We are entirely satisfied with the new amendment and particularly pleased that our full-time volunteers will be able to continue to receive accommodation, meals and a subsistence allowance. Your team were very helpful. Please pass on my thanks. I hope the rest of the Bill passes as smoothly as possible for you."

That covers the entire context of this afternoon's debate.

The hon. Member for Daventry raised a number of issues. He mentioned Irish charities, and I am quite sure that he did not intend to challenge or attack them. There are hundreds of Irish charities in Britain doing very good work for the Irish community and the community in general.

Mr. Boswell: Of course I did not mean to do that. My remarks were framed metaphorically. The House may be interested to know that Northern Ireland still holds the palm as the most generous part of the United Kingdom for donations to charity.

Mr. McCartney: Indeed. I was glad to give the hon. Gentleman the opportunity to clarify what he said. I know from our discussions in public and in private that he would never intend his comments to be interpreted in that way. However, there are mischievous people within and outside Parliament in respect of comments by politicians.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned small charities. Many of us have worked with small charities. The purpose of the new clause is that small charities run exclusively by volunteers would be excluded from the provisions of the Bill, so there would be no problems in that respect.

The hon. Gentleman also said something about rates of pay. Many charities pay decent wages and provide decent conditions for their employees. They reject and resent any allegation that the minimum wage would undermine their capacity to continue their work. Most in the charitable sector are good employers and want to pass on good practice to other charities. Many of them work together to secure good employment practice. However, they also want to make a clear distinction between employees and volunteers. The new clause seeks to clarify that, and I believe that it does so effectively.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela Smith) spoke about the professionalism of volunteers. No one would disagree that, although volunteers give their time and effort freely, their skills and knowledge give added value to the charities concerned and the individuals that they seek to benefit. The skill, professionalism and dedication of volunteers provides added value and benefit to the activities of those who work in all parts of the charitable sector.

I hope that, in my intervention in his speech, I gave the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) a clear indication of our position, and I hope that I do not have to add anything to my response to the points that he has raised with me publicly and privately.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) raised a range of issues to which I shall come in a moment. However, I was disappointed by his churlish attitude to the group of amendments, although I understand that he was genuinely unable to come to the meeting and I apologise that I was unable to arrange a subsequent meeting with him. I recognise that he spent a great deal of time in Committee putting his case. When I address his specific amendments, I shall explain why I am somewhat disappointed by his attitude.

On the continuum of employment for unpaid volunteers, the voluntary sector made it clear to us in response to consultation that they wanted no such thing. They wanted a clear distinction between employees of charities and volunteers. That is what we have provided in the new clause, and that is why they wrote to us accepting it.

Mr. Lansley: In passing over the comments by the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey), the Minister has not adequately answered the points that he raised about training. Elsewhere in the Bill it is possible to specify a training rate of the national minimum wage. It is also possible to exclude trainees altogether. However, it does not seem possible to do what the hon. Member for Eastleigh and I were asking for—to exclude from account for workers in voluntary organisations the cost of training attributable to them.

5.45 pm

Mr. McCartney: I dealt with the matter more than adequately. If someone undergoes training in health and safety, it is generic training, but it is also specific, as training in health and safety has set principles and purposes. The reason for the training may be specific to the individual, although it may be a generic training programme. That is not a problem under the Bill, and I feel that my answer was more than adequate.

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) asked whether the Bill would challenge an honorarium. A genuine honorarium is not legally binding; it is a contribution, not a wage, and the person receiving it is not an employee. The hon. Gentleman raised honoraria in that context as a smokescreen to undermine the purposes of the new clause.

Mr. Boswell: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McCartney: No. Opposition Members had two hours in which to put their case. I am trying to deal with the points that they raised as quickly and efficiently as possible.

Amendments (a) and (b) would turn the voluntary workers' clause into something quite different. Instead of allowing genuine volunteers not to be caught up in the Bill, it would provide an exclusion for part-time workers working for charities, voluntary associations and statutory bodies. It would blow a large hole in the Bill—as is entirely consistent with the approach of some Opposition Members.

[Mr. McCartney]

The overall effect would be to limit the range of persons within the exclusion to those not on benefit and pensioners who work for up to 20 hours a week and to increase the weekly remuneration that they could receive to 10 times the national minimum wage—over and above reasonable day-to-day subsistence and accommodation.

Taken individually, there seems no rhyme or reason to any of the elements in amendment (a). Limiting the range of voluntary workers to those working fewer than 20 hours per week would arbitrarily entitle full-time volunteers who, according to the National Council of Voluntary Organisations, work more than 30 hours per week, to the national minimum. In our view, it is not a genuine amendment, but an attempt to catch volunteers in a way that was never intended.

Similarly, the suggestion of benefits up to a weekly amount of 10 times the hourly rate of the national minimum wage seems entirely arbitrary and to have no clear basis.

Amendments (a) and (b) also refer to the fixed-profit car scheme. The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire said that, in almost all circumstances, we should look to using existing machinery, and that is precisely what we have done. The fixed-profit car scheme was introduced by the Conservative Government in 1990. All the issues that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge raised in respect of the scheme really relate to the Finance Bill and not the National Minimum Wage Bill.

Mr. Hammond: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McCartney: No. I shall explain why that is the case.

The fixed-profit car scheme is a non-statutory scheme which employers, employees, volunteers or anyone else can use to calculate whether or not there is a profit element in their mileage allowance, if they get one. Only the profit element is liable to tax, so there is no tax liability if the mileage allowance is within the limits set by the Inland Revenue. The purpose of the scheme was to reduce record keeping. It has clearly been a non-contentious issue in political terms since 1990, so I see no reason for its inclusion. If the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge has complaints about it, he should raise them when we debate the Finance Bill later this year.

Mr. Hammond: I accept what the Minister says about the fixed-profit car scheme. The purpose of including it is that the same mechanism should be used for determining whether any payment has been made that would exclude a worker from the exemption from the national minimum wage. The issue has nothing to do with tax. It is a separate calculation to be carried out under the Bill.

Mr. McCartney: The purpose of the proposal is to ensure clear limitations on payments. We have set out a clear way forward on that, with the approval of the charities. The hon. Gentleman raises issues concerning the fixed-profit car scheme that have been set out in Finance Acts since 1990. He has said nothing to undermine the context of the new clause. If there had been a difficulty, the charitable and voluntary sectors would have told us. The hon. Gentleman has raised spurious points that do not stand up to examination.

I should like to finish, because we have some other important issues to consider this evening. The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire talked about political parties. They are not philanthropic. Under no circumstances will the volunteers who work for them be caught by the Bill. We are not interested in what members of the Conservative party do, but we should be interested if they published their accounts, please. That would be more interesting than publishing details about members and their voluntary efforts. I ask my hon. Friends to support the new clause and to oppose the amendments to it, if they are put to a vote.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 2

INFORMATION OBTAINED BY OFFICERS

'.—(1) This section applies to any information obtained by an officer acting for the purposes of this Act, whether by virtue of paragraph (a) or paragraph (b) of section 13(1) above.

(2) Information to which this section applies vests in the Secretary of State.

(3) Information to which this section applies may be used for any purpose relating to this Act by—

(a) the Secretary of State; or

(b) any relevant authority whose officer obtained the information.

(4) Information to which this section applies—

(a) may be supplied by, or with the authorisation of, the Secretary of State to any relevant authority for any purpose relating to this Act; and

(b) may be used by the recipient for any purpose relating to this Act.

(5) Information supplied under subsection (4) above—

(a) shall not be supplied by the recipient to any other person or body unless it is supplied for the purposes of any civil or criminal proceedings relating to this Act; and

(b) shall not be supplied in those circumstances without the authorisation of the Secretary of State.

(6) This section does not limit the circumstances in which information may be supplied or used apart from this section.

(7) In this section "relevant authority" means any government department or other body which is party to arrangements made with the Secretary of State which are in force under section 13(1)(b) above.'.—[Mrs. Roche.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry (Mrs. Barbara Roche): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government new clause 3—Information obtained by agricultural wages officers.

Government amendments Nos. 33, 39 and 34.

Mrs. Roche: The purpose of the two new clauses and related amendments is to remove unnecessary obstacles to the exchange of information between different enforcement authorities that might handicap the effective enforcement of the national minimum wage or agricultural minimum rates. That makes sense for effective implementation and to help reduce burdens on business. We do not want authorities operating in the same area to be hamstrung because they cannot talk to each other or pass on relevant information. Nor do we want them to be treading on each other's toes or the toes of the companies within their responsibility.

The information that might be exchanged will be limited. We are not proposing an all-embracing mechanism under which information collected for one purpose will be freely available for others to use for any other purpose. In each of the new provisions, we closely limit the information that may be exchanged, the circle of those who may exchange it and the purpose for which it may be used. They must all be related to enforcement of the national minimum wage or agricultural minimum rates.

There is inevitably some contingency about the provisions. We are still considering the most effective means of enforcement, balancing our wish to secure an approach based on self-enforcement with our determination to ensure that unscrupulous employers—hon. Members on both sides of the House have said frequently that such employers are few—will not be able to evade their responsibilities. We must consider carefully who might best enforce the national minimum wage when we have seen the Low Pay Commission's report. The provisions need to cover the possibility of one or more bodies being responsible for enforcement.

The purpose of the new clauses and related amendments is simple: to ensure that information relating to the national minimum wage or to minimum pay rates in agriculture can be exchanged among the authorities responsible for enforcement.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I note the great detail of the information. I am sure that the Minister is privy to the Government's thinking on the data protection legislation. Has she considered whether the proposals may put in jeopardy employers who do not keep the information as securely as they need to under that legislation?

Mrs. Roche: I can reassure the hon. Gentleman that the new clauses and amendments relate to enforcement and the inter-relation of different Acts. It will be possible to use such information as a basis for mounting prosecutions, if necessary. If officers of two or more agencies are appointed or commissioned under clause 13, there should not be any unnecessary obstacles in the way of their exchanging information about the national minimum wage.

New clauses 2 and 3 establish the shape of our intentions. The purpose and effect of the related amendments Nos. 33, 39 and 34 should become apparent. New clause 2 deals with the exchange of information between two or more national minimum wage enforcement officers working for different enforcement bodies, regardless of whether either enforcer is responsible for enforcing the national minimum wage in the agriculture sector.

One agency will be able to pass national minimum wage information to the other agency or agencies. As I have said, the nature of the information that may be exchanged, the circle of those who exchange it and the purpose for which it may be used are all limited to matters relating to the enforcement of the national minimum wage.

Subsection (1) of new clause 2 establishes that the information in question has been obtained by an officer who has been appointed by the Secretary of State or commissioned by the Secretary of State from another Department or Crown body. It also establishes that the information must have been obtained for purposes related to the national minimum wage.

Subsection (2) specifies that the information is treated as held by the Secretary of State. Subsection (3) allows the information to be used by departmental officers or officers belonging to the Department or body that obtained the information for any purpose relating to the national minimum wage. Subsection (4) allows information to be supplied by any relevant authority to any other relevant authority with the authorisation of the Secretary of State. Again, such information may be used for any purpose relating to the national minimum wage.

Subsection (5) allows information to be supplied outside the immediate circle of national minimum wage enforcement bodies, but only for the purpose of civil or criminal proceedings relating to the Bill. Evidence about a breach of the national minimum wage provisions could be supplied to a worker to help bring criminal or civil proceedings against their employer. Again, any such information supply must be authorised by the Secretary of State.

Subsection (6) makes it clear that the provisions on information exchange for national minimum wage purposes are not intended to prevent the passing on of information that could otherwise be passed on. Subsection (7) defines a "relevant authority" and the closed circle that I have already referred to of national minimum wage enforcement bodies.

New clause 2 enables the different national minimum wage enforcers to exchange information for better enforcement. There was a great deal of discussion about better enforcement, much of which was led by the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), in our very good debates in Committee.

New clause 3 and the related amendments Nos. 33, 39 and 34 deal similarly with agricultural wages inspectors in England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. They are designed to cover two parallel situations. They each relate most probably to a situation in which information is obtained from an employer whose activities straddle agricultural and non-agricultural operations and whose staff consist of a mixture of agricultural and non-agricultural workers. The hon. Member for Daventry will have had experience of that—personally, as well as in his capacity as an hon. Member. Experience is always useful when discussing such matters.

New clause 3 covers cases such as where agricultural wage inspectors visit an employer who employs agricultural and non-agricultural workers and uncover evidence of non-payment of the national minimum wage to a worker who is not employed in agriculture or who is not entitled to agricultural minimum wage rates. In such a situation, it makes sense for inspectors to be able to pass on the information to the relevant national minimum wage officer.

The second situation is dealt with by amendments Nos. 33, 39 and 34 and is the reverse of the one I have just described. A national minimum wage officer might uncover evidence of non-payment of an agricultural minimum wage rate during inspection of a packhouse, where only a few workers are employed in agriculture. In that situation, it also makes sense for the national minimum wage officer to pass such information to the agricultural wages inspectors.

Mr. Boswell: Is the Minister saying that, if there is evidence of non-compliance with agricultural wages legislation, notwithstanding compliance with the national minimum wage, the national minimum wage enforcement officer would pass the information to the agricultural wages inspectors?

Mrs. Roche: Yes, the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. We rightly spent a deal of time in Committee going over the connection between the two areas. We have tabled the new clauses and amendments to clarify the matter.

New clause 3 is similar in design and structure to new clause 2. Subsection (1) establishes that the information covered is information obtained by an agricultural wages inspector under agricultural wages legislation. Subsection (2) allows the information to be supplied to the Secretary of State for the purposes of the Bill. Subsection (3) allows the Secretary of State to pass the information to another Department or body.

Subsection (4) allows the recipients of information to pass it on, in limited circumstances and only with the authorisation of the original supplier of the information, to another person or body for the purposes of bringing civil or criminal proceedings under the Bill. For example, if the national minimum wage officer did not want to bring civil or criminal proceedings against a worker's employer, the information could be passed to the worker so that he or she could do so.

Subsection (5) makes it clear that the provisions on information exchange for such purposes do not prevent any passing on of information which would otherwise be lawful. Subsection (6) defines "agricultural wages legislation" and "relevant authority" to cover each of the three agricultural wages regimes in England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Amendments Nos. 33, 39 and 34 each allow information obtained by national minimum wage officers to pass in the opposite direction, so that it could be used for enforcing agricultural minimum rates by the agricultural wages inspectors in England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland—the very point made by the hon. Member for Daventry. However, the amendments exclude information that is not strictly pay related, such as information relating to holiday entitlement and other terms and conditions. The nature of the information that may be exchanged, the purpose to which it may be put and the circle of those who may exchange it are limited along lines similar to those described in new clauses 2 and 3.

I am convinced that the proposed changes will improve the operation of the Act, both for those responsible for enforcement and for workers and employers. I am also convinced that we have built in necessary limitations so that information can be used only for the purpose of enforcing the national minimum wage or agricultural minimum rates. I have taken a little time to go into some of the detail, for which I hope the House will forgive me. I have done so because it is important to explain to the House exactly what we mean to do. The proposals form a very important part of the Bill. I believe that this is the right approach, and I commend the new clauses and amendments to the House.

Mr. Boswell: I genuinely thank the Under-Secretary for her explanation. These are not simple matters; they do not leap off the page. Such a clear definition is valuable to the House and to those who read our deliberations. In the spirit of her ingratiating—though not intentionally so—remarks, I should say at the outset that I would not seek to oppose what she is doing.

In a sense, the provisions have come to light because the Government have not yet decided on the enforcement structure they will apply to the national minimum wage under clause 13. We know only that there is an agricultural inspectorate and that there will be wages officers in other capacities who will be able to enforce the legislation; we do not have a precise blueprint. Perhaps one ought not to quibble about that. It is much better that the Bill should be made practical and sensible and that it should work in the most economical way possible. That is no issue between the two sides of the House.

It occurs to me that new clause 2(7) refers to the "relevant authority" being

"any government department or other body which is party to arrangements made with the Secretary of State which are enforced under section 13(1)(b) above."

It will be important later for Ministers to consider the extent to which, for enforcement purposes, those arrangements can be made public. If, for example, somebody turns up at my farm—an interest that I have declared in the context of these debates—or at some other business with which I may be involved, and claims to be an officer for that purpose, it is very important that that is keyed in. It would also be helpful if that was clearly explained in advance to relevant interests.

There is a tension in all this. Information—knowledge—is power. It is important and sensitive, and may sometimes be confidential. It is very important that it does not get into the wrong hands. Conversely, it is important that it should be available for the right purposes. That is a balance that all Ministers have to strike. I do not twit the Government for not proposing such extensive and meaty provisions in Committee. The new clauses and the amendments look slightly like afterthoughts. Perhaps they are good afterthoughts. That is what we now need to discover.

We need to consider two areas: one general and one specific. The first concerns the acquisition and control of information by the Secretary of State. New clause 2(2) is a rather deathless, or curt, sentence:

"Information to which this section applies vests in the Secretary of State."

I was irresistibly drawn to the comparison with the coroner, who owns the body. The important aspect is what the Secretary of State is to do with the information and where it should be relevant. The Under-Secretary eloquently explained that the intention is that the Secretary of State should make information relevant to the Act available only for the purposes of enforcing the Act. I note that she is nodding.

The construction of new clause 2(3), which states:

"Information to which this section applies may be used for any purpose relating to this Act by—

(a) the Secretary of State",

is not quite as narrow as the Under-Secretary intended it to be. The Secretary of State might want to make a speech, for example, in which she describes how good the Act is or how triumphant the national minimum wage has proved to be in practice, despite the concerns expressed by Opposition Members. I am not sure how she might do that or whether it would be proper to use internal enforcement information for the purpose. Conversely—I am weighing the dilemma myself—the Opposition find any information bestowed on us by the present Secretary of State or her colleagues a bonus.

From time to time, my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) asks a series of parliamentary questions; he does not always receive an answer. He is distressed and concerned about that, because it reduces his ability to probe and, if necessary, harry the Government.

I never receive a priority written answer on time from the Department of Trade and Industry; it always slips by at least a day. Lest the Minister think that I am singling her out, I should say that on 27 October a Minister in another Government Department promised in a written answer that she would write to me to answer my question on, I suspect, a somewhat sensitive matter. I have a fairly rudimentary bring-up system and I have just noticed that I have not yet received an answer, so I must return to that one.

A balance must be achieved. I think we all know that, although the Secretary of State wants to use the information for the best purposes, to some extent it will have a public face. Sometimes it would be proper to draw on that information in a policy speech. We welcome openness where we can persuade the Department to carry out such a policy. We might even have to welcome openness if, subsequently, the Department is forced to admit that the whole enterprise of the national minimum wage is a signal failure—and we should like the Secretary of State to come clean about that, too.

There is also what might be called the micro-dilemma. What happens to locally amassed information relating to individual employers or enterprises, which is then sent, nominally to the Secretary of State but in fact to her officials, and used for enforcement purposes?

The Under-Secretary rightly says that it is necessary—sensible—for information to be exchanged between public authorities for enforcement. I do not quibble with that—it is entirely proper—but the counterpart of making the information more readily available than it probably would have been if new clauses 2 and 3 had not been tabled is that there is more of it about. There is more of it to leak to the wrong people or, conceivably—although I sure the Under-Secretary would not want her officials to do so; perish the thought—to be abusively released in a way that would breach confidence or create embarrassment for individuals, improperly.

I am not drawing the Government's attention to that potential set of circumstances. I suspect that, if I did, the Under-Secretary would tell me that there are legal defences and that the Department of Trade and Industry would have to resist a legal challenge if there were some malicious disclosure by officials. I understand that, but that is not the case that I have in mind. There are two points on which I seek assurance about the interests of the citizen or the employer on whom a report might be made which may be referred from one set of enforcement officers to another.

What would happen if, under new clause 2(5), the information was disclosed with the authorisation of the Secretary of State and supplied for the purposes of any civil or criminal proceedings relating to the Act—it is sent back to the employee to enable them to consider whether to bring proceedings in an employment tribunal or civil procedure—but the employee abused the information?

The Under-Secretary may remember some exchanges that we had at a late hour—or was it an early hour?—about the possibility of a similar thing happening when a worker took a third party to look at the employer's employment records. It is in my mind that, as a result of malice or even inadvertence, the worker, or the party to whom the Secretary of State might disclose the information, could make it available to another person.

If the information has to be used in civil or criminal proceedings, that would come out in open court, but if the case did not come to court and the information was leaked to a third party and was damaging to the interests of the employer who had originally generated the information, would that be the responsibility of the Secretary of State, through her officers, or would it be the responsibility of the person to whom the information was made available for the purposes of civil or criminal proceedings?

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend is dealing with this point in an exemplary fashion. What worries me, however, is the possibility that the information might be leaked, without the authorisation of the Secretary of State, to a business rival. In such circumstances, would any redress be available to the employer who had been offended and discriminated against in that unseemly way?

Mr. Boswell: That is a perfectly fair point, additional to the ones that I am making. Not only is information about employment practices probably confidential among the parties concerned, it is of considerable interest to an employer to help the latter understand what is going on.

In this context, there is another, separate, issue. If information that is relevant and exists simply for the purposes of the Act is disclosed to a third party, what is the legal position if additional information is accidentally embodied with it? I remember some rather similar discussions taking place during the passage of the Bank of England Bill.

Sadly, there is always the possibility that papers will be accidentally stapled on. The other day, by mistake, I sent a letter to a third party—and not to the person for whom it was intended. The third party was civil enough to return it, but what would have happened if they had used it? It might have been—although in this case it would not have been—embarrassing. It is important to pin the responsibility in such circumstances. I do not seek to sling it round the neck of the Secretary of State.

If information is disclosed to a third party under this procedure for the purposes of civil or criminal proceedings—and therefore, in a sense, for finer purposes and in confidence, under a sanitised procedure—what happens if it is published? Is there any liability on the publisher of that information for what has happened if it gives rise to commercial damage to the individual?

These are genuine points about what might loosely be called civil liberties and the interests of employers that should be considered as part of the powers that the Secretary of State and her Ministers seek to take to extend the powers of information. For the reasons that I gave at the start of my remarks, I shall not cavil at the Minister's method—on balance, it is probably the right thing for her to do—but it is important in all these matters that confidential information is not leaked, that it is not made available in a way that may be abused by a competitor, and that if anyone allows that to happen, either by accident or maliciously, there is some means of redress for the individual whose interests have been damaged.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I am not quite as relaxed as my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) about the purpose and detailed wording of new clauses 2 and 3. I am deeply troubled that, in about half an hour or so, we shall deliberate on some extremely important new clauses that have just been introduced to the House. They were not considered in detail in Committee. Lawyers outside this place have had far too little time in which to anticipate their likely effect. I am disturbed that the civil liberties lobby—if we may so describe people who work on civil liberties—has probably not addressed itself to what the new clauses do.

You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will know that the Government, in proposing a National Minimum Wage Bill, have regularly demonstrated that they want to ensure that employers—not the taxpayer—pay their employees. The Government want to ensure that people receive an adequate wage, so that it need not be topped up using housing benefit or income support. That is why the wording of these clauses is so important.

I wonder why the words

"civil or criminal proceedings relating to this Act"

have been used instead of civil or criminal proceedings "taken under" this Act. The wording is extremely important, because of the way in which the Bill could be used.

For example, a constituent who is trying to claim from his or her absent partner through the Child Support Agency, and who probably has good reason for doing so, might come to an hon. Member's surgery. The present wording gives that individual the right to demand that the agency asks for information about someone who claims to be earning a small amount of money, but surely must be getting the minimum wage, so that he or she can take action relating to the Bill to ensure that the person pays his or her full dues under the Child Support Act 1995.

What about an agency looking into housing benefit? Surely the same argument would apply. The Government have said that one of the purposes of this Bill is to reduce the amount of housing benefit that must be paid by the taxpayer. The Government want the individual to be paid a certain amount of money. Under this ill-debated and ill-considered clause, which has only just been sprung on the general public, a housing benefit office could look into a claim from an individual stating that he or she is paid £2 an hour because it seemed incorrect—the purpose of the Bill is to ensure that people are paid the right amount of money—and ask for information. I hope that the Minister will reassure us that that could not happen.

Mr. Boswell: Has my hon. Friend thought of the recent case involving Marks and Spencer, which secured large damages because of the commercial damage done to it by allegations about a defective employment practice? The company was vindicated in court, but needed compensation for damage that had been done because the information had been made public.

Mr. Bruce: I recall that case; the damages were substantial. Marks and Spencer took action against the broadcasting company that had made and published the programme. I suspect that a company would not have the same right to damages against the Government—they always seem to be able to protect themselves.

That moves me swiftly on to another important point about the authorisation of the Secretary of State. When most people read those words, they will think that, when such information needs to be transferred from one agency to another, the Secretary of State and President of the Board of Trade will get the full file in her red box, telling her the circumstances and why the information has to be passed across, so that she can take a semi-judicial decision that it is a proper movement of that information. We know what the general public do not—that that terminology is meaningless. All it means is that it will be authorised by someone who authorised someone else who authorised someone and so forth all the way down the feeding chain until some junior civil servant can say, "I am authorised by the Secretary of State to ask for this information." It will go to another junior civil servant and the information will pass across.

I am reminded of an interesting story that I heard from the late Nick Ridley on this subject. He told the House—certainly the meeting that I was attending—that he had awoken one morning to find an important letter from the Department of the Environment among the post on his breakfast table. The letter said, "I am authorised by the Secretary of State for the Environment to inform you that your carriage gate has been listed." He was the Secretary of State for the Environment and he had no inkling that he was about to list his own arch.

Frankly, the fine words on this amendment paper are a con. They are an attempt to tell the public that it is all right and that information will be transferred only in the most extreme of circumstances because the Secretary of State herself—the President of the Board of Trade—has to authorise the transfer.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend just provided the House with an illuminating example. May I draw his attention to another probably occasional but sinister circumstance that could arise? He referred to the exercise of discretion on the part of the President of the Board of Trade. Could the people who might leak information from time to time be not junior civil servants but senior spin doctors, briefing on their own account and without authority in such a way as to damage others? In those circumstances, would the Secretary of State take responsibility in the classic and, if I may say so, the Powellite sense of the term?

Mr. Bruce: We all doubt whether the Secretary of State would take responsibility. The Minister is an honourable lady and one of the stars of the Administration—I hope that I do not damage her career by saying so—and she will take that matter on board. We are trying to put across an important point. Who exactly will authorise the transfer of the information? I suspect that it will be the most junior of junior clerks who will be authorised by the Secretary of State to transfer information whenever it must be got from one part of the Government organisation to another.

Mr. Boswell: It would be helpful if, through my hon. Friend, I might ask the Minister what grade of official would be required to authorise the transfer of information.

Mr. Bruce: I would certainly give way to the hon. Lady if she wished to intervene, as that would facilitate matters. It is clear that I shall have to go a little further to tempt her to decide that this matter is important enough for her to give us a proper answer.

The Data Protection Acts 1984 and 1988 and other legislation designed to protect people have often been used almost perversely to prevent people who need information, often for personal use, from misusing the powers available to them—it is the sort of thing that often happens within Departments. In a half-hour debate on a wet Monday—I am not sure whether it is wet; it is probably sunny outside—when the House is nearly empty, we are giving powers to the Secretary of State and the feeding chain all the way through the Department of Trade and Industry, and to the Department for Education and Employment, to allow officials simply to show a card saying, "I am authorised by the Secretary of State to get information you are holding in another agency and pass it across."

Often, it is convenient for Governments to trawl for information in other areas. That has been the case for a long time. Most of the Labour Members present when the Child Support Bill was debated were keen to tell us how the Child Support Agency would have the power to pull in information. That is important, and we should consider it.

I intervened on the Minister on the subject of data protection legislation. I know that she is knowledgeable in such matters. I think that she will be responsible, particularly on the information technology side, for looking into all the problems. She will know that the Data Protection Bill that is passing through the House has been driven by a new European directive.

I was not a member of the Standing Committee that considered this Bill. I come to it on a wet Monday. When I looked at it I thought, "Oh no! Surely not. Surely the Minister must know that German data protection legislation would not allow such a transfer of information—absolutely not." We are considering jurisdictional matters. After all, people working in the United Kingdom and paid by companies in Germany might be caught by the Bill, but that information could not be transferred.

The Minister may think that she will enjoy many powers under the Bill, but I suspect that, when the Data Protection Bill is enacted, she will find that other colleagues, possibly even officials working for the same Department, are working to prevent information being transferred between Departments. It is important that we find out what considerations there have been on how the Data Protection Bill will affect information.

The German system is simple. Any information that is given to someone for a specific purpose must not be given to anyone else for any other purpose, although that is a daft interpretation of the European Union directive. I suspect that, as soon as we think we can live with the new data protection legislation and make it workable, someone will—as has happened time and again—take the matter to the European Court and say, "Hang on a minute. I provided some information about what I was doing in my workplace." That person will claim certain rights under the European convention on everybody's rights, which the Government are incorporating into British law, and say that the information that he provided was transferred from one Department to another without his authorisation.

If information that has been given in good faith by an employer is transferred between agencies, it may be found that, under the new Data Protection Bill, the employee's rights have been trampled on.

6.30 pm

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend is talking about the transfer of data between agencies and Departments, but a Government agency may acquire information for two different reasons and be required to keep the data separate. If the officers referred to in the Bill were acting for the Contributions Agency, for example, but were also required to deal with the national minimum wage, they would have two sets of data for two separate purposes. How will the Data Protection Bill affect how they use that information?

Mr. Bruce: Interestingly, people in business are absolutely barred under data protection legislation from transferring information—they could get into a lot of trouble. The Government say, "We're not a business and we are not out for profit. We are guardians of the public interest." They think, therefore, that they can trample on everyone's civil rights in all their other legislation.

On a wet Monday when there is hardly anyone in the House, the Government have introduced pages and pages of new clauses on how they will do away with people's rights. Information will be given to one Department for a particular purpose, but the Government will not prevent its being used for another purpose.

Many people say that, if people volunteer and receive a little money, they will not be charged under the Bill, so long as no one is taken to court and no information is passed on, as there has to be a complaint from the worker first. That is not so. The information will be gathered, and such working arrangements will become criminal. Workers will no longer be allowed to negotiate the pay they want—they will not be allowed to volunteer and receive a small amount of money. The Bill will make it illegal for employers to give a volunteer a little money out of the kindness of their hearts, even though the volunteer did not need it. It will force people to work for nothing if they have volunteered—unless they work for a minimum wage.

If the Government had introduced the two-clause Bill that we expected—a Bill that established a minimum wage at half male median earnings, to be increased over time to two-thirds median earnings through regulations—we could have understood where they were coming from, as that was their commitment. However, they have introduced a Bill which, not including all the new clauses, stretches to some 40 pages. We ask what the minimum wage will be, but it is not in the Bill—we cannot find it. We have all this complicated stuff—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. This is not a Second Reading debate. The hon. Gentleman must speak to the new clause.

Mr. Bruce: I was about to say that the Government have tabled all these new clauses and amendments, which the House is expected to take on trust. I hope that the Minister can show that she understands that does not mean proceedings taken under this Act.

"proceedings relating to this Act"

Mr. Lansley: Does my hon. Friend recognise that industry wants the compliance costs to be minimal? In some ways, industry might find it helpful if a body such as the Contributions Agency deals with the minimum wage as well as national insurance contributions. That is not possible at the moment, because the Government have not made up their mind which body should carry out those duties.

Mr. Bruce: That is an important point. Employers would welcome a single agency that dealt with everything—minimum wage, national insurance contributions, tax or whatever—and had one set of records. In fact, people could be prosecuted if information about them contained a mistake—the wrong figure in the wrong place—as all the agencies will be passing information between themselves. The costs of checking will be considerable.

If the Labour party really believed in its proposals, it would have introduced a two-clause Bill. Instead, the Government have sprung on the House, at this late hour, an enormous muddle with no real discussion. I know that even the Conservative Whips want me to sit down and say almost nothing, but I am trying to help the House to make progress. The Government want to implement their minimum wage proposals—perhaps, if we stay up a little longer, they will tell us what the minimum wage will be, so that we can say, "That is great. We can all go home now."

Mr. Bercow: I fear that my hon. Friend's last point is a triumph of optimism over experience, which leads me to ask where he saw those flying pigs.

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman makes his point far better than I could. I am an eternal optimist—that is why I am speaking to the new clause. I have the greatest respect and even fondness for the Minister, so I hope that she will make some real, positive efforts. I had to compliment her on bringing forward clear policies on information technology, but the ones that we are discussing now are not clear. They have been bounced on her by her officials—who are looking very amused—as they, not the Secretary of State, will be authorised to grab all the information; if their wives or husbands have disappeared, they will have access to all that information to find out where they are. The civil liberties lobby should examine the matter and the Government should put it out to proper consultation. We should reject the new clause.

Mr. Hammond: Many of the points that I wanted to make have already been raised by my hon. Friends, so we shall be able to proceed a little more speedily. However, there are still some outstanding matters that I want to raise.

One of the concerns that we expressed in Committee on record keeping and the passage of information related to the lack of symmetry between the requirement on an employer to maintain records that would be necessary to bring a prosecution under the Bill—and the penalties that he would suffer if he failed in that duty—and the lack of any requirement on a worker to keep relevant records.

It might at first glance seem that it is clearly the employer's responsibility to keep records, and in the case of most conventional employment, with the employee clocking on and off at the factory door, that is indeed so; but we agreed in Committee at an early stage that the problem areas that were likely to exercise officers appointed under the legislation concerned not such simple cases of traditional employment but, for example, piece work done by home workers.

Records kept by the home worker himself or herself will be essential to determine whether the minimum wage has been properly paid. The employer will have no way of knowing how many hours the home worker has put in. Following our discussions in Committee, I had hoped that the Government would introduce some changes to create a symmetry of obligation between employers and workers.

I am genuinely confused about another issue. Subsection (2) of the new clause says:

"Information to which this section applies vests in the Secretary of State."

I think that I understand what that means, but in almost all cases, the information in question will be held by an employer and transferred in its entirety to the Secretary of State. I imagine that the Secretary of State will have an exact copy of the employer's wages records, for example.

It is not clear from the wording of the new clause whether it is intended that the Secretary of State should have some ownership in the information that has passed via her officer to the Department of Trade and Industry, as distinct from the employer's original ownership in the information that he collated and maintained in his database. Can ownership of a record vest in two people; or must it, by vesting in the Secretary of State, have ceased to vest in the employer?

I repeat a plaintive cry that was often heard in Committee: I am not a lawyer. My understanding of these matters is only that of an informed—I hope—layman. The Minister is a lawyer, and will have a much clearer understanding of this rather technical issue.

Mr. Bercow: The question of ownership is crucial. If my hon. Friend is right, and the President of the Board of Trade becomes the exclusive owner of the information, what is there to prevent a future Parliament from amending the legislation to enable that information to be released to other bodies or persons for purposes unrelated to the enforcement of the national minimum wage?

Mr. Hammond: The possibilities are endless if the intention is that the Secretary of State should become the owner of the information. I accept that it would normally be unexceptionable for the Secretary of State to be the owner of information that his or her officers have gathered, but in this case, as I think the Minister would agree, the information is almost certainly a direct copy from the employer's records.

Who will own the information? Is there a distinction between owning the information passed to the DTI and owning the original information? What are the implications of the information vesting in the Secretary of State in terms of authorisation of its release? For example, would the original employer retain any rights to authorise the use of the data or their release to other parties? There may be a simple explanation, and if so, I look forward to hearing it.

I, too, have reservations about the possible implications under data protection legislation, but I think that my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) has covered that point adequately. I hope that the Minister will be able to reassure us both.

Can the Minister confirm that subsection (6) of the new clause would prevent the Secretary of State not only from transferring the information elsewhere, for purposes unconnected with the minimum wage, but from using it for such purposes within the Department? If she can, that would at least be reassuring as a statement of intent; but, in view of the Government's lamentable record in maintaining the English walls around their information, I am not entirely sure that the Chinese wall that we are invited to imagine being constructed within the DTI would give us as much reassurance as we would really like.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley): I hesitate to prolong the debate. The contribution of the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) was slightly more to the point, but that of the hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) was nit-picking in the extreme. We are clearly being invited to stay here all night, and Government Members are entirely happy to do that.

Anyone would think that such a situation had never arisen before, but plenty of legislation has been enacted in which there has been a crossover of information. An example of such legislation received Royal Assent just months before the Conservative party went into opposition: the Social Security Administration (Fraud) Act 1997. Under that Act, there was a crossover of information between the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise for the purpose of checking the accuracy of information relating to benefits contributions or national insurance numbers.

Mr. Lansley: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Judy Mallaber: No, I want to make progress.

Such a crossover is fairly common. It is nothing new.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will the hon. Lady give way, as she mentioned me?

Judy Mallaber: Very well.

Mr. Bruce: I am grateful to the hon. Lady, but I think that she has been taken in by the Labour party's propaganda. We are not an arrogant party. We know the problems that such transfers have caused in the past. We have never before managed to get the introduction of such new powers right with only 10 minutes' discussion.

Judy Mallaber: I am not sure whether there is anything for me to reply to in that intervention.

When we were discussing in Committee the need for a single minimum rate, I spoke of the need for simplicity and clarity, to prevent us from having a plethora of enforcement procedures, with masses of inspectors and cumbersome policing mechanisms; but we also need effective implementation, which will be impossible if information is coming in from different sources.

It is not surprising that we have not yet laid out fully who will be responsible for enforcement, because that will need to be done by different agencies for different purposes. We need to be able to bring the information together.

Mr. Lansley: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Judy Mallaber: No, I will not give way again, as I want to make some progress.

In police series, it may make for wonderful television to have different parts of the force hiding information from one another, with secrecies and jealousies, but that does not work very well in real life. Different agencies will collect the information we need, and to have sensible enforcement, we must be able to pull it together. That is what we are determined to achieve.

New clause 2 is essential so that information can be passed from one agency to another. That is sensible and necessary if the legislation is to work properly. In Committee, Conservative Members made it clear that they disliked intensely the principle behind the Bill. They said that they could never agree about the morality of legislation to overcome the immorality of poverty pay.

Mr. Hammond: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Judy Mallaber: I wish to move on. I took many interventions in Committee, and I did not have anything to reply to after the intervention by the hon. Member for South Dorset.

We all know that Conservative Members are not happy with the principle of the Bill, because they do not want to get rid of poverty wages and they do not believe in our economic arguments. They did, at least, assure us in Committee that they sought to make the Bill work properly. New clause 2 is an essential part of the enforcement mechanism of the Bill, and we should agree it.

Mr. Lansley: I was prompted to contribute to the debate by a comment made by my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce), but having listened to the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber), I must take up one or two issues. She asserted with great confidence that new clause 2 is an essential aspect of the enforcement mechanism of the Bill. It is surprising, therefore, with her membership of the Standing Committee and her knowledge of the Bill, that she did not table a suitable amendment in Committee. She did not say that something was missing from the Bill. She did not say that she knew from her study of the social security administration legislation introduced before the election that a mechanism was needed to control the flow of information between Government Departments. She did not say that, because Ministers did not tell her to say that. Ministers seem to have recently discovered the need for such a mechanism, but I wonder how essential it is.

When the Minister replies, she should tell us which legislation would apply to the acquisition and control of information by Government Departments in pursuance of the provisions of the Bill if new clause 2 were not agreed. I suspect that some perfectly good legislation might apply to the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset made an interesting reference to that point. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] He will be back with us and he will read the report of the debate. Legislation exists to govern the control of information by Government Departments.

Mr. Boswell: Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be possible in principle to designate, for example, an agricultural wages inspector as an officer under clause 13 of the Bill for the purposes of the national minimum wage? Once such a designation had taken place, the transfer of information would be easier.

Mr. Lansley: Yes, it would. However, I am not sure how that would help, because the agricultural wages inspectorate could not be responsible for the entire enforcement procedure across other industries. We must still address the problem caused by the fact that more than one agency will be involved.

We all approach new clause 2 with some humility, because we have not been supplied with notes on clauses, as we were in Committee when they gave us information about the structure of clauses and their purpose before we began our debate. Without new clause 2, adequate legislation would still exist to ensure that Government agencies, which had acquired information for whatever purpose, should not use it for another purpose and should not transfer it to another Government agency. Therefore, why have the Government tabled new clause 2?

The answer may lie in a comment made by the hon. Member for Amber Valley when she mentioned the involvement of more than one agency. Although it would appear that the whole exercise could be accomplished by one agency—for example, the Contributions Agency, which has a wide remit and relates to everyone who would be covered by the national minimum wage—I suspect that it would be convenient for more than one agency to be used. For example, as my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) pointed out, the agricultural wages inspectorate would seem the logical choice for scrutiny and enforcement of the minimum wage in agriculture.

If more than one agency were involved in enforcement, information would have to be exchanged between the different agencies and Government bodies. I suspect that the existing legislation is restrictive and that the transfer of information about the national minimum wage between different agencies may be difficult to accomplish without specific legislation to allow it. New clause 2 will enable the Government to set aside the more restrictive existing legislation and to choose the appropriate agency to pursue information.

Far from new clause 2 meaning stricter enforcement, it is a device to suit the Government's intentions. I make that claim because the hon. Member for Amber Valley mentioned previous legislation and gave as an example legislation on social security administration and the elimination of fraud. She thus illustrated the problem—in previous legislation, Governments rightly referred to specific agencies that had a specific power to transfer between themselves information about their specific responsibilities. The Government have failed to reveal which officers in which agencies will be appointed to be responsible for the enforcement of the national minimum wage. Will it be the Contributions Agency, the agricultural wages inspectorate, the Inland Revenue, Customs and Excise or some other body, or will officers be appointed for that purpose alone?

New clause 2 is a consequence of the Government's failure to specify which officers and which agencies will be responsible for the enforcement of the Bill. That is why the Government will give themselves a wider power than has been enacted in previous legislation. That is a cause for concern, because the civil libertarian anxiety is that Government agencies that are only tangentially related to the purpose of the Bill may acquire some trivial information and use it for their wider purposes. I am sure that that is not what is intended by new clause 2, but that is the civil libertarian concern. To remove that concern, the Government must be explicit about who will get the data and for what purpose.

Mr. Ian Bruce: If the Government wanted a Bill that allowed them to transfer information because they were going to take proceedings under it, they would specify "proceedings taken under the Act", instead of "relating to the Act". The Government are giving themselves power to take criminal proceedings against persons on anything to do with wages or income, and not only on the national minimum wage.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend is testing my ingenuity on the reason behind new clause 2. I shall not attempt to answer that intervention, but shall leave it for the Minister when she winds up.

I wish to raise a second point, which was my original purpose in seeking to contribute to the debate. My speech thus far was prompted by the contribution by the hon. Member for Amber Valley, which shows the value of contributions by Government Back Benchers. Even if we do not agree with them, we are prompted to cover points more adequately. Earlier, the Minister of State made it clear that many of the changes to the Bill that had not previously been contemplated by the Government were prompted by the need to bring it into line with other legislation. I wonder whether this is such a case.

How does the Minister foresee the interplay between the new clause and the prospective freedom of information legislation, which has an impact rather different from the data protection legislation to which my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset referred? If such information is to be passed between public bodies, and hence out of the private domain and into the domain of the public sector—not into the public domain as such—it raises the question, in respect of information held by Government bodies to which freedom of information legislation will apply, of the extent to which the legislation will allow access to the information; I hope that it will be not at the level of the individual, but at the level of the firm, industry or sector.

Will the structure of the new clause, perhaps inadvertently, act as a constraint on the use of information? What would happen if the Government wanted to publish the data relating to the take-up of the minimum wage and the relationship between wages and the level of the minimum wage? There will be considerable academic as well as industrial interest in the application of a national minimum wage to an economy that has not hitherto been subject to one to anything like the same extent.

To what extent will Ministers be able to supply, or be constrained from supplying, information at industrial, sectoral or regional level by aggregating data acquired for the purposes of the national minimum wage? If the Government collect and publish information in aggregate, will it be passed outside Departments and into the public domain? That is not, on the face of it, contemplated under the new clause. Can the Minister refer us to some saving measure to show that there is no constraint on the publication of data aggregated for the purpose of elaborating the impact of the national minimum wage?

Mr. Bercow: I am moved to comment principally by the contribution of the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber). It would be an understatement to say that I was saddened and disappointed by her speech. We spent many hours in Committee debating important matters. I hope that she will not take it amiss if I say that she made some of the most thoughtful contributions.

It is in no spirit of hostility that I observe that I was struck by the inadequacy of the hon. Lady's reasoning in backing the Government. In a fit of what looked and sounded like irritation, she said that new clause 2 was essential for the implementation and effective enforcement of the national minimum wage. With that throwaway line, she seemed to suggest that she had obviated the need for further rational argument about the merits of new clause 2, on which several of my hon. Friends made important comments. In short, she appeared to suggest that the ends justify the means. She had not even thought of the need for it, but now she prays in aid her wisdom on the subject. She said nothing about the information provisions previously, but she is now satisfied with what the Government propose. We have several legitimate and serious objections, to which it would be nice to think that the Minister will feel obliged to respond.

As my hon. Friends have made several important points, I shall confine myself to two. The first relates to new clause 2(5), which specifies that information supplied under subsection (4)

"shall not be supplied by the recipient to any other person or body unless it is supplied for the purposes of any civil or criminal proceedings relating to this Act".

That is as may be, but it is not clear what recourse or redress employers have in the event that information supplied to the Secretary of State or another relevant authority is leaked to another relevant authority or, worse, into the public domain, with or without the authorisation of the Secretary of State, maliciously or non-maliciously.

I hope that the Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry will be able to tell me that I have no cause for concern and that employers in such circumstances will have redress and be able to go to law; that a remedy will be available to them. She is a decent and civilised human being and an effective exponent of the Government's case. She is also a lawyer and knows the importance of rights of redress for those whose rights have been infringed.

My question does not require elaboration. If an employer suffers from the release into the public domain or to another relevant authority information that is damaging to his business or him individually and that release is improper, unauthorised or even malicious, will he be able to secure some redress, compensation or recognition of the fact of wrongdoing by the Government Department or other relevant authority or whoever?

Mr. Hammond: I have listened carefully to my hon. Friend's argument. It is a question not only of the Government Department, other relevant department or whoever, but whether an injured party would have redress against the recipient who had leaked the information and whether, separately, he would have redress against a Secretary of State who had originally made the information available.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. It is of the essence that an employer who has been offended against in such a way should have a right of redress against the Secretary of State, even if the Secretary of State himself or herself had not authorised the release of the information. If the Secretary of State had authorised the information, albeit with no malicious intent, there has ultimately to be an acceptance of responsibility. Nowhere is it more appropriate in the implementation of legislation than in such cases that the Secretary of State should take responsibility. Whether it is a junior departmental official or a senior spin doctor, deliberately or accidentally, with or without authority, ultimately an individual should have redress. The Secretary of State should be held accountable for the inappropriate conduct.

My hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) also raised the important question of the entitlement of the employer who has been offended against to secure redress from others to whom the information has been leaked. Morally, the employer offended against should be so entitled, but, practically, it is doubtful whether it would be possible to secure such redress.

I mentioned, among others, the scenario of the release of information into the public domain. In referring to the public domain, I refer to the likelihood of the information appearing in the media. It is then potentially in the minds of hundreds of thousands, if not tens of millions, of people. It seems improbable that the wronged, possibly aggrieved, employer would be able to secure redress against millions of people, although his grievance would be none the less serious for that.

Mr. Hammond: It occurs to me that, although the new clause creates an absolute prohibition on a party who has received information from the Secretary of State passing it on for purposes other than those relating to the Act, it says nothing about the sanction to which such a person would be subject. Might it not be better if the Secretary of State, when making such information available, entered into a restrictive agreement—a contractual arrangement—which might stipulate entitlement to monetary or liquidated damages if the information was passed into the wrong hands, thus making it a matter of contract between the Secretary of State and the recipient if anything went wrong?

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend is making a worthy attempt, albeit relatively late in the day, to improve the likely consequences of the legislation. However, I am sure that he agrees that it would be preferable that, rather than facilitating such contracts in future, the Bill itself were amended specifically to provide for redress in the circumstances I have described or in similar circumstances. It should not be necessary for the Secretary of State subsequently to have to enter into particular contractual arrangements with others to whom she passes the information acquired. It ought to be stated on the face of the Bill that there is a prohibition on the release of the information to third parties, and that there is a sanction in the event of that release of information.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Despite the fear that I shall again be described as nit-picking, I should like to comment on the fact that, having received information from the Secretary of State, one is able to pass it on for the purpose of any civil proceedings. In the English language, civil proceedings do not necessarily take place in front of a court. When reading the phrase "civil or criminal proceedings", one tends to think that they will take place in a courtroom, but one can argue that a solicitor having been given the information and then selling it for a profit to a trade union with an interest in the legislation is "civil proceedings".

Mr. Bercow: I am exceptionally grateful to my hon. Friend, because he has picked a useful nit—indeed, his reputation for doing so is legendary and entirely justified. There is a danger of the information being used in that way, and if, as is possible, the Minister thinks that it is unlikely to arise, I should be grateful if she would explain why. More particularly, I should appreciate her saying what she would think of a circumstance of the sort my hon. Friend describes. Does she believe, as I suspect some Government supporters do, that that is simply an unfortunate but acceptable by-product of a worthy piece of legislation?

I should be saddened if the Minister took that view, because she does not have the gaze of the fanatic about her. That is not a comment I could make of several of her right hon. and hon. Friends, who undoubtedly think that all is justified in the service of the wider goal of the national minimum wage. We are concerned with the respect for rights and, in so far as rights are not safeguarded on the face of the Bill, does the Minister accept that there will be people genuinely concerned about the possibility of abuse? I hope that she does accept that and that she will respond to the point.

I should say that, in respect of the Minister, to whom legislation does not refer—it refers, quite properly, to the Secretary of State—I have no qualms, concerns or anxiety at all. I do not wish to drive any more nails into her political coffin, but I regard her as a person of the utmost propriety and integrity. I am not even concerned about the way in which the current President of the Board of Trade might use the information. However, more dastardly figures might arise in future who would use and abuse the information for malign purposes, the effect of which would be to damage individual employers.

The second feature of the new clause to which I want to refer is subsection (6), which states:

"This section does not limit the circumstances in which information may be supplied or used apart from this section."

It is precisely the vagueness and ambiguity of that terminology which gives me cause for concern, and I invite the House to consider the possibility that it lays us open to an abuse. If there are Labour Members, other than those sitting on the Treasury Bench, who know precisely what is to be interpreted by those words and who are able now, via an intervention, to disarm me and to demonstrate beyond peradventure that subsection (6) is entirely innocuous, I shall be happy to hear from them.

It would not be reasonable for those sitting on the Treasury Bench to rise to defend subsection (6), for, if they do so, all the Labour Back Benchers will sheepishly follow their lead and profess that, although they are most grateful to their hon. Friend the Minister for explaining matters for the benefit of me and my right hon. and hon. Friends, they knew that information anyway and were always aware that it was a perfectly satisfactory and harmless subsection. I issue an invitation to a Labour Back Bencher to state explicitly what subsection (6) means—that is the first challenge; the second is to explain why that subsection is innocuous and why I have no grounds for fearing its possible abuse, to the detriment of perfectly decent people in future.

I am veritably staggered—nay, I would be veritably staggered, were it not for experience of Labour Back Benchers—to discover this sudden reticence by which they have been afflicted. At the very moment that I hoped a Labour Back Bencher—I notice some experienced Members among those present—might spring to his or her feet to reassure me what an innocuous subsection subsection (6) is, none of them chooses to do so. All refrain from doing so: they remain seated; they have nothing to say; they are duly embarrassed; they are unable to offer a defence of, or to give their explicit and vocal support for, subsection (6). On the basis of their reticence, I am even more concerned now than I was before I issued the invitation.

I repeat, for the benefit of Labour Members, that subsection (6) states:

"This section does not limit the circumstances in which information may be supplied or used apart from this section."

I give the House one illustration of a scenario in which the information may be used for purposes unrelated to the purposes of the clause, and I invite Labour Members to respond to this scenario. I am not saying that the scenario is bound to occur, or that it is even probable that it will occur; I simply submit for the consideration of the House the possibility that it might occur, and I invite Labour Members to comment.

The scenario is this: wholly unrelated to the implementation of the provisions of the National Minimum Wage Act, as the Bill will shortly become,

Ministers of the Crown, for the purposes of what might be described as a name-and-shame policy, choose to release to other relevant authorities or even into the public domain, or allow to be released into the public domain by junior officials or indeed senior spin doctors, information about the employment and wage-paying practices of particular companies. That is potentially a purpose for which subsection (6) could be used; the subsection entitles the use of information for purposes other than those provided for in the clause.

Mr. Hammond: I have been following closely my hon. Friend's interesting and detailed argument; his point may be even stronger than he realises, in that subsection (3) would appear specifically to authorise the Secretary of State to use the information for that purpose, it being a purpose relating to the Act—it does not require the purpose to relate to proceedings or a prosecution under the Act, but merely that the purpose should relate to the Act.

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. As he was intervening, I looked at subsection (3) again, and I am happy to concede that he could be right. As my hon. Friend would expect, I was erring on the side of generosity and I had not focused on the words "relating to this Act" as intently as my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) had done. I had slipped into what was probably the error of thinking that the words "relating to this Act" were innocuous. My hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset has already explained why they might very well not be innocuous and could be used and abused for malign purposes by people acting under the authority of the Act.

Mr. Ian Bruce: May I let the House into a little secret? I knew an investigative journalist who, a few years ago, was attempting to embarrass the Labour party by finding out how much each Labour Member was paying his or her research assistant, as it was general knowledge that people volunteered and worked for peanuts. The journalist could not discover the information in sufficient detail to publish it, but, under the Act, inspectors could release that information to journalists because it relates to the Act.

Mr. Bercow: If ever there were a good reason for the Government to reconsider their position and recognise the dangers of the existing wording of the clause, my hon. Friend has, in a thoroughly charitable fashion, provided it. I might have hoped that the cause of the national interest, the merits of the case for individual companies and the simple issue of natural justice would cause the Government to rethink, but we are dealing with new Labour, and it is over-optimistic to expect those virtues to come to the fore.

I note that seated at the back of the Chamber are two hon. Ladies—the hon. Members for Preston (Audrey Wise) and for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones)—who are definitely not members of new Labour. It may be that, in relation to the new clause, those hon. Ladies' natural sense of fair play, their preoccupation with justice and the cause of individual and civil rights will come to the fore. Perhaps, when I have concluded my observations, one of them will enthusiastically rise to her feet to agree with what I have said.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset must understand that the Government will not be motivated to shift in our direction for any reason other than self-interest. The prospect that the policies that Labour Members, and perhaps even Labour Ministers, use to pay their own researchers could cease to be a closely guarded secret and could, instead, be dangerously released into the public domain and covered by national newspapers should give them pause for thought.

My anxiety has been simply stated. I fear that subsection (6) and, possibly, as I happily concede to my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge, subsection (3) could be used for propaganda purposes, which would damage particular companies, entrepreneurs and individual business men who might have fallen foul of the lieutenants of new Labour. That is particularly serious, because information could be released into the public domain that not only damaged certain employers, but did so wrongfully.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I hope that he will forgive me if I anticipate a point that he is about to make. We need to know from the Minister whether the Government intend to publish data specifically relating to employers to whom enforcement notices have been issued, because, under the Act, such notices may be issued without the employers having any right to make representations.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend makes a valid point, and I hope that the Ministers present will heed it.

Mr. Hammond: Further to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), it strikes me that the information would not even be subject to the limited safeguards of the new clause, because the information would not have been obtained by an officer, but would have come from the officer's own records, which he had created in the course of his duties. Therefore, there would be no protection.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend makes an equally valid point. The danger is that information will be released into the public domain that wrongfully damages particular employers. That might happen because the information about, for example, enforcement notices or penalty notices is incorrect. The possibility of error exists—Ministers have acknowledged that in providing for defences in the context of enforcement notices and penalty notices—

Mr. Lansley: But not in respect of themselves.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend wryly observes that, although Ministers have acknowledged the possibility of error, they have not done so in respect of themselves. He makes a fair point. In fairness, Ministers have acknowledged the possibility of error in respect of an officer issuing an enforcement notice or a penalty notice. The information may be incorrect and, subsequently, it may be successfully contested by an employer. If it is, it will be clear beyond doubt that the information was wrong and that the enforcement or penalty notice should not have been issued.

If, however, acting under subsection (6), the information that has been compiled is used for a purpose unrelated to the Act, before the employer has had the opportunity to clear his name and demonstrate that the enforcement or penalty notice should not have been issued, the damage will have been done. That is why I ask the Minister, in all sincerity, whether she accepts the possibility—not the probability or the likelihood—of abuse.

Mr. Syms: There is also the issue whether the enforcement notice is a private matter between the officer and the company—and therefore open to negotiation or the free flow of information—or a public notice, in which case the employer may well be condemned without having done anything wrong.

Mr. Bercow: What might start as a private notice could cease to be private after a short period. In Standing Committee, I raised the possibility of information being leaked, perhaps to people with a vested interest in its use, not just to Joe Bloggs who is wholly uninterested in the circumstances. The information could be leaked—either deliberately or accidentally—to somebody with a vested interest in doing down a business rival. The circumstance to which my hon. Friend referred is perfectly capable of arising and, if it did, it would be extremely serious.

Mr. Hammond: Will my hon. Friend acknowledge that a particular circumstance has been of concern to Conservative Members throughout the Bill's consideration? It would arise when an employer failed to pay any wages and, under the legislation, enforcement proceedings were taken because that failure constituted, as it certainly would, a failure to pay the minimum wage. Failure to pay wages could signal that something was wrong in the business and that information could be of great value to competitors. Does my hon. Friend agree that, in those circumstances, employers would be right to be concerned about the possible leakage of such information into the public domain?

Mr. Bercow: In such circumstances, the release of information would be damaging and unfair in equal measure. If a company were in the gravest difficulty and had not paid the minimum wage simply because a cash flow crisis prevented it from doing so, it would be serious if those difficulties were compounded by the release of information into the public domain, possibly for use against the company by a business rival.

I conclude by asking the Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry—as I have already done a number of times during my speech, eloquently aided and abetted by my hon. Friends—the following question: what is the redress? She is a courteous debater, and I hope that she accepts that in no sense are we seeking to frustrate progress on the Bill by discussing these important issues. The Minister of State is always good fun and good sport, but he has a rather nagging and downmarket tendency to resort to his usual attack that we are making these points just to stop the Bill.

In full view of hon. Members on both sides of the House, I say to the Under-Secretary, graciously and without hint of grudge, that she will get her Bill. I wish to ensure that people do not suffer as a result of the inappropriate exercise of power, which is a legitimate anxiety and a proper preoccupation of hon. Members, whatever their political affiliation. I should be most grateful for the Under-Secretary's response to the points that I have made.

7.30 pm

Mrs. Roche: This has been an amazing, surreal debate. It started well; the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) was so reasonable and made a good response to my opening remarks. I thought that I had been reasonable in my opening remarks, but I have learnt my lesson. I thank Conservative Members for their great contribution to my parliamentary reputation among my colleagues. I am not sure what sort of service they have done me—

Mr. Ian McCartney: We do not believe them.

Mrs. Roche: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that comment; I must be doing all right.

I agree with the hon. Member for Daventry that, as I said earlier, a balance must be struck between confidentiality and ensuring that the enforcement procedure is right. We want to ensure that the procedure is right; representations were made on that point by hon. Members on both sides in Committee. We started from the premise that the great majority of employers would want to enforce the Bill, and that proper procedures would have to be put in place to ensure such enforcement and to ensure that there would be no abuses.

I shall deal with points that were pertinent to the new clause and the amendments. Hon. Members mentioned unauthorised and improper disclosures. Improper disclosures by Government Departments will be dealt with in the strongest possible terms under internal disciplinary procedures. The previous Government rightly put in place procedures to deal with improper disclosure of information that employers must lodge with the Government, and exactly the same procedures will apply under the Bill.

The hon. Member for Daventry, who is not in his place, asked an interesting question about court proceedings. The hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) asked about civil proceedings—a narrow phrase which covers proceedings that are related to enforcement rights under the Act.

Mr. Ian Bruce: The Under-Secretary used the words that I wanted to hear. Why does the new clause use the words "relating to this Act", and not "under the Act"? Those phrases are so different.

Mrs. Roche: I do not see any difference—it is a term of art—and I assure the hon. Gentleman that he should see no sinister purpose whatever.

The hon. Members for South Dorset and for Daventry asked about misuse of information by the recipient. The normal injunction procedure, which is well known, should usually prevent misuse of information. Information given in open court may already be in the public domain. In that regard, the Bill does not differ from previous legislation.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset questioned me about the words "under the Act" and "relating to this Act", and I have been thinking about that question since he asked it. The Bill will amend legislation such as the Agricultural Wages Act 1948, the Employment Rights Act 1996 and other legislation. Will proceedings take place under the amended legislation and not under the Act, although they will relate to the Act?

Mrs. Roche: The hon. Gentleman was a member of the Standing Committee. He will be aware that the Bill amends other legislation to ensure that the legislation is coherent and consistent. The Bill has been drafted carefully to cover proceedings that are related to the Act. There will be two parallel systems, one of which will deal with agricultural wages legislation. The Bill is consistent on that matter.

My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber) made an important point and greatly assisted our deliberations. She pointed out that the Conservative Government enacted legislation to make such exchanges of information possible. I did not read press reports of great rebellions by Conservative Members when that was taking place.

Mr. Lansley rose—

Mrs. Roche: No, I will not give way; I must make progress.

The hon. Member for South Dorset made a remark with which I must take issue straight away. He said that officials were looking amused. Hon. Members well know that officials are never amused; they are absolutely correct at all times.

The hon. Member for South Dorset asked about the grade of officials who will make decisions about vesting authority and about authorising officials to act. As with all other legislation, under the Bill—the hon. Gentleman agreed with this—decisions will be made by officials of the appropriate grade.

Mr. Ian Bruce: The Under-Secretary is a friendly boss, which is why she amuses her civil servants, but is it not important to discover whether decisions will be made at an operational level, at which point the person who collects information is authorised by the Secretary of State to pass it on to anybody else, or at a more senior grade? Someone of an appropriate grade may be at the lowest level, as the Under-Secretary has said.

Mrs. Roche: I hope that the hon. Gentleman accepts—I am choosing my words carefully—that appropriate level means exactly that. Sensitive information has to be dealt with properly. The new clause is narrowly drawn. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we want the matter to be dealt with in a way that is good for the employer and for the employee.

The hon. Member for South Dorset also mentioned the Child Support Agency and in-work benefits. Tempted though I am to discuss them, I feel that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would stop me if I did so.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) asked about information, the use of the word "vests" and ownership. The intention is that information obtained by officials for the purpose of the Act should be treated as held by the Secretary of State. No other effect is intended. The information will not cease to vest with the employer; it could not do so, because the employer would still own the original information. The wording is drawn narrowly because information about sensitive matters is being passed.

Mr. Bercow: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs. Roche: No, I must make progress.

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) asked about the purpose of the clauses. They are meant to clarify the enforcement provisions. As I said when I spoke earlier about the contribution by my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley, the model for the provisions is the arrangement in the Social Security Administration (Fraud) Act 1997, which was passed by the previous Administration. They managed to make a contribution to our deliberations on the Bill.

Mr. Lansley: Does the Minister accept that the example that she has given specified the agencies that were to collect information on behalf of the Government and the other agencies to which information should be passed? It is specific, not general.

Mrs. Roche: I said when I spoke to the new clauses and the amendments that they were contingency measures because we are waiting for the recommendations on enforcement by the Low Pay Commission. There is nothing sinister in that. I am being frank with the House.

The new clauses and the amendments will assist in the enforcement of the Bill. The measure is warmly welcomed by the majority of hon. Members and by the country. It demands proper enforcement procedures, and I commend the new clauses and the amendments to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time. and added to the Bill.

New clause 3

INFORMATION OBTAINED BY AGRICULTURAL WAGES OFFICERS

'.—(1) This section applies to information which has been obtained by an officer acting for the purposes of any of the agricultural wages legislation and which is held by a relevant authority.

(2) Information to which this section applies may, with the authorisation of the relevant authority, be supplied to the Secretary of State for use for any purpose relating to this Act.

(3) Information supplied under subsection (2) above may be supplied by the recipient to any government department or other body if—

(a) arrangements made between the recipient and that department or body under section 13(1)(b) above are in force; and

(b) the information is supplied for any purpose relating to this Act.

(4) Except as provided by subsection (3) above, information supplied under subsection (2) or (3) above—

(a) shall not be supplied by the recipient to any other person or body unless it is supplied for the purposes of any civil or criminal proceedings relating to this Act; and

(b) shall not be supplied in those circumstances without the authorisation of the relevant authority.

(5) This section does not limit the circumstances in which information may be supplied or used apart from this section.

(6) In this section—

"the agricultural wages legislation" means—

(a) the Agricultural Wages Act 1948;

(b) the Agricultural Wages (Scotland) Act 1949; and

(c) the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1977;

"relevant authority" means—

(a) in relation to information obtained by an officer acting in England, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food;

(b) in relation to information obtained by an officer acting in Wales, the Minister of the Crown with the function of appointing officers under section 12 of the Agricultural Wages Act 1948 in relation to Wales;

(c) in relation to information obtained by an officer acting in Scotland, the Minister of the Crown with the function of appointing officers under section 12 of the Agricultural Wages (Scotland) Act 1949; and

(d) in relation to information obtained by an officer acting in Northern Ireland, the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland.'.—[Mr. Robert Ainsworth.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 4

COMPANY DIRECTORS

'.—A person who is a director of a limited company does not qualify for the national minimum wage in respect of that employment.'.—[Mr. Lansley.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Lansley: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 5—Directors of companies—

'.—A person who is a director of a company is not entitled to the national minimum wage in respect of his or her employment by that company.'.

New clause 10—Exclusion of severely incapacitated persons—

'.—(1) The Secretary of State may, after consultation with the Low Pay Commission, make an order exempting incapacitated persons from the provisions of this Act.

(2) An order under subsection (1) above shall provide for the issue of permits by the Secretary of State to those persons whom he believes to be incapacitated and may make provision for—

(a) the procedure for applying for and issuing such permits;

(b) the procedure for establishing the minimum wage to which each permit holder shall be entitled (being less than the single hourly rate prescribed under section 1(3) of this Act);

(c) the appointment by the Secretary of State of suitably qualified persons to assess such applications; and

(d) the procedure for appealing against a refusal to issue such a permit

(3) No person shall be guilty of an offence under this Act in respect of an employee who holds a permit issued in accordance with an order made under this section.

(4) For the purposes of this section, a person is incapacitated if he is so affected by physical injury or mental deficiency or infirmity due to age or any other cause as to be incapable of earning the national minimum wage.'.

Amendment No. 70, in clause 1, page 1, line 14, leave out from '(c)' to end of line and add

'is over the age of 18 years'.

Amendment No. 79, in clause 3, page 2, line 42, leave out '26' and insert '18'

Government amendment No. 21.

Amendment No. 53, in clause 4, page 3, line 10 after 'State', insert

'acting on the advice of the Low Pay Commission'.

Government amendment No. 22.

Amendment No. 54, in page 3, line 11 after 'descriptions', insert 'or deleting existing descriptions.'

Government amendment No. 23.

Mr. Lansley: Hon. Members will note that the group includes some amendments and new clauses relating to different issues. New clause 4 directly reflects the substance of new clause 5, but is expressed slightly differently. I am sure that hon. Members will wish to elaborate on the new clause and the amendments.

The new clause seeks to exclude from qualifying for the national minimum wage those who are employed by companies of which they are directors. Its purpose is straightforward. It became abundantly clear in Committee that, elsewhere in the legislation, the Government took pains to assure the Committee that the Bill did not intend to treat as qualifying for the minimum wage people who were genuinely self-employed. I shall not enter into the debate about what constitutes genuine self-employment, because we have had several debates on that.

If it is agreed that the Government are right in their intention that self-employed people should not qualify for the minimum wage, it would serve us well to understand why. If people are employed, or are workers who have a contract with another person, the Government say that that person should be constrained to pay the national minimum wage. However, the Bill does not intend to constrain people to pay themselves the national minimum wage. There would be all kinds of absurdities and perversities if that were so. Self-employed people would have to pay themselves the minimum wage, although that might cause the business to fail or, in some curious way, they would have to treat the resources of the business as separate from their own resources. Those are strange outcomes, and in the context of the Bill it is right to exclude the self-employed from the national minimum wage.

The argument proceeds directly to those who are directors of companies, in that, acting corporately, such people have the ability to determine their own pay. The new clause has been introduced with that in mind.

Speaking not legally but substantively, there are two kinds of directors, and we all recognise them in practice. There are directors of large companies and directors of small companies, and it may be argued that the former do not necessarily determine their own pay. It may be determined by a remuneration committee of the board of directors, which may include non-executive directors, and it could be said that executive directors might somehow run the risk of the corporate board paying them less than the national minimum wage. We should treat that as technically correct but substantively pointless, because the majority of directors of large companies will be paid well in excess of the national minimum wage, and no benefit is served by seeking to ensure their inclusion in qualifying status.

Quite a different practice applies to the directors of smaller companies, who are much more numerous. They will determine what they are to be paid by the business of which they are directors.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I do not want to nit-pick, but I think that my hon. Friend is wrong in excluding that group. In a company in which a body of people decides a director's pay, the director may, because the company is doing badly, volunteer to take no pay that year. In that event, his company could be prosecuted because he was doing what Labour Members say fat cats should do when they do not make a profit, which is not to take any pay.

Mr. Lansley: In practice I do not think that we disagree on that. Whether the company is large or small, its directors have a responsibility to it. It is not simply that they may choose not to take a salary that is equivalent to the national minimum wage—which might apply in a small company in straitened circumstances—because, as directors, they may have a legal responsibility not to do so. For maintaining the company's business, it may be necessary for them not to extract profits and pay themselves salaries above a certain level in pursuance of their wider responsibility to the company as a corporate body.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend's comments about the directors of small companies are especially pertinent in the light of the information that we discussed in Committee. My hon. Friend will recall that that information related to the evidence that the take-home pay of many small business men is lower than that of many of their staff.

Mr. Lansley: That is right, but I shall not replay the Committee debate on small businesses in general. Many of the arguments in that debate apply a fortiori to directors of small companies who determine their own pay. By incorporation and by becoming directors, they are often seeking to create a growing business. Often in those early years—I am reasonably familiar with it; I know that my right hon. and hon. Friends are at least as familiar with the process as I am—withdrawals from the business are necessarily very modest, and may at certain points fall below the national minimum wage level.

That is one reason why low-income statistics are often distorted to an extent by people who draw apparently very low incomes. They may, for example—I know this well from constituency experience, as other hon. Members will—have been in reasonably well-paid employment and have left it to start up their own business; they are either self-employed or they form their own company and are directors of that company. For some period, perhaps two or three years, they take virtually no income from that business, because they are establishing it.

Of course, perversely, those people appear in income statistics to have little income, but they have a certain amount of expenditure. Of course, that is because they are maintaining their expenditure out of assets—their personal assets, as it were—while the business is building up by virtue of their desire to turn it into a growing company.

The perversity of the Bill is that, at that moment, as directors of the company, their intentions may be frustrated by a legal obligation—regardless of their desire as directors—to withdraw money from the business to pay it to themselves as individuals. I will not elaborate, but I know from discussions with my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), who will explain it better than I, that tax consequences may flow from an obligation to withdraw money out of a loss-making business to pay wages. From the tax point of view, it may be perverse to force directors to do that.

New clause 4 has been tabled in pursuance of the Government's aim in relation to the self-employed. [Interruption.] It is desirable in relation to small businesses, and it is particularly apposite in relation to company directors.

Mr. Ian Bruce: As my hon. Friend is concentrating so hard on his speech—and the examples that he has given have all applied to me personally—I wonder whether he heard Labour Members mutter and say that he was completely wrong. If the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) does not believe us, I shall show him the accounts.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend helps me, because I was concentrating on addressing my remarks to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I was not able to pay attention to what was said by Labour Members, but everything that I have said has been directly borne out by the personal experience, if not my own, then that of persons I have met in my constituency or in my time as deputy director-general of the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, where I had the privilege to serve directly many people who had started a business, and had gone through precisely the processes that I have described, often deriding in the process the cosy analyses of Government Departments, of whatever political persuasion—before I am chided by Labour Members—for which the risk of failure is often measured in terms of being moved sideways to a different job. For a small business, the risk of failure is measured in terms of the loss of one's home, all one's security and much for which one might have worked for many years.

Mr. Syms: I am following my hon. Friend's arguments carefully, and he makes a persuasive point. Often a husband and wife start a small business. Both may be committed to it. One of them, sometimes the wife, who may do the book-keeping, may not derive a full salary, and that may cause a problem.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. By virtue of an earlier new clause, the spouse of someone who is, let us say, the more active director in a small business that is starting up could hardly be treated as a volunteer in that business; the new clause would not allow such a thing. That person could not contract out of the national minimum wage, because a later clause in the Bill forbids it, so, although a company is required to have two directors, the second director may of necessity be treated as an employee or worker for the purposes of the legislation, and be paid a national minimum wage.

Then it becomes a question of record keeping and all that goes with it, even if the hours worked are deemed to be relatively few. Many people who are starting up small businesses already feel that the burden of record-keeping to which they are required to pay attention is great. There will be a serious difficulty in terms of the constraints to pay those persons who are involved a particular withdrawal from the business and in terms of record keeping. However, incorporation itself brings all the disadvantages that are associated with having to make withdrawals from the business, to pay a certain wage, to keep records, which is perhaps at least as difficult, and to make returns on those records to an enforcement officer, who acts on behalf of the Secretary of State.

All that acts as a perverse disincentive to incorporation, when in recent years so much effort has gone into ensuring that business decisions are as much as possible taken for reasons associated with that business itself, rather than by virtue simply of the Government's actions. However, this is another set of actions by Government which may lead to an obstacle falling between a self-employed person or a sole trader acting in that capacity and someone who seeks corporate status.

Before others speak to it more expertly than I do, may I say that new clause 10 is well constructed, reflecting as it does the structure of the parallel provision within the agricultural wages board legislation. As I said only obliquely and briefly during the Standing Committee, I am aware of exactly the type of circumstances in which people with severe disabilities are encouraged to enter the workplace.

Absolutely nothing in new clause 10 is designed to frustrate that, but it makes different provisions—I know this from the Papworth hospital NHS trust in my constituency—about the mechanism by which remuneration is given to persons with severe disabilities, learning disabilities or incapacities, often of a physical nature, so that those persons still have a full incentive to enter work, rather than to remain wholly on benefits, and an incentive remains for the employer.

It would be disadvantageous if the Bill had no provision for permits of that type, acted as a disincentive to that happening, or interfered with the mechanism by which some of those arrangements to support disabled people into work occur. It may not necessarily be advantageous for the payments to be routed to the employer and then back to the individual through wages. It may sometimes be better for them to be made directly by a supporting body to the individual, while the employer pays a wage that is discounted by some factor in relation to an individual's incapacity.

In Standing Committee, Ministers were often at pains to emphasise the desire to have additional flexibility. Amendment No. 54 is designed to achieve exactly that purpose: to give Ministers the flexibility, using their power under clause 4, to add descriptions of persons who might be treated as not qualifying or for whom a different rate might be prescribed, and to delete descriptions of persons. I do not think that there is any particular agenda in mind in tabling amendment No. 54, but it is entirely laudable that the amendment gives Administrations, including future Administrations, that flexibility.

Amendment No. 79 needs to be debated at some length. It seeks to remove the flexibility within the legislation to prescribe a different rate for persons aged over 18 and under 26. If one considers the Government's evidence to the Low Pay Commission, one can see the direction in which the Government are moving. Clearly, they are looking towards treating those under the age of 26 as a reasonable proxy for those who are in training in one form or another.

The Government do not want a separate training rate, which is much sought by business, for good reason. They hope that, instead of having all the difficulties of defining who is a trainee and what they may assert as the potential subsequent disincentive of having a lower training rate—which might cause people to take jobs without rather than with training—they have a young person's national minimum wage rate. All the evidence suggests that, whether that is right or wrong, the Government are likely to mitigate thereby the adverse economic and job consequences of the national minimum wage.

I recall a study in Spain that concluded that young persons were far more likely to be adversely affected in their job prospects by the imposition of a national minimum wage at a uniform rate, so it is right to have regard to young persons, and to recognise the conclusions of that study.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Lansley: I will give way to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones), who has sat through all the proceedings today.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does the hon. Gentleman recall the experience in this country after the Wages Act 1986? The minimum rate set by wages councils was abolished for the under-21s, and there was no increase in employment for young people—in fact, exactly the opposite.

8 pm

Mr. Lansley: This is not a criticism, but the hon. Lady does not have the benefit of having sat through our discussions in Committee. If she had, she would know that it is extraordinarily difficult to assess the impact of a minimum wage in a growing economy. The growth in the United Kingdom economy after 1981 and the growth in employment after 1986 were such that it was difficult subsequently to draw conclusions.

The academic evidence shows that it is better to study the inter-war years and the impact of minimum wages in agriculture. Within one overall economy—we can assume that, broadly speaking, the broader economic movements were the same—the minimum wage was varied even by county. Where the minimum wage was higher, there were adverse job consequences. Within one economic area, a variation in one parameter—the minimum wage—led to positive or negative job consequences.

Mr. Bercow: Does my hon. Friend agree that the problem for Labour Members is that they always look for a mechanistic relationship, but almost invariably the relationship is not mechanistic? There is no greater logic in what the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) said than in the statement in Committee by a number of Labour Back Benchers that there were low wages in particular parts of the country in the early 1980s, but unemployment rose nevertheless. If there were low wages but unemployment rose, the implication is that therefore there is never a case for low wages. There is no logic in that—there might be in the minds of Labour Back Benchers, but not in the minds of more sagacious people.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who made his point well.

Mr. Ian Bruce rose—

Mr. Lansley: I will give way to my hon. Friend one final time.

Mr. Bruce: I hope that it is not the final time. My hon. Friend is missing one point. The effect of wages councils setting particular wages for particular age groups was very effective in my business. I ran an employment agency, and usually the companies I supplied were not affected by wages councils. If someone was doing a job, whether aged 16, 17, 18, 20 or 80, he got the same rate of pay. It was only when dealing with the Aerated Waters Wages Council, which set lower rates of pay for 16, 17 and 18-year-olds, that I was forced by employers to pay them less money, because that was required by the wages council.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend initiates consideration of an issue that might well repay being examined at greater length, but it is better that he should do so than that I should attempt to do so.

Hon. Members seem to want to draw implications from the experience of the wages councils, so we could look at the relatively closed circumstances of the Agricultural Wages Board. The structure of the wages council is to be jettisoned in favour of a uniform structure. That raises the question why, if Labour Members want to replicate, through the national minimum wage, what they perceive, perhaps erroneously, to be the benefits of past wages councils structures, they do not replicate the structure of wages councils in their variations in respect of, for example, casual workers and the Agricultural Wages Board.

I rose to move new clause 4 and to make only brief comments on the new clauses and amendments grouped with it, so I shall leave it to others to refer more specifically to them.

Audrey Wise (Preston): The only phrase that unites the new clauses and amendments is that they refer to "persons who do not qualify." I want to distinguish my amendment No. 79 from the other new clauses and amendments in this group. There is a clear distinction. Conservative Members want to increase the number of people who do not qualify; my hon. Friends and I want to protect the position of those aged under 26. We want them to qualify for the minimum wage.

I am obliged to the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), who did me the favour of attacking my amendment. That was both helpful and convenient. Before coming to the meat of my amendment, I want to commiserate with my hon. Friends on the Front Bench and those who served in Committee. I have had four and a half hours of Conservative Members wasting time; I dread to think how I would have felt had I suffered the many hours suffered by my hon. Friends—

Mr. John Healey (Wentworth): Eighty-six.

Audrey Wise: I double my commiserations. Concerned as I am about those under 26, there have been times when I have thought that some of the arguments in the previous debates were put by those under six.

Clause 3 says of those who have not reached the age of 26:

"The Secretary of State may by regulations" prevent them from

"being persons who qualify for the national minimum wage."

That is of great concern to us. As an alternative, the clause says that there could be a different rate for those under 26. Clearly that means a lower rate.

Those under 26 are certainly persons—they are adult persons. My amendment would replace the age of 26 with the age of 18. When someone becomes 18, he can vote for the Government or fight for his country. In many jobs, especially those likely to benefit from the minimum wage, those over 18 get the adult rate—especially if they are lucky enough to work somewhere that is trade union organised. Trade unions have fought for the adult rate at the age of 18 in exactly those jobs that would benefit from the minimum wage, and for many years they have succeeded.

Under-26s are certainly adults. Many will have children. I had been married for more than seven years, and had two children by the time I was 26. I would have been deeply offended, affronted and horrified, and would have thought it bizarre if anyone had suggested that I was not an adult until I was 26. Some of those who might not qualify for the minimum wage are lone parents, about whom we have had much discussion. Many under-26s, including lone parents, will certainly have many heavy responsibilities.

The school-leaving age is 16. By the age of 26, many people will have left school for 10 years, and they will have been working, hopefully, for most or all of that time. I was therefore surprised—to say the least—to note that the Government felt it necessary to include clause 3 in the Bill.

I very much welcome the Bill, and I admire the tenacity with which my hon. Friends on the Front Bench have stuck to a single national rate and fought off all the blandishments suggesting all types of other complicated arrangements. They have been quite right in doing so. However, while there is a possibility of excluding those under 26, we must continue to feel alarm about the Bill's universality.

Mr. Hammond: Has the hon. Lady also noticed that, in clause 4, the Secretary of State will have powers to exclude persons over the age of 26?

Audrey Wise: We are debating clause 3. As we are debating clause 3, I shall speak to that. The hon. Gentleman's intervention does not encourage me in giving way to Conservative Members.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): I quite understand where the hon. Lady is coming from with amendment

[Mr. John Redwood]

No. 79. Were I a socialist, I am sure that I would want to do the thing properly, which would mean a comprehensive minimum wage. Can she explain to the House why the Government are letting down her and other Labour Members in such a manner? Can she account for Ministers' conduct in leaving out what a socialist would consider the guts of the Bill?

Audrey Wise: The right hon. Gentleman says that he knows where I am coming from—of course he does: I am coming from Preston, where many people are sorely in need of a minimum wage. I need no lessons from Conservative Members, who have tried as much as they possibly can to obstruct the Bill's passage and resorted to the most childish arguments—because there are no good arguments against the Bill. Although this debate is being held on the Floor of the House, I am afraid that our conversation and the controversy will have to be rather more exclusive.

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Audrey Wise: No, I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman. I have already had to endure his efforts for all too long. Let us keep to the matter, which is between me and my hon. Friend the Minister, who I know will be listening seriously to our arguments.

People are adults long before they are 26, and many people under 26 will have heavy responsibilities. They will certainly be responsible for their own upkeep. From the age of 18, it is quite clear that no one else will have responsibility for them. It is not difficult to establish their needs. I should be very interested to hear whether an argument could be made that one has to wait until 26 before accumulating adult income requirements.

People might ask, "Can those under 26 do the job? Do they do the job?" Some jobs are more complex than others. However, as I have already said, and as my hon. Friend the Minister will know very well—as he understands these matters very well and has a similar background to my own—many trade unions have established the adult rate at 18, and it would be very divisive if working people over 26 were afraid that they would lose their jobs because employers preferred to use cheap labour. Those working people over 26 would therefore be aggrieved. Those under 26 would be equally aggrieved, because they do not want to be cheap labour. Therefore, neither those over 26 nor those under 26 would be happy if the clause were activated.

Clause 3 is an empowering clause. My main objective in tabling my amendment and in speaking to it is to make it quite clear that a substantial number of people who are loyal supporters of the Government would be deeply dismayed if the clause were ever activated. I am very sorry that the clause—which hangs there, like a rain cloud—is in the Bill. However, it does not have to be activated.

8.15 pm

I therefore ask the Minister for some assurances. I have read the Committee's proceedings on clause 3, and was very pleased to see that he said that he did not want people under 26 to be used as "skivvy labour", as they had been in the past, and as some of them still are. I very much welcome that assurance.

My hon. Friend also said of clause 3:

"The proposals are consistent with the concept of the universality of the Bill."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 27 January 1998; c. 367.]

I do not understand that. Universal application of a national minimum wage should mean that it was applicable to all adults. I listened to our earlier debate on the voluntary sector, and I well understand those provisions in the Bill and have no quarrel with them. However, we are talking now about employees who earn a living by selling their labour, and the national minimum wage should apply to them from the age of 18.

I should like clarification from my hon. Friend on a specific matter. In Committee, he said:

"the recommendations, whatever they are, will be brought to the House for decisions to be made on regulations."

This debate is being held in the dark, as we do not yet know the Low Pay Commission's recommendations or how the Government will react to them. There is therefore an element of "just in case" about our debate. However, if anyone thinks that it will be easy to pass clause 3 and to have it accepted with equanimity or approval, they are wrong. If it is in the Bill just in case it can be got away with, many of my hon. Friends and I will do our level best to ensure that it is not got away with.

I should like to be as helpful as I possibly can to my hon. Friend the Minister, because Ministers really have done a very good job in the other parts of the Bill. It would be very helpful if he can assure me that his statement in Committee means what I think it means—that

"the recommendations, whatever they are, will be brought to the House for decisions to be made on regulations."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 27 January 1998; c. 370.]

Does "the House" mean the Floor of the House—this Chamber? Will we be able to debate any regulations here? I am sure that many hon. Members would very much welcome such an opportunity, if that is what it is.

We do not want to feel that establishing the terms of a minimum wage is a matter of now or never—which it should not be, as there are many contingencies of which we are not yet aware. I hope that the Minister will be able to reassure me on that matter.

Much has been said about Ministers wanting to hear the Low Pay Commission's recommendations. I regret that the age issue was even referred to the Low Pay Commission, as such a referral gives the impression that the matter is somehow technical.

I hope I have made it clear that I do not regard this as a technical matter. I regard it as a matter of adults doing adult jobs and having adult responsibilities, who may yet find themselves excluded from the national minimum wage. I hope that that will never happen: I hope that the Low Pay Commission will not recommend it, and I hope that, if it does, the Government will not accept its recommendations.

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Audrey Wise: No. I referred to the under-sixes, and I had the hon. Gentleman in mind more than any of his hon. Friends. [HON. MEMBERS: "Some under-sixes are very bright."] There are arguments that are childish, with which it is not wise to delay the House. There are other arguments that relate to whether real people will be able to buy real food for real children, have a decent standard of living and not have to wait for that to happen until they reach the age of 26. It is because I share my hon. Friend the Minister's commitment to the Bill that I want to ensure that it is not undermined by this proposal, with all the divisiveness that that would entail.

I hope that my hon. Friend will accept my remarks in the spirit in which I have made them. He will not be surprised to hear that they were made in a spirit not only of helpfulness, but of determination. I also hope that he will give me the assurance about procedure that I sought.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): I wish to speak to new clause 10, and also to comment on new clauses 4 and 5, which concern directors; on amendments Nos. 70 and 79, which relate to age-specific matters; on the Government amendments, which also cover the issue of age; and on amendments Nos. 53 and 54, which comes under the general heading "Persons who do not qualify".

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) for his excellent speech, and for all the hard work and common sense that he put into the Committee stage. I also congratulate other members of the Committee who have done a great deal to probe and test the legislation. As we are seeing this evening, however, much remains to be done.

We enter the Report stage, as we entered the Committee stage, in the spirit of wishing to offer constructive amendments in an attempt to deal with some of the more obvious pitfalls that the original legislation was likely to create. We welcome some of the Government amendments that we have seen so far, and my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell)—who has done so much good work—has already welcomed the move that has been made in the right direction in a couple of instances. Nevertheless, we feel that Ministers should reconsider before the Bill's passage is completed, in order to avoid some obvious difficulties—difficulties that could rebound to hurt the very people whom I think the Minister and some of his hon. Friends intend to help. We wish those people no ill, and we want the Minister to think again.

It is difficult to discuss the range of exemptions from the Bill without knowing the level at which the minimum wage is likely to be set. The main worry that anyone has about the Bill is the worry that it could destroy jobs—the fear that it could cost people their jobs if the minimum wage is too far above their current level of pay. That could happen if employers were forced to pay the national minimum, and chose to cut the numbers that they employed at the same time.

That is our main worry about the Bill. It is not that we want low pay. My hon. Friends and I have often stressed that we want the highest possible pay for people, earned in the normal way in the marketplace. We want policies that promote high pay by creating the conditions for success. Nor do we think that people should have to live on some of the low wages that are still unfortunately paid. We have always supported—and I think this is bipartisan—a minimum income with top-ups from benefit. Of course we would like Ministers to succeed in ensuring that more of people's money comes from employment and less from benefit—that, too, is common ground—but the issues concerning exemptions relate to a central question: would jobs be lost if the minimum level were set too high, and if too many people were included in the proposals?

What is surprising is the way in which the Government began. They began with the pure doctrine that it is possible for a Government to legislate for any level of wages that they choose without any consequences for jobs, but we have seen them slip and slide closer to our position, which is that to legislate for too many people at too high a level is to undermine job opportunities.

When the President of the Board of Trade launched the Bill on its tortuous journey on Second Reading, she offered minimum wage protection for all workers. In Committee, we saw the armed forces exempted from that promise. Tonight, we shall see whether all those under 26 will be exempted, or whether they will be given a lower rate or rates as a result of a powerful provision which, understandably, upsets the hon. Member for Preston (Audrey Wise) and some of her hon. Friends.

Mr. Ian McCartney: I intervene on a point of information. Clauses 3 and 4 were in the Bill on Second Reading, and the Government made no amendments to them in Committee. The Government amendments that we are discussing now are intended to clarify that position; they are not related to principle. We shall deal with the armed forces later, but the Armed Forces Pay Review Body will take care of armed forces personnel, and civilians in the armed forces will be covered by the national minimum wage.

Mr. Redwood: That was a brave effort, but the Minister protests too much. The armed forces proposal was made in Committee, after a period of sustained pressure on the part of the Opposition. Opposition Members said that the Bill was capturing too many people, and that problems were likely to result from such a wide coverage.

The Minister is right to say that certain clauses were in the Bill at the outset, but I am right to remind him about the strong statements—from him, as Minister of State responsible for this important policy, and from his boss, the President of the Board of Trade—that there would be minimum wage protection for all workers. There was no qualification in those original statements suggesting that those under 26 might be left out.

It so happens that people under 26 are the most likely category to be affected by a statutory minimum wage. It is probable that more people under 26 are below any likely minimum wage level than people above that age. The Minister is misrepresenting the history of the legislation. The promise began as a very general promise made by him and by the President of the Board of Trade. We have seen them gradually strengthen the rhetoric in favour of making a series of exemptions, and—in, for example, their evidence to the Low Pay Commission—putting more stress on the idea that perhaps all young people should, after all, be left out of the legislation.

Mr. Ian McCartney: The right hon. Gentleman entirely misrepresents the Government's evidence to the Low Pay Commission. It was completely neutral.

[Mr. Ian McCartney]

We made no recommendation to the commission on any aspect, other than asking the commission to consider the legislation and present proposals. Neither in the public nor in the private domain have we put pressure on the commission to do anything other than that.

Mr. Redwood: To draft clauses as the Government have, and then to write to the Low Pay Commission saying that the one group it should consider is those under 26, clearly implies that the Government think there is a serious argument for exempting all those under 26, or for giving them a lower rate. Otherwise the Government would not have put the clause in, and would not have written to the Low Pay Commission as they did.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Surely the truth of the matter must be that the Government know quite well what they are about to do. They could have asked the Low Pay Commission to make a prior determination. Basically, they are setting out to get through a Bill with which Labour Back Benchers disagree.

Mr. Redwood: I imagine that we share that worry with Labour Members. They may be conned by the measure in terms of the rates not being stated and who will be covered.

Audrey Wise: Will the right hon. Gentleman advise his hon. Friends that my hon. Friends and I are quite capable of telling the Government when we agree or disagree with them? I have not forgotten the many occasions when we were in opposition when I asked Ministers how low was too low in terms of pay, and the answer was never forthcoming. During all those years in opposition, it was crystal clear that no pay was too low to satisfy the Conservatives.

8.30 pm

Mr. Redwood: That is not the position of the Opposition, nor was it the position of the Conservative Government.

Audrey Wise: The right hon. Gentleman should read Hansard.

Mr. Redwood: Until May 1997, the Government made it clear what they considered to be a minimum income for different groups of people, depending on their family circumstances and their outgoings. There was a strong and long record of Conservative measures to boost incomes through family credit, housing benefit and income support for those who were not in employment. Some of them were bipartisan measures that mirrored the policies of previous Labour Governments. It is quite wrong for the hon. Lady to say that Conservative Members have any wish for people to live on inadequate incomes; we believe that in certain cases there should be a mixture of benefit and wages.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Audrey Wise). He is correct in saying that the Conservative Government introduced and used family credit as a tool to prop up low wages and subsidise employers. The Conservatives were always very keen on propping up low wages and subsidising employers, but I do not recall any Conservative Minister ever condemning a low wage. However low it was—£1 an hour or 50p an hour—it was never low enough for the Conservative Government to criticise.

Will the right hon. Gentleman briefly say what he thinks the minimum wage should be? I would love to hear the answer—and so would an awful lot of other people. The Conservative Government never condemned any employer for using bargain-basement tactics to force young people into disgracefully low-paid jobs.

Mr. Redwood: I have made it clear that we concentrated on the income going to the individual or family. We set out what we considered to be the minimum levels of income. If it could not all come from employment income, it was topped up by state benefits. The one matter on which the hon. Gentleman and I agree is that we would like those levels to rise and more to come from employment and less from the taxpayer.

The debate between the two sides of the House is not about that but about how it should be achieved. Will we create more jobs by allowing employers to offer jobs and employees to accept them, or by telling employers that they cannot offer certain jobs at certain levels of pay? I submit that, on reflection, the hon. Gentleman will agree that the former position would result in more jobs. If we achieve success in education, training and promoting an enterprise economy, all wages will go up, and that will be good news.

Mr. Bercow: The inane ramblings of the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) notwithstanding, does my right hon. Friend agree that the real point that emerges from recent exchanges is that no minimum wage is too high and no loss of jobs is too great to cause the hon. Member for Preston (Audrey Wise) to abandon her ideological enthusiasm for a minimum wage? The realities, the consequences and the net effects are not exactly at the forefront of her mind.

Mr. Redwood: I think my hon. Friend is gently chiding me for expressing any sympathy for the hon. Member for Preston. I am sympathetic to her—I know she does not want my sympathy—because she fought the election in the belief that there would be a fairly high national minimum wage applying to everyone. She could have deduced that also from the early statements of the Minister and the President of the Board of Trade. The Bill, with its ragbag of exemptions, some of which we welcome, must be a terrible disappointment to her.

I sympathise with the hon. Lady, but my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) and I disagree with her judgment, and that is why we are not socialists. We do not believe that it is possible legislate to create prosperity in that way. If it were, we would have done it and we would have been more popular, but the Government are in danger of legislating people's jobs away rather than legislating for higher pay for a lot of people.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): For the record, and for the sake of clarity, I can recall Conservative Ministers and Back Benchers being asked whether any pay was too low. Although they never gave a figure, they often replied that people should price themselves into work. They repeated that phrase time and again. Is that still their position, or have their views changed?

Mr. Redwood: I shall try to explain again. Ministers said then, and shadow spokesmen say now, that there are levels of pay that are too low to support the family life of the individuals concerned, and that something should be done about it. In government, we introduced ways of topping up those incomes. We also adopted a series of policies that promoted a more successful economy in many years under the Conservatives. During those periods, wages generally rose. The Labour Government are trying to achieve through legislation what we did by economic success. The best way of getting people into jobs that pay well is economic success, enterprise and growth—which is what I trust both parties wish to see. The argument is about how to achieve them.

Mr. Lansley: Before my right hon. Friend moves away from this point, does he recall that, in October 1996, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development produced a report on the possibilities of different forms of welfare for those on low wages or in low-skilled jobs? It stated:

"This calls for a new income supplement for low-wage jobs, possibly accompanied by a lower minimum wage, to reduce employer costs while retaining a minimum income guarantee."

The OECD called for a direct employer subsidy in Europe, but in the United Kingdom we had a rather better system that supported the individual in work.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is quite right. He makes an extremely powerful point, which leads me to remind the House that there is a contradiction at the heart of the Government's policy of welfare to work. We hope that it remains welfare to work and does not become work to welfare, but one wonders, given some of their measures.

Some of the steps that the Government are taking are designed to lower the costs of employing people in order to produce more jobs. That is the idea behind some of the Chancellor's measures. He may reduce tax on the lower-paid for the same reason—that he wants to increase their net take-home pay to produce a given level of employment income. That is a sensible idea, but how does it square with trying to increase wages by Act of Parliament, running the risk of pricing some jobs out of existence? It is the opposite of what the Chancellor is trying to achieve by other policies.

If we ran the numbers through a computer, we might discover that, after all the twisting and turning, we would be worse rather than better off as the job-destroying effects of measures that increased employer costs—the tax measures and those in the Bill—more than offset the advantages that the Chancellor is trying to offer by means of other parts of his strategy.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye): Can the right hon. Gentleman explain the problem in my constituency? Hastings and Rye has the lowest wages in the south-east—something like two thirds of the national average, or a little lower. We also have the highest unemployment rate in the south-east. The problem cannot be blamed on the Labour party, since, until the general election, the constituency had been represented by a Conservative Member of Parliament since 1902 and until recent years there was a Conservative council. Can the right hon. Gentleman explain how there can be areas of low wages and high unemployment if there is some relationship between the two?

Mr. Redwood: I thought that Labour had a solution to that. The Government came to power saying that they would tackle such pockets of persistently and unpleasantly high unemployment in their early days. It is interesting that the hon. Gentleman is seeking the expertise and advice of the Conservatives. He clearly has no confidence in the ability of the Government he supports to solve the problems.

The decline of traditional activities in seaside towns has often been too steep for the creation of new jobs and new opportunities to keep pace. I trust that the hon. Gentleman will work to help to raise school standards, to broaden the horizons of young people leaving school, to ensure that the training offered is of the highest quality and to promote that training to businesses. He is likely to attract more jobs and more businesses by supporting the successful enterprise policies that we followed in the 1980s and the mid-1990s than by following the over-prescriptive and over-regulatory policy that the Minister would like. Countries that have followed such regulatory policies have higher unemployment than Britain—including his constituency.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): Does my right hon. Friend accept that, in Hastings, Southend-on-Sea and other seaside towns, one of the problems is not the level of wages, but the fact that, although we have high levels of unemployment, some of our travel-to-work areas have much lower unemployment, depriving us of the grants that many other areas have? Is that not a result of European bureaucracy, which insists that the Government have to take travel-to-work areas into account? Would it not be better if the Government—Conservative or Labour—were free to give help to such areas of high unemployment without the restrictions imposed by foolish Euro-regulations?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That really is going much wider than the group of amendments allows. I hope that the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) will be able to keep within the group.

Mr. Redwood: I shall not be wandering off. My hon. Friend has made his point. I had thought that some Labour Members were tempting me a little wide of the group, although it contains some general issues that relate to how many exemptions there should be, which needed some general exposition.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire has pointed out that directors are caught by the Bill. He made an important point, saying that a director who wanted his business to grow might find it tax-disadvantageous to pay himself any or much salary. It might be better for him to use the cash coming in to invest in the future of the business and not have to pay himself an income. That powerful consideration persuaded me that his new clause has a great deal of merit, as does new clause 5, which is similar.

[Mr. Redwood]

I noticed an interesting story in The Times on Thursday 5 March about James McSporran, from a Hebridean island. Mr. McSporran has just retired from one of his 13 jobs. He has been, or is, postman, rent collector, shopkeeper, ambulance man, taxi driver, school bus driver, pier master, registrar, insurance collector, petrol pump attendant, undertaker and proprietor of the guest house. Until five years ago, he was also fire master and coastguard. He may well be a director of one or more of those businesses. If he is not, there may be another Mr. McSporran with a similar portfolio of activities that includes a number of directorships.

Mr. Corbyn: How many directorships does the right hon. Gentleman have?

Mr. Redwood: I have no directorships. My work is cut out keeping up with all the extraordinary schemes coming out of the Department of Trade and Industry and the very badly drafted legislation that it brings before us. The hon. Gentleman is making me deviate from the important subject under discussion.

Mr. McSporran and those like him will have to pay themselves—or be paid—the minimum wage for each of their activities. That is extraordinary. If Mr. McSporran or someone like him is a director of two or three small businesses that provide a community service—doing that work partly for normal business reasons and partly to make a contribution to their community—they are the best judges of whether they need to pay themselves a lot, a little or nothing. With such a portfolio of interests, presumably they have money coming into the family to meet their requirements.

Mr. Corbyn: Before the right hon. Gentleman continues with his extraordinary argument about one person holding 13 jobs, I remind him that the Bill relates to an hourly minimum rate. People can be paid more than that minimum. Is the right hon. Gentleman suggesting that such a person will get 13 times the hourly rate for each job he does? If so, he has clearly not read the Bill.

8.45 pm

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman is getting confused. My point is that, for someone with 13 jobs—or even four or five jobs—including directorships, it is reasonable that they should be free to be paid a lot or a little depending on their circumstances and the circumstances of the business, rather than having to be paid the statutory minimum for the hours they are working, or say they are working, in that role. The hon. Gentleman should reflect on that.

Mr. Hammond: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is extraordinary for Labour Members, who are so fond of talking about fat cat directors paying themselves too much out of profits, to want to prohibit directors of companies that might be in trouble and might be faced with the possibility of having to lay off workers from agreeing to take no pay to save the business?

Mr. Redwood: It is extraordinary. My hon. Friend has pre-empted a point that I was about to make. Not only is there the case set out by my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire of a director of a business that wishes to grow deciding that that is a higher priority than paying himself a lot—or anything at all—in the early days. There is also the case of the ailing or failing business.

Let us suppose that a failing business has a senior director, a chairman or a chief executive who is also a director who has made—

Mr. Ian McCartney: What about Asil Nadir?

Mr. Redwood: Perhaps the Minister would like to think about the Paymaster General, who has had a lot of experience in business matters. One of the companies that he was involved with got into cash-flow difficulties—I think that that is the polite way of saying it. If such a director had some savings from past financial success to enable him to look after his family, would it not be a public-spirited gesture for him to cut his pay to below the national minimum? Why should he have to pay himself the national minimum if he seriously believes that one way to get the company out of trouble is to cut the costs that he is imposing on it? It would be altruistic for him to forgo money so that some of the staff could be maintained and paid their wages while the company got out of trouble.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My right hon. Friend has missed the obvious point that Lord Simon works for the Government for nothing—or so we are told. Under the Bill, he would not be allowed to do so.

Mr. Redwood: We are not sure how the legislation will treat benefits in kind, of which Ministers get rather a lot. Would they have to attribute as remuneration the diary secretary, the personal secretary, the car, the chauffeur and all the other benefits, which I believe that Ministers without a salary still enjoy? If that was not part of remuneration, the problem that my hon. Friend mentions would become a difficulty. Many businesses are struggling or in difficulty and need to cut their costs. It is rather good if directors offer the lead and cut the costs that they are imposing on the business. As I understand the legislation, it would, to some extent, prevent that.

I do not know whether the Minister and his colleagues at the Department have thought through the consequences in relation to insolvency law. Directors must not knowingly trade while a company is insolvent, and they are under a duty to take all necessary steps to keep a company solvent. The Bill would remove one of the steps that directors could take, particularly if there were an expensive board. Minimum pay requirements would limit the reductions that they could make in board remuneration.

I hope that the Minister will take that matter seriously and try to explain how the legislation relates to directors' duties. What does he imagine would happen if a company were in danger of going into administration? Some directors or former directors of companies have offshore trusts, for example, which can provide them and their families with money to keep them going, and as a result enable them to make the necessary reductions in the charge that they represent on the company.

Another related issue—unfortunately, new clause 9 has not been selected for debate, but new clauses 4 and 5 relate to the same issue—is the employment of a spouse.

I hope that I can raise the matter on the hypothesis that a spouse could be employed as a co-director of a small family firm. As one hon. Member has pointed out, a family—a husband and wife team—sometimes wishes to arrange remuneration in such a way that one member earns most of it and the other does not see the need to draw an income but wants to make a contribution to the family concern. The Bill would make that difficult or impossible. Our proposals on directors would at least help where the employment of a spouse took the form of a directorship of the family company or small company. I would have liked more general exceptions, but amendments that would have achieved that have not been selected.

New clause 10, which I tabled, is designed to tackle a very serious and sensitive issue: the question of employment of severely handicapped persons. All of us in the House wish to see disabled people leading the best of lives, and want everything for them that helps them to fulfil their potential. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House are united in wanting disabled people to work where they can and in wishing to see everything done to make that possible. In that spirit, we hope that the Minister will think again about the position of the most severely handicapped people for whom some light work is available.

We have drafted new clause 10 very carefully and cautiously to show that we are not in favour of depressing the pay of disabled people. We have drafted it so as to leave much discretion to the holder of the office of President of the Board of Trade, showing that the proposal is made in the right spirit. We have proposed that the President of the Board of Trade should have a power to make an order under the Act, which would allow the issuing of permits to any groups or individuals who wanted to work and were able to work for less than the minimum wage, where special circumstances made it unlikely that they would be able to command the minimum wage for what they were capable of doing and wished to do.

We have left the power very general. We have not thought out all the details. We would want the matter to be handled with a great deal of sensitivity. For example, it could be a requirement of the issuing of any permit that the individual, and/or his or her carer, would have to want the provision to be implemented before it could be implemented. Otherwise, they could come under the legislation in the normal way wherever possible. I hope that the Minister will look very carefully at the new clause and reflect on whether he may have inadvertently done more damage than he intended to a group whose members need all the help they can get from us all.

Mr. Ian McCartney: I ask the right hon. Gentleman, in the same spirit, to withdraw that last remark. I have never intended any damage to anybody who has a physical or mental disability. I have spent a great deal of my life as a voluntary advocate on those people's behalf. I am sure that it was not the right hon. Gentleman's intention to suggest otherwise.

Mr. Redwood: I did not think that I had made such a suggestion. I thought that I said that the Minister intended well for the disabled, as I do. I hope that the record shows that. If it does not, this is a correction for the record.

I turn to amendment No. 79, to which the hon. Member for Preston (Audrey Wise) spoke interestingly. She combined a fairly ferocious attack on her Front-Bench team with a reluctance to press the matter fully, fearing that she had perhaps gone too far with the new Labour team. She was clearly trying to shame the Government. Having driven a coach and horses through the Government's majestic but ill-conceived proposals, she looked towards the end of her speech as if she might settle for rather less than she originally intended.

I liked the choice of words of the hon. Member for Preston in describing clause 3 as a "rain cloud" over the legislation. We on the Opposition Benches see just a great sky of clouds, and fear that the rain will wet those least able to withstand it. The hon. Lady sees it the other way round; she feels that "the cloud" is that people whom she would like to be included in the legislation will be left out.

I had a lot of sympathy with the hon. Member for Preston when she asked why the age of 26 should be stipulated. I hope that the Minister will give us some thoughts on that. I could understand stipulating the age of 18, because that is the legal age of majority. I could understand the age of 21, because that is when many young people complete university, college or other tertiary education, and it is the old age of majority. I could certainly understand the age of 16, because that is the traditional school-leaving age. I could even understand the age of 25, because that is a quarter of a century, a nice round number and the type of anniversary that people celebrate. But 26 seems a very odd age.

As the hon. Member for Preston told us, she already had substantial family responsibilities by the age of 26. Most people would not only have completed their training by that age but would have had several years' experience in work, and may have moved jobs two or three times. By then, one would expect people to be making progress in their chosen careers or activities. So, it is very difficult to understand why the Government should create the only age break at 26, when they could have chosen so many different ages or, indeed, chosen a variety of age breaks, both high and low, for different purposes with different rates.

Mr. Bruce: The one guide is that the Agricultural Wages Board uses the age of 19 or over. I cannot understand why one should have to wait another six or seven years before one qualifies under the Bill.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend reminds me of another legislative age limit. The age of 19 does not relate neatly to school leaving or college departure, but as he says, it is important to an important sector of our economy, and embedded in legislation. Perhaps the Government thought about it but rejected it for some reason or other. I hope that the Minister will offer some explanation when he addresses the Government amendments, which seek to change the wording concerning the age break. Amendment No. 79 would ensure that all young people are included under the legislation, while amendment No. 70 would ensure that no one under the age of 18 would qualify for the national minimum wage in the interests of preserving employment for the youngest members of the work force.

Since the Bill's inception as a manifesto promise before the general election, during early ministerial statements and in Committee, we have seen a perpetual muddle over the treatment of young people. We thought at the beginning that young people were to be treated like anybody else—hence all the statements about equality and the national minimum wage applying to all. If the then shadow spokesmen were challenged before the election about the job consequences, they either said that there would be no job consequences—they believed that they could legislate for a national minimum wage without destroying any jobs for young people—or they implied that the single uniform rate of a minimum wage would be set low enough to avoid the worst consequences for young people.

It is necessary to return to the issue of the rate. In its 1992 general election manifesto, Labour told the public that £3.40 was the minimum acceptable wage for all the people that they wished the legislation to cover. I think the Labour party assumed at the time that everyone would be covered by the legislation; there was no mention in the manifesto of leaving out the armed services and so on. The Labour party then said that £3.40 was the rate, and that it thought that that would provide the best balance of advantage over disadvantage.

Now the Labour Government are smuggling the Bill through the House without naming the rate. I assume that they are doing so because they can no longer live up to the promise that the Labour party made to its supporters in 1992. They do not intend to set a minimum wage of £4.61 an hour, which—in terms of relationship to average earnings—I believe is the modern equivalent of the £3.40 that Labour suggested in 1992. If the Minister wishes to disagree and say that £4.61 is a serious runner, I should be very interested to hear it because it would be germane to the issue of where to set the break point of age for young people and for older people; but his expression tells me that he does not have in mind anything like £4.61, so the Government are planning a lower wage rate than the one that the Labour party was planning in 1992.

Mr. Ian McCartney: I know it seems as though the right hon. Gentleman is provoking me, but let us be clear from the outset. During and since the general election campaign, the Government have made it clear that the Low Pay Commission would be asked to consider this matter and come up with proposals, following which the Government would take decisions, and that subsequent to that, any decision that the Government made would be subject to secondary legislation before the House.

Mr. Redwood: I agree that we have heard that repeatedly. We are not sure, however, whether the Minister has a rate in mind and the Low Pay Commission exists simply as a fig leaf whose view he will ultimately overturn if he does not agree with it, or whether the Low Pay Commission will recommend the rate and Ministers, in all but extreme circumstances, will accept its recommended rate.

Mr. Bercow: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Government's self-denying ordinance on the subject of the rate of the national minimum wage would seem a little more credible if it were accompanied by a silence to the newspapers? Given that the situation—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This has absolutely nothing to do with the group of amendments that we are discussing.

Mr. Redwood: I think that my hon. Friend just wished to develop the point about the level of the remuneration, which is central to the choice of age break in the Bill. If the national minimum wage is to be very low, we should choose a different age break from the one that we would choose if it was to be very high.

That is our difficulty tonight. We are asked to settle the age breaks tonight, in the Chamber, when the Minister remains unwilling or unable tell us not only what the rate will be but whether he will decide it, in practice, or whether the Low Pay Commission really knows all the answers.

Nevertheless, it appears increasingly likely that the national minimum wage will be about £3.60, rather than the £4-plus that people originally intended. That means that the Bill will not do as much damage to young people's jobs as if the Government were setting the national minimum wage at a higher level, but it will be a bigger disappointment for people like the hon. Member for Preston, who had hoped that it would be set higher, for the reasons that she gave. I hope that the House, will keep in mind the question whether 26 is the right break point, given what we might be able to deduce concerning the level at which the national minimum wage will be introduced.

Amendment No. 53 requires the President of the Board of Trade to take the advice of the Low Pay Commission before amending the descriptions of people covered by the Bill. The amendment is designed to try to discover what are the relative powers of the Low Pay Commission and the Minister, over this important range of issues of exemption. The Minister has been unwilling to explain the balance of power in relation to the level, which is central to the amendments before us. We are trying to persuade the Minister to say whether he and his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade are in charge, or whether the Low Pay Commission will retain a great deal of influence and power in the early stages of the establishment of the minimum wage.

As someone who believes in ministerial control and ministerial accountability through the House, I hope that the Minister will be brave enough to take decisions and come to the House to defend them. Obviously, he will use the Low Pay Commission's advice, because he has gone to much time, trouble and expense to establish it and it would be silly to ignore it, but it would be better, for the House and for our democracy, if he and his colleagues took the decisions in the light of the advice that they received, and came to the House to defend them.

Amendment No. 53 would oblige the Secretary of State to take the advice of the Low Pay Commission before amending the descriptions of persons to whom clause 3 applies. Having established the commission, it would be foolish not to listen to what it says or to draw on its expertise, but I hope that the Department of Trade and Industry will not make further progress towards quango government—a trend that is visible in too many Departments of State under this Administration. We have a quango to run our monetary policy, a quango to run our food policy and a quango to run our development policy—and now, perhaps, subject to what the Minister says, we shall have a quango to run the wages policy. There is a huge expansion of the quango state, at the instigation of the people who, in opposition, delighted in criticising the range and powers of quangos that were then in existence. I always preferred a little less to a little more quango. We now have a Government who say that they would like a little less quango but are busily creating quangos on a huge scale, which dwarfs anything that the previous Administration did.

Amendment No. 54 would allow the deletion of descriptions from the exemption list as well as permitting exemptions to be added under the other powers in the clauses that we are discussing. It is a useful amendment, as I hope the Minister agrees.

I had the impression that the Minister wanted as few exemptions as possible. I may be wrong, but I have the impression that the Minister is ending up with more exemptions than he would have liked or originally had in mind. I do not think that he was terribly keen on the exemption of the armed services, and he may not be keen on the exemption of young people. By tabling the amendment, we are offering him an opportunity to have another go with his colleagues in government later, to persuade them that there are too many exemptions and that those exemptions should be removed.

Mr. Bercow: Does not our support for the amendment show that we are prepared to have our judgments influenced over a period by objectively observable economic facts and outcomes that flow from the national minimum wage? If only Government Back Benchers were prepared to have their judgments similarly influenced instead of sticking to abstract, ideological dogma, they might do a little bit better.

Mr. Redwood: Indeed, I am beginning to wonder whether offering Opposition support for the amendment is too generous; but it is important to find out where the Minister stands on this issue. As the hon. Gentleman should be aware, my colleagues and I fear that, even now, there will not be enough exemptions in the legislation—that many more hard cases will come to light and he will have to rush back to the House to add to the list in one way or another. That is why he should spend a little more time studying what has happened overseas in countries that have introduced minimum wage legislation.

Many of those countries have established minimum wages that are considerably below the level of the 1992 Labour manifesto, and even below the level that the Government will eventually recommend following this agonising study process. In those jurisdictions abroad, even those with low national minimums—well below the level that some Labour Members would like here—they have had to amend and amend again their legislation to exempt more and more groups of people and hard cases.

In Committee and during these relatively brief exchanges on the Floor of the House, we have identified various groups that the Minister may regret having included so comprehensively. If he is not thinking of using the powers in the Bill to exempt all people under 26, he will discover that it will considerably damage youth employment opportunities if he sets too high a level of minimum wage. I trust that he has seen the way in which the continent of Europe is disfigured by high youth unemployment, which is in part related to minimum wage legislation and other labour market restrictions in those countries, which have made it more difficult for young people to get the jobs that we want them to enjoy. So, when it comes to young people, I hope that the Minister will study those situations carefully and decide that he needs to use the power in the Bill.

I also hope that the Minister has thought again about directors. I trust that the Opposition are making a sufficiently powerful case that they should be in a different category. They are responsible for their businesses in a very real way and should be offered the freedom and flexibility to provide the sort of leadership that is sometimes needed. It would be most welcome if Labour Members would occasionally recognise that there are some intentionally thin cats in the corporate world—directors who have offered a lead because they want to save their businesses by reducing the costs that they impose on them.

I hope that the Minister will think again about the position of spouses and about the flexibility of the legislation in adding to and reducing the number of exemptions required. Above all, I hope that this discussion and the debate both in Committee and here tonight will have made him aware that well-intentioned legislation could go horribly astray if the Government set the wrong rate, persevere with too few exemptions and do not understand the threat to people in training or with different types of remuneration—if they do not understand the enormous flexibility of the marketplace, which has generated jobs with all types and styles of remuneration, benefits in kind and the like, that need careful analysis before the somewhat crude injection of legislation into the equation.

I urge the House to support the new clauses and amendments standing in my name and those of my hon. Friends, and I urge the Minister to think again about these issues.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): On that glorious day in May 1997, Labour Members were elected on a pledge to introduce a minimum wage, and to abolish poverty pay and worker exploitation. I for one was not aware that that wage was not to apply to young adults in their 20s. Indeed, the Labour party in opposition opposed measures that reduced the rights of that age group—for example, the Tory reductions in benefit for the under-25s. We argued that that age group were adults and had the same expenses as their older colleagues. That must remain the case.

The majority of young people in the under-26 age group have left home—the average age for leaving home is 20—have their own households and have the same expenses as older people. There is no justification for paying them a lower rate. Indeed, it would be discriminatory. Young women in particular are more likely to have left the parental home and to have the expense of running their own home. It would be very worrying if a Labour Government introduced this long-awaited legislation in such a way as to give less protection than was afforded to 3.5 million workers in the 1970s and early 1980s by wages councils.

[Dr. Lynne Jones]

In 1986, the Labour party opposed the Wages Act that was introduced by the Tories. The Act removed people aged under 21 from the protection of wages councils. As has been said, that did not lead to an increase in the number of jobs for people in that age group—quite the contrary. Nevertheless, between 1986 and 1993, when the wages councils were abolished, adult rates of pay applied to people over 21. I should hate to think that a minimum wage that was introduced by a Labour Government would not apply to that age group. Even today, agricultural workers enjoy a minimum wage: 18-year-olds have a minimum wage of £3.51 an hour, and all those over 19 receive a minimum wage of £4.12 an hour.

9.15 pm

Mr. Ian Bruce: The hon. Lady cites the figures—which I have in front of me—correctly as they relate to people who are permanently employed. Temporary workers—those people who are employed for specific jobs—receive respectively not £4.12 but £3.06 an hour, and not £3.51 but £2.60 an hour. A 16-year-old receives £2.47 in a permanent job and £1.84 an hour in a casual job. Those rates were introduced by the Government last July.

Dr. Jones: I cannot comment on that. I had hoped that we would want rates of pay to apply to all workers, regardless of whether they are temporary or permanent. I am disappointed to hear that information. I hope that the Bill—as I think my hon. Friend the Minister has made clear—will establish a universal minimum wage that will apply to the workers whom the hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) has mentioned.

Mr. Ian McCartney: The hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) is being disingenuous. The agricultural wages council report was drawn up by the Agricultural Wages Board, which is made up of employers and trade unions. The purpose of the Bill is to ensure that, where an Agricultural Wages Board payment is less than the declared minimum wage, the minimum wage will apply, and that, where the agricultural wage is higher than the minimum wage, the agricultural wage will apply. The Bill will improve the system for all agricultural workers.

Dr. Jones: I thank my hon. Friend for that clarification—that is what I hoped to be the case.

The purpose of clause 3 was to allow the Government to take into account the recommendations of the Low Pay Commission, whose remit was to make recommendations on low rates or exemptions for those aged between 16 and 25. I am disappointed that the commission was given that remit. We can all accept that there are grounds for 16 and 17-year-olds—even perhaps 18-year-olds, as in the case of the agricultural wages council—being paid a young person's rate, but I cannot see any justification, especially in the light of experience, for introducing such measures relating to people who are older than that. I certainly hope that the Low Pay Commission will not make such recommendations—I do not think that it would want to do so if it examined the evidence logically.

Mr. Redwood: Does the hon. Lady think that, if the Low Pay Commission recommends the exemptions she fears, the Minister should overturn them and stick to his guns?

Dr. Jones: If the right hon. Gentleman had allowed me to finish, we could have saved the House valuable moments, because that is precisely the point that I was about to make. I hope that the Low Pay Commission will not make those recommendations—if it considers the arguments sensibly, it will not do so—but, if it does, I hope that the Government will reject them. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will give us an assurance that, before any such decision is taken, we shall be able to debate it on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I should first declare two interests—they are already registered—in that I am a director of Ian Bruce Associates Ltd. and an unpaid director of EURIM, the European Informatics Market group, which is a not-for-profit organisation that acts in a similar way to an all-party parliamentary group.

I have been amazed by Labour Members finding great humour in the idea of directors not paying themselves as much as the minimum wage. I have not had much involvement in the Bill, but I almost idly asked one of the Clerks in the Table Office whether the self-employed were exempt, and he told me that they were, so I asked whether the same applied to company directors, and he said no. Apparently, the matter was not discussed in Committee.

I know that the Minister does not have a great deal of respect for my views, but I ask him honestly to listen carefully to what I have to say about the way in which directors operate. I understand what he is trying to do—although I do not think that he is going the right way about it—to help low-paid individuals, but the legislation will catch a lot of directors whom he has no intention of catching, and will cause an awful lot of problems for the courts.

The Government have rightly taken the view that genuinely self-employed people who contract to do work for an agreed price will make their best efforts to make a profit, but may not do so on every job. It would be ridiculous if a tradesman who had agreed to do a job for a particular price—£500, say—were to come back afterwards and say, "I'm sorry, Guv, but I've just worked out that I didn't get the minimum wage on this job, so you'll have to pay me more."

When we had the recession in the building industry, people were simply trying to keep in work and were not looking for a good return. The same often applies to directors. I know that, because I started my own company. I did not start it so that I could work for poverty wages, or to make a loss; I am a qualified work study engineer, and I had worked everything out and made all the plans.

I freely admit that I dared not show my bank manager how much I was losing, because he would have pulled the plug. When my first set of accounts was drawn up for 18 months of trading, I had not paid myself £1 an hour, or 50p an hour, or even worked for nothing: it had cost me £9,000—a lot of money in those days—to work for myself for 18 months.

Many people find themselves in such a situation when they start companies. I do not seek sympathy from Labour Members—and I would certainly not get any—but I am trying to show that, when inspectors walk into a facility and try to find out whether the directors are paying themselves the minimum wage, they will get a terrible shock. I know that some Labour Members believe that people should not run companies and pay themselves less than the minimum wage, because they would be doing someone else out of a job. I am sure that some Labour Members would like the self-employed to be covered by the legislation for the same reason.

When someone sets up a business—it is difficult to understand until one does it oneself—it is very hard to find work and to make a profit. Often, one works long hours for no return. Labour Members are smiling, but they must have seen examples in their constituencies of people starting limited companies, a high proportion of which do not survive the first two or three years. That is not because the directors are paying themselves large sums.

Mr. Ian Stewart: They could go to an industrial tribunal.

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman is wrong about that. I shall describe how directors can get into difficulties when they do not pay themselves minimum wages. Companies have to have two directors and, in many cases, an individual who starts his own business also employs his wife. A couple might not want to tell people that they are earning low wages and that is not a problem, but what happens if the marriage breaks down, as often happens when people go into business together? The wife would be able to claim back from her husband minimum wages for working 40, 50 or 60 hours a week to get the business going.

The new clause on whether people who paid themselves wages were covered was not selected, but it is relevant to people who are directors. The industrial tribunal can be used as a debt collection agency between two people in a business, whether husband and wife or two separate directors. That happens in many limited companies.

Mr. Hammond: Does my hon. Friend agree that the greatest cause of concern is the lack of symmetry between the treatment of the self-employed and the directors of very small companies? To all practical intents, those two groups are in exactly the same position. Someone who is self-employed can pay himself as little or as much as he can afford, but someone who is a company director would be required by the Bill to pay himself the minimum wage. He would also be required to pay tax and national insurance on that salary and, if his business needed the cash flow, he would have to reinject that money as a net amount back into his business. That seems grossly unfair.

Mr. Bruce: That is unfair, and my hon. Friend's point goes to the nub of one of the additional problems that one faces when one runs a company. I shall come to that point later.

I have started several limited companies, some with people who were little known to me. We went into business together to try to make a profit. I do not wish to identify the particular company because of what I am about to say, but in one instance, the director—who was working in partnership with me—and I decided to work for nothing to get the business up and running. That director spent large sums on expenses that should not have been spent and I took him to the small claims court. The business was wound up and I won the money back, which was paid in dribs and drabs.

Under the Bill, that director could have said that he had worked long hours—as he had—in a company that was not making any money. The deal was that we all shared in the profits and in the losses, and that company was making losses. That director would have been able to say that our agreement to set up and run the business meant that he must be paid by the business whatever the minimum wage was.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): The hon. Gentleman is throwing an interesting hypothesis at the House, but if his erstwhile colleague had made such a proposition, could he not have countered with a similar one on his behalf?

Mr. Bruce: That is possible, but such situations often involve one working director, who earns an agreed amount. I am familiar with such a case—I do not want to give too much detail—where one director worked in the company for 40 hours a week while the other came in to check what was happening. They fell out, and that case certainly got to the courts. The non-working director, who had no agreement to receive funds, could have argued that he was a director for at least 40 hours a week, checking and supervising, and could have claimed the minimum wage. The Minister never wanted to catch such people or get into this complication. It would be sensible to exclude such directors.

9.30 pm

I am a little concerned about my unpaid directorship of an all-party group of this House. If I took any income from the group, I would not be able to comment in the House about information technology; I do that free of charge, with no thought of anything coming to me. However, under the proposals, any expenses that I might claim as a director—a director cannot get away from his duties to a limited company—could mean that I was caught. I would have to charge a fee and would not be able to carry on with what I am doing.

I know that the House wants to move on, so I shall briefly consider amendment No. 70.

Mr. Hammond: Before my hon. Friend leaves the subject of company directors, has his study of the matter uncovered any reason why the Minister should not be prepared to exclude directors? The Minister has consistently rejected amendments that he considers would undermine the principle of the Bill, but directors of small companies are essentially self-employed.

Mr. Bruce: I have not found such a reason, but there is always a loophole. If some people were willing to work for lower wages, they could all be made directors of the company. I give the Minister that loophole. I had other examples involving problems with the redundancy payments legislation whereby directors were able, in closing down companies, to claim from redundancy funds. A director who had not been paying himself money could, if his company went bust, argue that he was entitled to claim the minimum wage, put an invoice into the company for it and rely on the industrial courts to get it. He would create a debt that would be counted ahead of all the company's other debts.

Mr. Hammond: To add to my hon. Friend's point, I think that I am right to say that, if such a company went into receivership or liquidation, the Government would pick up the bill for unpaid wages. The directors' wages would be wages.

Mr. Bruce: I hope that the Minister is taking this on board, because we are trying to be helpful.

Briefly, I shall discuss the effect of wages councils and how we can learn from that in respect of the Bill. It is quite extraordinary that, when we mentioned the wages councils, the Minister dashed to the Dispatch Box and said that the reason why the Agricultural Wages Board was perfectly acceptable was that employers and employees had negotiated to come up with those minimum wages. The minimum wage for 16-year-olds is £1.84, for 18-year-olds £2.60 and for 19-year-olds £3.06.

The Government are telling us that they have put employers and employees on to a wages council, which will make recommendations to the Government, but why does the Minister—who defended wages councils up hill and down dale whenever the previous Government decided to remove them—believe that the group of people who have been charged with examining the minimum wage will not come up with exactly the same sort of figures? The reason why he does not want that to happen while the Bill is passing through the House is obvious: it is that Labour Back Benchers will be very upset.

This group contains many extremely sensible amendments, which have been wisely selected by Madam Speaker. The Minister would do well to look at our proposals and I hope that he will accept the amendments, or say that he will table amendments in the other place for consideration there.

Mr. Ian McCartney: We have had what I can only describe as a generally unfocused tour around what was basically a Second Reading debate so as to allow the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) to try to make a better speech than he made on Second Reading. Unfortunately, he was unable to do so.

I shall explain first the Government amendments to clauses 3 and 4 and then deal with the new clauses tabled by the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) and the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Audrey Wise) and her colleagues. By the end of my explanation, I hope to have gained the support of the House in what I am trying to achieve.

Amendments Nos. 21 to 23 do not alter the powers in clauses 3 and 4; instead, they clarify the relationship between the two clauses. In Committee, I explained exactly how the two clauses interact, but in the interests of absolute clarity we have tabled the amendments to explain how they work.

Clause 3 allows the Secretary of State to treat different persons differently by age if they are under 26. That is necessary to allow for a range of rates for different age groups below that age; for example, 16 to 18-year-olds, 19 to 21-year-olds and so on, if—I emphasise the word "if"—that is what is decided in the light of the Low Pay Commission's recommendations.

Clause 4 allows the Secretary of State to add further descriptions of persons to clause 3—for example, trainees, who may be 26 or over—again, in the light of the commission's recommendations. However, under clause 4, the Secretary of State may not differentiate by age. The reason for that is to ensure that the power in clause 4 is not used to set a number of different rates for those aged 26 and above; rather, the clause is intended to allow for a different rate, or an exemption, regardless of age.

The amendments remove any potential ambiguity and work in the following ways. Amendment No. 21 prevents any differentiation by age among those who are aged 26 or older by specifically ruling out such differentiation in clause 3. That is necessary for the sake of clarity, because clause 3 does not otherwise prevent different treatments for those of different ages. Amendments Nos. 22 and 23 make it clear that clause 4 refers only to those who have already attained the age of 26. That is simply good housekeeping. Clause 3 already allows different rates and exemptions for all or any of those under 26—subject, of course, to limitations on differentiating by reference to area, sector, size of company and so on. It follows that there is no point in allowing clause 4 to add descriptions of persons aged under 26 to clause 3, because they are already within clause 3.

Those are not difficult amendments. I hope that I made it clear in Committee how the Bill is constructed. It is entirely logical and recognises the need to allow for a number of possibilities, depending on what the commission has to say. In case any confusion remains, the amendments remove all doubt as to how the clauses relate to each other, and I urge the House to accept them.

New clauses 4 and 5 need not detain us for too long. A person who is a director of a company, limited or otherwise, will not be entitled to the national minimum wage. The Bill does not need to be so amended. The definitions in clause 52 make it quite clear who is covered by the Bill: directors are not workers and so are not covered. Of course, where a director is also an employee of the company, as some managing directors may be, he or she will be entitled to the national minimum wage owing to that contract of employment. The question of Ministers of the Crown was raised by, I think, the hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce). He or she is an office holder, not an employee or worker, so is not covered.

New clause 10 deals with a complex area, and I have shown a great deal of sympathy towards it, but I shall explain why it is unacceptable and why I urge the House to oppose it. We discussed the difficult issue of severely incapacitated people and therapeutic earnings in Committee, and we reached some consensus. There is no case for exemption from, or modification of, the national minimum wage for disabled workers simply on the grounds of disability. We are awaiting the recommendations of the Low Pay Commission. If any recommendations were made on the grounds of disability, it would be possible for them to be considered under the powers in clauses 3 and 4. We shall wait to see the Low Pay Commission's report.

The Government's position has always been one of principle: there should be no grounds for not paying someone a minimum wage simply on the grounds of his or her incapacity. In addition, the Government are already taking measures, under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, the access to work scheme and the supported employment programme to bridge the gap between what people with severe disabilities may be capable of earning and what they are, in practice, paid.

The Opposition's new clause 10 is overly bureaucratic and, through subsection (4), opens a loophole that could undermine the whole principle of the minimum wage. It refers to "a person"

"is . . . so affected . . . due to age or any other cause as to be incapable of earning the national minimum wage."

That is a potentially serious loophole that would invite unscrupulous employers to plead that their workers are incapable of earning a minimum wage and so should be exempted. That is unacceptable.

We have the flexibility that we need to deal with any issues that the Low Pay Commission raises in that context, so the new clause is unnecessary. Moreover, even if it is considered that there should be special provision for the disabled, the new clause goes about providing it in a way that is both wrong-headed and potentially damaging. I urge the House to oppose new clause 10.

Amendments Nos. 70 and 79 relate in some way to the minimum wage and young people. Before dealing with each amendment, I shall place them in the context of the Government's approach to encouraging young people into work. The national minimum wage is only one plank, albeit an important one, of the Government's overall strategy of encouraging people back to work and making work pay, and especially providing help for young people.

We have put together a raft of measures. The welfare-to-work programme addresses the problems faced by those without a job. Changes to the benefits system will help to build a sensible system of in-work benefits, where the taxpayer will not have to subsidise employers who are paying excessively low wages. The new deal for the young unemployed will give young people a number of routes to help them escape long-term unemployment. The Government are delivering on all of those measures.

Over and above that, my Department will consider fairness-at-work issues and employment status. All the initiatives are aimed at the same thing: getting young people into the work place, ending their exploitation and ensuring that they are trained for the challenges of the 21st century.

The Government have made it clear on a number of occasions why they have asked the Low Pay Commission to consider the subject of young people below the age of 26. Most countries with a minimum wage have some sort of special treatment for young people. The old wages councils used to have different rate for young people. Those entering the labour market for the first time are in a different position from other workers; the average wages paid to younger workers tend to be lower than those paid to older workers.

Some economic studies have found that, while a sensibly set minimum wage does not have an adverse effect on jobs as a whole, it may have an impact on jobs for young people. That is why we asked the Low Pay Commission to consider the issue and why we cannot accept amendment No. 70.

Amendment No. 79 would narrow the scope of clause 3 so that the Secretary of State would have the power to determine a different rate or even exemption, but only for workers who have not attained the age of 18.

I should emphasise one point that should be perfectly clear, but is sometimes overlooked. Clause 3 exists because we may need to use it. It is a reflection of the remit given to the Low Pay Commission. I have already explained why I have asked the commission to consider the issue of young people and the minimum wage.

I say to my hon. Friends the Members for Preston and for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) that we made it clear throughout the process that we undertook in opposition, in public debate and discussions, and in our consultations with trade unions and employers that the Low Pay Commission's remit would allow it to consider as widely as possible issues surrounding the application of the minimum wage—no less and no more than that. We have not attempted, privately or publicly, to put the Low Pay Commission in a straitjacket over recommendations about the rate of the national minimum wage or issues to do with training and young people. Before the general election, we gave a commitment that it would consider those matters and make recommendations.

Alongside our election manifesto, we published our minimum wage pledge to business, which made clear that our proposals for the national minimum wage would take account of the needs of young trainees and would not penalise occupational training activity. Before the election and since, our objectives have been to ensure that the Low Pay Commission has the flexibility to consider evidence on a range of issues and the capacity to make proposals to the Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Preston and her colleagues know of my long-standing commitment to the minimum wage and to ensuring that those in the workplace, whatever their age, do not suffer detriment at the hands of unscrupulous employers. The Bill's universality will maximise the number of workers who will be entitled to the national minimum wage: full-time, part-time, temporary, casual, agency and homeworkers and people who work for sub-contractors will be covered by the national minimum wage provisions.

After listening to what I have said about her amendment, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Preston will realise that my right hon. Friends and I are serious about passing legislation that will deal effectively with low pay issues. The legislation must be based on the Low Pay Commission's recommendations and on the Government's consideration of them. I repeat to my hon. Friend the absolute commitment that I gave in Committee: the Government will quickly make proposals based on the recommendations of the Low Pay Commission and put them to the House under the affirmative resolution procedure which will allow proper debate and accountability for those decisions. The Secretary of State will be required to explain a decision that is not completely in line with Low Pay Commission recommendations to the House.

[Mr. Ian McCartney]

I hope that my hon. Friend appreciates the strength of feeling with which I have made my remarks. The Government do not intend, as the right hon. Member for Wokingham suggested, to sneak measures past the House. Our view, in opposition and in government, has been that there should be the fullest debate on and accountability for the minimum wage, and that the House should take decisions on the rate and on other issues before the minimum wage rate is set.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I do not want the Minister to leave his dismissal of new clauses 4 and 5 where he did. Would a director who undertook no other work have a contract of employment under clause 52? That case could also be argued the other way. Surely the Minister is not saying that a company director will be excluded from the Bill's provisions if he is not also doing work for that company. We are trying to discover whether a person who decides to pay himself a lower rate under a contract of employment while a director will be excluded. Is the Minister saying that all directors will be excluded under clause 52?

Mr. McCartney: I thought that I had made it absolutely clear to the hon. Gentleman that, if directors are not workers they are not covered, except where they are an employee of the company as some managing directors are. They would be entitled to the minimum wage because they have contracts of employment. I cannot make it any clearer. The hon. Gentleman may not like the National Minimum Wage Bill, but we have been absolutely clear about where we stand on the issue of directors and definitions under clause 52.

The edifice that the hon. Gentleman has built up over the past hour and a half is a smokescreen for an attack on the national minimum wage. He has given no evidence this evening, and none was given in Committee, that demonstrate that clause 52 is defective in respect of directors. It is not defective. It is well targeted and gives rights to workers. In that context, a director is excluded.

Mr. Hammond: Does the Minister agree that most directors have a contract of service and that such people are specifically included in clause 52(3)(b)?

Mr. McCartney: That is a spurious point. Clause 52 does not cover directors because they are not designated as workers for the purposes of the Bill unless they are employees with a contract of employment. That is the clear position and I cannot make it any clearer.

Amendment No. 53 is another over-prescriptive measure of the type that we encountered many times in Committee. It would require the Secretary of State always to consult the Low Pay Commission and to follow its advice before adding any new categories of persons to clause 3. They would include, for example, potential candidates for exclusion or a modified rate of minimum wage.

The amendment is unnecessary. Before making the first regulations to set the minimum wage, the Secretary of State is required by clause 5(2)(e) to consult the Low Pay Commission on whether further classes of persons should be added to those in clause 3 who may be exempted or subjected to a different rate. That is what we are already doing. I look forward to the Commission's report on this matter.

Under clause 6, there is nothing to prevent the Secretary of State from consulting the Low Pay Commission again on this issue in future. I would not find it surprising if the Secretary of State reconvened the commission to consider the possibility of further exemptions if that was what she had in mind. However, in some cases a full-scale consultation would be unnecessary: for example, if the commission had already covered similar ground in a previous report without reaching a firm recommendation. In such cases, why force a further consultation?

These issues are all rather abstract. The Government do not intend to scurry around trying to rake up every possible candidate for exemption, which is what the Opposition have been doing in Committee for the past few months. Our starting point is that the Bill should be universal and apply to all workers. I ask the House to reject the amendment.

Amendment No. 54 would enable the Secretary of State to make regulations to add not only new classes of persons to potential candidates for exemption or a modified rate in clause 3, but to take persons who had been added to clause 3 out of that clause so that they would no longer be potential candidates for exemption or a modified rate. For two reasons, such a power is unnecessary. The first is legal. Under the Interpretation Act 1978, anything that can be done can be undone, and there is no need to spell that out. The power in clause 4 to add persons to clause 3 encapsulates the power to take them out again.

The second reason is pragmatic. Putting a person in clause 3 simply makes him or her a potential candidate for exemption or for a different rate. To achieve that, new regulations would have to be made by the Secretary of State. It remains open to the Secretary of State never to make such regulations. That means that people in clause 3 would not need to be formally removed from the clause. The Secretary of State could simply choose not to make regulations exempting them or subjecting them to a different rate. For those reasons, amendment No. 54 is unnecessary, and I ask the House to reject it.

I hope that the debate so far has led to recognition by my right hon. and hon. Friends that the one simple thread running through the speeches of Conservative Members has been a desire to find any way to undermine the Bill. Once again they have been discredited beyond belief.

The former Secretary of State for Wales, the right hon. Member for Wokingham, who has just returned to the Chamber, spent more than 20 minutes in spurious argument talking about why people in Britain should receive poverty pay and why there should be no floor to pay. He refused to say whether £1, 50p or 30p an hour was too little. Conservative Members would like people to work for nothing if that could be got away with, and that is why there will be a national minimum wage.

Mr. Redwood: Will the Minister tell the House what is too little in his judgment and in the Government's judgment? Perhaps he can answer his own question.

Mr. McCartney: The difference between the right hon. Gentleman and me is that I favour a national minimum wage and will implement it and he favours the continuation of low pay. That is why we set up the Low Pay Commission and why he has opposed its establishment tooth and nail. He has a record as long as his arm in support of low-paying employers but, after tonight, the introduction of the national minimum wage will be a little nearer. A huge number of people in Britain will be thankful when, at last, a Labour Government implement a national minimum wage.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful for the opportunity to respond to the debate. I am afraid that the Minister has signally failed to answer the debate in relation to new clause 4, which aims to exclude directors from the scope of the national minimum wage. His assertions that Conservative Members are trying to exclude people from the minimum wage have no bearing on new clause 4, because he himself says that he believes that the Bill already excludes directors from the national minimum wage. However, he has failed to answer points that were put forcefully by my hon. Friends. They have shown that clause 52 relates to people who either have a contract of employment or a contract of service. It is clear that company directors often have either of those.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My hon. Friend is not reading this completely. There is an implied contract of service. He is as familiar as I am with the Contracts of Employment Act 1963. People do not have to have a contract; it is implied by the fact that they are doing work for people.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend is right. It is possible for the contract to be not only implied, but oral and implied. The intention of Ministers in clause 52 was to make the national minimum wage universal in its application. The notes on clauses that were supplied to the Standing Committee say that the clause is intended to be universal in its application. They explain that that does not include people who are described as "genuinely self-employed", but they do not refer to the fact that directors are excluded. The logic of the new clause is either to give effect to the Government's intentions or, if the Minister is wrong about clause 52, to give effect to what should be the Government's intentions.

Mr. Redwood: Can my hon. Friend explain why the Minister says Conservative Members have to answer what will be a satisfactory minimum wage when we have said that we favour a minimum income and we set out rates of that minimum income in office, yet the Minister, who believes in a minimum wage, is unable to tell us what minimum wage he finds acceptable? I find that difficult to understand. Has my hon. Friend worked it out?

Mr. Lansley: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. The Minister has been hiding behind the polite fiction that this is all going to be left to the Low Pay Commission. If it were all left to the commission, clauses 3 and 4 would be written differently; they would allow the commission to vary the minimum wage by reference to area, occupation or otherwise, but that is not what Ministers want. The Minister has said that he has not led the commission at all, but anyone who reads paragraph 66 of the Government's evidence to the commission will know that the Government want it to specify a lower national minimum wage rate for people under the age of 26 and not to specify a training rate.

The Government have signally failed to answer the points that have been made about new clause 4, which would give effect to what the Minister says are his intentions—although he has not explained how the Bill currently achieves them. For that reason, I invite my colleagues to join me in pressing new clause 4 to a Division.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Question accordingly negatived.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

It being after Ten o'clock, further consideration of the Bill stood adjourned.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the National Minimum Wage Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Betts.]

Question agreed to.

As amended (in the Standing Committee), again considered.

New clause 8

POWER OF SECRETARY OF STATE TO SUSPEND THE NATIONAL MINIMUM WAGE IN THE CASE OF NATIONAL OR LOCAL ECONOMIC EMERGENCIES

'.—(1) The Secretary of State, after such consultation with the Low Pay Commission as may be reasonably practicable, may by order suspend the operation of this Act if he is satisfied that such suspension is required in the public interest by extreme economic circumstances.

(2) An order under subsection (1) may provide for the operation of this Act to be suspended in whole or in part and, in particular, may provide for the provisions of this Act to be suspended in respect of—

(a) any area or description of area; or

(b) any individual employer.

(3) No order shall be made under subsection (2)(b) above unless the employer has given the Secretary of State not less than 30 days' notice in such form as may be prescribed that, in the opinion of the employer, such an order is necessary in order to prevent the loss of jobs.

(4) A statutory instrument containing an order under this section shall be laid before Parliament after being made.

(5) Unless an order under this section is approved by resolution of each House of Parliament before the end of the period of 28 days beginning with the day on which it is made, it shall cease to have effect at the end of that period.

(6) In reckoning the period of 28 days for the purposes of subsection (3), no account shall be taken of any time during which Parliament is dissolved or prorogued or during which either House is adjourned for more than 4 days.

(7) An order under this section which does not cease to have effect before the end of the period of 3 months beginning with the day on which it is made shall cease to have effect at the end of that period.'.—[Mr. Boswell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Boswell: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause provides for the suspension of the national minimum wage in the event of national or local economic emergencies. It is, perhaps, rather better drafted than one or two—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order.

Mr. Boswell: The new clause is, perhaps, rather better drafted than some Opposition new clauses have been over the years, not just because of the admirable assistance of the Clerks' Department but because there is a clear precedent in legislation that is being considered even now. We owe the reference to "extreme economic circumstances" to the Bank of England Bill. I am not sure that I would have used that phrase in drafting legislation, but the Government seem comfortable with it and use it as a legal base, so we have copied it.

In offering the Government new clause 8, I hope that the Minister of State will accept our bona fides. He has consistently suggested—in Standing Committee and subsequently—that we are seeking to belittle his Bill, subvert it or denude it of content. In fact, we are providing for the Secretary of State an enhanced set of powers to use in particular circumstances. They are precedented, and the ability to make use of them would be beneficial to any Secretary of State of whatever party.

10.15 pm

I mentioned that the powers provided under the new clause are based on those in the Bank of England Bill, but they differ in a number of particulars. First, because they have a separate application, subsection (1) suggests that the Secretary of State should hold "such consultation with the Low Pay Commission as may be reasonably practical".

I suppose that is a lawyer's term of art—not that I am a lawyer—but it is the nearest we can get to recommending to the Secretary of State to take the advice of her or his Low Pay Commission, even in difficult circumstances and at short notice, and, if it is possible, not to go ahead without having done that.

Secondly, the new clause provides not merely for a global suspension of the entire concept of a national minimum wage under the emergency powers, but for partial suspension in particular circumstances.

It is clear that the exact circumstances under which emergency powers should be invoked to suspend the national minimum wage were not clear at the time of our drafting the new clause; nor could they be—an argument which the Government used to their advantage or to convince the Standing Committee considering the Bank of England Bill, by saying that it would be unreasonable to specify the circumstances in which emergency powers would be invoked.

I should like to offer the House two examples—one is historic and the other is by analogy. Dealing first with the historic one, it will be in the memory of a number of right hon. and hon. Members—and in my memory as, at the time, I was a researcher for the Conservative party—that when Lord Healey was Chancellor of the Exchequer, he was about to go to Heathrow airport to fly to an international meeting when he was summoned back because, sadly for him and perhaps less sadly for the economy in the disturbed circumstances of 1976, the International Monetary Fund was summoned in. The boys in blue—the bailiffs—arrived to sort out the British economy. I realise that it is a painful memory for Labour Members, and I would not wish to claim that they have a monopoly on economic difficulties, although it sometimes seems that way.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): What about the exchange rate mechanism?

Mr. Boswell: I wondered whether the hon. Gentleman would be alert enough to refer to that; in a sense, he makes my point for me. Any economic difficulty may arise, and although I anticipate—perhaps sooner than we expect—the early return of a Conservative Government, nevertheless I would not wish to say that any future Government would be insulated from the laws of economics. That shows that Governments get into economic difficulties, which might include pressure on resources and for a restraint in wages to retain the competitiveness of the UK economy.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): When my hon. Friend expands further, as I hope he will, on the possible circumstances in which his excellent provision may be invoked, will he dwell on the possibility of our joining a single European currency and perhaps a version of the exchange rate mechanism before that? Does he believe that the economic pressures involved could bring about an invocation of the measure to protect elements of our domestic economy, particularly our employment?

Mr. Boswell: My right hon. Friend is incredibly perceptive. The next part of my speech addresses that point. He and I may not always agree in every particular on matters European—although we often find ourselves on the same side of the argument. I was about to share with the House my concern that our complete adoption of the single European currency could result in turbulence across the exchanges. That could also be a repercussive effect of the adoption of the euro by other member states. Both situations could have a disturbing effect.

After the Monetary Policy Committee's decision last week—to the surprise of some—not to put interest rates up, the pound broke through the DM3 barrier again. As the likelihood of the euro among the eleven firms up between now and May and as we continue with an apparently restrictive monetary policy, particularly if it is not buttressed with other measures in the Budget—I leave those for the consideration of my Treasury colleagues—there could be a runaway escalation in British exchange rates, which would be highly damaging for our competitiveness. Conversely, if we joined a single currency in due course, we might find it difficult to sustain our exchange rate. We would have to take the strain through higher unemployment, because there would be no exchange rate mechanism to correct the situation as we lost competitiveness.

The analogy with the forced monetary union of East Germany with the federal republic in 1990, after the fall of the wall, makes the point of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) eloquently. It is an awful warning to those who advocate exchange rate unity by fiat, assuming that the problems can be blown away by uniting currencies, that, almost overnight, East Germany lost even those parts of its productive industry that were relatively competitive. It has had a high, sustained and rising unemployment rate, buttressed by huge monetary and budgetary transfers. Unemployment is still rising, and is currently hovering around 20 per cent.

That is not satisfactory, and I do not advocate it. We are proposing that, in extreme economic circumstances—within the euro or outwith it—it should be possible, after consultation, to suspend the operation of the national minimum wage.

Mr. Rowe: Does the definition of extreme economic circumstances include going to war? The likelihood of such an activity seems to be growing rather than diminishing.

Mr. Boswell: Having strayed into matters related to economic policy, I am not sure that I also wish to dilate on matters relating to foreign policy, except to say that I share some of my hon. Friend's concerns. The news tonight about the Balkans was particularly disturbing. Historically, the outbreak of widespread war has led to rapid changes in bank rates and might be exactly the extreme economic circumstances which would be addressed by the new clause.

I repeat that there is no blueprint for the kind of emergency which is envisaged. We are arguing that a wise and prudent Government, of whatever colour, should equip themselves with a mechanism that could handle such changes. I am genuinely frightened that the national minimum wage, at whatever rate it is set, may impose a cost structure in which a shock would render our economy uncompetitive, and our unemployment would soar through the roof. Nobody wants that; the Government do not intend it. We are trying to provide a bottom line which would avoid it.

I turn to the other element of the new clause which differs from the analogous situation under the Bank of England Bill, to which I have referred. Given that, according to the Government, there is to be a national minimum wage, applicable, without discrimination, by area, by sector of employment, by undertakings of different size, by persons of different ages or by classes of different occupations, the minimum wage—at least when it started out on Second Reading—was to be a universal national minimum wage, with the possibility of different rates for persons under 26, to which we shall return.

Given that that is what the Government intended, we have been arguing—in a way which I know the Minister thinks is subversive to the whole principle—that Governments, in due humility, should be prepared to consider exceptions if those are appropriate. The Government should think long and hard if there is to be a trade-off between their amour propre, in saying that there should be a single universal national minimum wage, and the consequence of a high and rising systematic rate of unemployment in a particular area or industry.

New clause 8(2) considers the possibility of a suspension in part. There are two possible tests for that. One is by area, and I shall deal with that first. As we said in Committee—I do not say this as a prediction, because, as the Minister and the Under-Secretary know, the facts show the following comparison is the greatest economic divergence—the economy of Northern Ireland has a very different costs and wage structure from other parts of the United Kingdom. It is not unique in that; it is only a little behind the north-east of England, but it is an extreme in comparison with Greater London.

The extreme is so apparent: on average, wages in Northern Ireland are 60 per cent. of those in Greater London. The bottom decile of employment in Northern Ireland yields a rate of £3.50 an hour. In London, the figure is £4.72. That marks not only the metropolitan centres of Belfast and London, which have highly capitalised industries. It also includes the impact in rural areas where there is much higher unemployment, greater seasonality of employment, and certain trades, such as hospitality and agriculture, which, historically, tend to pay lower rates.

Suspension should be provided for in case the Government find that, in the end, a single national minimum rate causes high unemployment because the rate will have been bid up in sensitive areas such as Northern Ireland and the north-east of England.

The area need not be as big as a province or a region. We might debate—and, in a different context, we have debated extensively—the concept of regional development agencies. I find it a little distasteful that my regional capital, if I may call it that, of Nottingham, a city which I like, is 100 miles from my home—the journey does not require me to leave the east midlands region significantly, if at all—whereas I live much nearer to the centre of London, and to this place, than I do to Nottingham. Perhaps economic regions are too wide for the purposes of the new clause.

However, if we were considering areas, which are not specified in detail in new clause 8, we might consider development areas, assisted areas, objective 1 areas, objective 2 areas or objective 5b areas. By definition, those areas are likely to be subject to the greatest economic pressure.

I was disturbed, but not wholly surprised, to read in today's newspaper that Mrs. Wulf-Mathies, the European Commissioner who deals with the structural funds, has outlined a rather dusty scenario for our future regional assistance. If we are to lose European funds, we may well find the pressures on employment in some parts of the country even more intense.

The second provision in subsection (2) of the new clause allows for a suspension in respect of "any individual employer." I emphasise that this is not simply a matter of an employer waking up in the morning and saying, "I do not like the national minimum wage. I do not feel like paying it to my staff." It would be clearly linked by subsection (3) to a formal notice in an approved form to the Secretary of State, prescribing that, in the opinion of the employer, such an order was necessary to prevent the loss of jobs. The concept would bear a close similarity to the idea of the statutory notification of impending redundancies, and although I have an open mind on the subject, I believe that it might be appropriate to combine the two into one process.

Ministers continue to say, without telling us what the national minimum wage will be, that there will be no problem if the national minimum wage is sensibly struck. That is a circular argument, if ever I heard one. While they continue to say that everything will be all right in this new economic Britain to which we are all pointed, and to which the Bill points us, in the real world some employers will feel the pinch. There will be employers whose businesses may be destroyed by the national minimum wage. Not only will their businesses go, but the employment opportunities that they offer their staff will go.

Mr. Forth: I confess that, although I am impressed by my hon. Friend's argument, I am slightly surprised that he has not included in new clause 8 a reference to a business sector. He has covered the concept of area and is now discussing the possibility of individual employers being affected by the national minimum wage. Has he considered that a whole sector may be appropriate for such treatment? I have in mind, for example, a heavily export-oriented sector, especially adversely affected by an exchange rate movement, or perhaps a sector that has been affected by a change in the competitive environment—in a competitive trading nation, or another such factor. Did my hon. Friend consider that as a possibility, and did he consciously decide not to include it in the provisions of his new clause?

Mr. Boswell: Not for the first time, my right hon. Friend almost anticipates me. I could have done as he suggests, but I was conscious of the Government's doctrine that there is to be no differentiation by sector or area generally. Therefore, I was conscious that it might be appropriate, particularly as we should like to help the Government and we want them to adopt our new clause or something like it, to provide for only a limited power—one that would be keyed either to defined areas or to particular firms experiencing difficulty.

If a sector—motor cars, for example—were experiencing difficulties, one would not need to go through many manufacturers. If the component industry were added in, there would be more, and it would be possible to specify a group of manufacturers by listing them, provided that they were prepared to produce the sort of certificate that the clause would require.

My right hon. Friend is on a good point, which is that changing economic circumstances and an economic shock could have a disproportionate effect on a particular industry. His example is better than the one that I would have cited, because he is considering the shock effects of, for example, a change in exchange rates. I might also have added the possibilities of pressure on a whole industry, had I wanted to go for a sectoral solution. For example, certain industries will experience pressure under the national minimum wage, including catering and hospitality, hairdressing, aspects of horticulture and so forth.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): As my hon. Friend mentioned agriculture in his response to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), may I draw his attention to the double effect on horticulture of pressure from the strong pound on exports coupled with the need for labour flexibility? I am thinking of seasonal work, part-time work and occasional work—all things with which he will be familiar as an expert in that field. In my constituency, the minimum wage in horticulture could have a damaging effect because of that dual threat.

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend is a formidable advocate for his constituency, with its huge and significant horticultural interests. He is right to point to the fact that horticulture is already under one severe threat from exchange rates, which would be compounded to a double whammy with a second threat from a national minimum wage. I am not giving him the whole solution in the new clause, because the suspension would have to happen ex-post in the case of an immediate threat to jobs. However, it would provide a mechanism if the scenario that the Government do not believe could happen did occur. It would be appropriate for such a situation.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend is kind in giving way. He amply answered my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). Before he moves on, will he recognise that it is possible to think in terms of a number of employers in an industry together, and that that sort of example fits well with the concept in the European Community of an industry being in manifest crisis? From the view of managing those economic circumstances, is it not more advantageous to enable those employers temporarily to reduce costs rather than require the Exchequer to engage temporarily in an additional subsidy?

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend makes two valuable points. First, he reminds the House of the concept of a manifest crisis as a term of art for an industry that is facing severe problems, probably internationally. Secondly, he makes the appropriate point that it is better to keep people in work and out of benefit—I believe that new Labour is supposed to favour that—and to keep businesses flourishing, rather than let them break down, go bust and have to be bailed out, or effectively compensated, by the Exchequer for what has happened. He is right.

The new clause envisages an emergency, when time will be short. A Government could—perhaps the Government would want to do this if any such circumstance were to arise—publish draft regulations that would be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. They may even be able to consult the Low Pay Commission before doing so. The new clause, however, would provide for a negative procedure: an order would be made, it would be laid before Parliament, and if it was not approved within 28 days it would be void. Under the emergency provisions set out in the new clause, the order could not continue for more than three months, in any case, even if it was approved by the House.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): Will my hon. Friend say whether there is anything in the new clause that would compel the Government to use the order-making power? Given that the Bill already contains order-making powers—in clauses 39 and 49, for example—and that most of the Government's legislation is littered with powers for Secretaries of State to make orders in certain circumstances, can he think of a good reason why the Government should reject a further order-making power, which they can use at their discretion when they determine?

Mr. Boswell: My right hon. Friend makes a seductive case. We are offering the new clause to the Government on a plate, as an appropriate ancillary to the powers that they have already included in the Bill. I could not agree more on his general point—frankly, if there were no orders in the Bill, there would be no Bill at all. The Bill depends entirely on regulations, and we do not know what will be in them, as we do not know what the Low Pay Commission will say—and the Government will not tell us. When the Government tell us, we shall know and we shall be able to debate the matter, which is an odd way in which to go on.

Mr. Rowe: I have not had the opportunity to study the Bill in as much detail as my hon. Friend has, and I am not absolutely clear about this issue. On occasions, individual firms and, indeed, sectors of industry have come together and asked whether they could take a cut in wages to tide them over a particular problem.

Mr. Maclean: Like the Cabinet.

Mr. Rowe: Am I right in thinking that that would be illegal under the Bill?

Mr. Boswell: I am not sure that I would use the word "illegal"—it would depend whether an order was made or an offence was created. I think that, ultimately, such actions probably would be illegal if they were persisted in. I heard my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) commenting, as an aside, on the activities of the members of the Cabinet, who recently clubbed together in not taking their salary increases. Such actions would also be inconsistent with the power that is set out later in the Bill, under which it will be possible, as part of bailing out a dispute in a conciliation agreement, to allow for a lower rate to have been paid.

My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) makes a valuable point. If trade unions, for example, are faced with the stark choice between jobs and high pay leading to no jobs, they may settle for lower pay to retain their jobs.

The most flexible labour markets, such as the one in the United States which, I concede immediately, has a modest national minimum wage—[Interruption.] It is very much lower than what the Low Pay Commission or the Government are likely to propose. In the United States, which has a flexible labour market, such trade-off bargaining between job possibilities and wages happens extensively.

Mr. Forth: I want to press my hon. Friend on the point that our hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) made. It strikes me as distinctly possible that a company—or indeed an industry or a sector—could find that the only way in which it could protect its work force was to negotiate a voluntary pay reduction that could take the lower-paid below the minimum rate.

I well recall that, many years ago when I worked in industry, a Swiss firm that supplied my company did exactly that. It negotiated a pay reduction across the board, to protect all the jobs. That successful strategy made a great impression on me. If the new clause is not accepted, there will be a distinct danger of denying that sensible course not only to employers but, more important, to employees. Does my hon. Friend share my interpretation and my worry?

10.45 pm

Mr. Boswell: Yes, and yes.

Mr. Bercow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Boswell: I will, but for the very last time.

Mr. Bercow: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend, whose forbearance under provocation is always admirable.

Further to the point made by our right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), does my hon. Friend agree that it would be especially extraordinary if the Government were to decline to agree to a suspension of the terms of the legislation in a case in which a public sector employer and a public sector union agreed that that eventuality was desirable? The Government would be punishing themselves and failing to afford themselves the opportunity offered by both the employer and the employees' representative.

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend piles Pelion on Ossa, as they say. He merely intensifies the point. The Government will probably want to say that there is absolutely no question of the Chancellor of the Exchequer so ordering the nation's finances as to require any part of the public sector to pay poverty wages, as they would define them, but such a situation could easily arise given the large proportion of people in the care sector who are either directly or indirectly influenced by public sector settlements.

I might have got on a little better if, instead of simply describing a circumstance in which there had to be a redundancy notification to the Secretary of State, we had further provided for a trade union seal of good housekeeping in the new clause. Perhaps we should have added a provision saying, "as a result of a collective agreement between a recognised trade union and employers' organisation to take a lower rate than the national minimum wage". That might have got the new clause past the Government.

In all humility—the humility that they claim for themselves and deny to us—the Government should admit that, from time to time, Governments will run into difficulties nationally, and that, if that happens, there should be a mechanism for suspending the minimum wage, if Ministers consider, after taking advice, that that is the sensible course. That is even more likely to happen locally, or in relation to one or two firms or industries.

I am happy for any necessary safeguards to be put in place—if it makes it more palatable for the Government to put in a reference to trade unions, I would go along with that—but it would be wise to provide a safety valve, as was done in the Bank of England Bill. If the Government are not prepared to accept the new clause, they must explain why.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend seems to be coming to the end of his speech. I hope that he is not, because he has not—it must be an oversight on his part—covered subsection (7) of the new clause. I hoped that he would say a few words about that provision, because it caught my eye. If I read it correctly, it appears to say that an automaticity is built into the provision, whereby it will cease to have an effect after only three months, regardless of the circumstances. That seems to be an unnecessarily harsh restriction, because we do not know the duration of the circumstances that might invoke the use of the provision. I seek clarification from my hon. Friend. Is such automaticity built into the provision? Can he explain his reasoning and reassure me on that point?

Mr. Boswell: I briefly adverted to the fact that the power, being an emergency power, would automatically come to an end. I suspect that the House is familiar with the economic variation of the Gertrude Stein saying—"A trend is a trend is a trend." The question is always whether a trend will end through some unforeseen force. We do not know what might happen in three months, but that is the key to an emergency situation. It would be open to Ministers, in the three-month period, to come to a more acceptable long-term arrangement and, given the circumstances that my hon. Friends have adumbrated, it might be sensible to do so.

Mr. Lansley: In so far as my hon. Friend has followed the construction of the provisions in the Bank of England Bill for similar extreme economic circumstances, is it not logical that if, 28 days before the end of the three-month period, it was clear that the extreme economic circumstances were persisting, it would be open to the Government to bring forward a new order to extend the period of suspension of the national minimum wage? The Government would, of course, need to secure Parliament's agreement that exceptional circumstances applied.

Mr. Boswell: That is a helpful comment, and I shall close on it. It would be possible for the Government to come back to Parliament. The Government should not use a power and then abuse it to pull a fast one on the House. New clause 8 is an emergency provision, but an emergency could extend over longer than merely the three months prescribed, even if parliamentary approval were secured for the initial order. We cannot foresee the future, and we do not know what might go wrong. The Government would be wise to concede that events do not always turn out as they anticipate, and that it would be sensible to have a flexible provision such as new clause 8 to cater for such eventualities.

Mr. Maclean: I wish to comment reasonably briefly on new clause 8.

I cannot remember an occasion during my time in the House on which a Government rejected an order-making power that it would not cause them any grief to accept. I have looked at a few Bills tonight, and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) pointed out, this Bill is littered with order-making powers. The Fireworks Bill, a private Member's Bill, has 16 clauses, and all 16 would introduce a regulation-making power so that the relevant Minister could regulate every aspect of fireworks. Other Bills have a similar content.

[Mr. Maclean]

What do the Government have to lose by including in the Bill an order-making power, the use of which is at the sole discretion of the Government? The Government would determine whether serious economic circumstances prevailed. If they decided that economic circumstances did not satisfy the criteria in new clause 8, they would not have to use the power.

Mr. Forth: May I try to help my right hon. Friend? Is it not possible that the Government fear that, if they accepted the new clause and invoked it in the way described by my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), and it was seen to be successful in protecting employment, it would demonstrate, as we have argued all along, that the Bill's broader provisions are disadvantageous to employment? Might that not explain their reluctance?

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. Friend is right. If the Government reject the new clause, it will be out of pure political dogma. It is sheer political dogma to reject an order-making power that they do not have to use. They fear that it will be regarded as a tacit admission that they may have difficulties that could necessitate its use. If it was used, and saved a certain employment, region or individual employer from the consequences of the minimum wage, people would point to the general failings of the Bill. For the Government to reject it out of political dogma would show how much faith they have in their legislation.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) intends to press new clause 8 to a vote. After hearing my hon. Friends and the Minister's reply, I look forward to pushing it to a vote personally. An important principle is at stake, and it reflects ill on a Government who put regulation-making powers into almost every clause of their legislation to reject this one.

The other reason we need new clause 8 is that I think the country is heading into recession. The Chancellor bungled his first Budget, and failed to damp down the level of the pound. We have had five interest rate increases and our manufacturing sector is suffering. Dire economic circumstances could occur much more quickly than the Government or commentators expect.

The first area heading for recession is the countryside and our rural economy. I see the effects of the Government's attack on the countryside in my constituency and in other parts of the country. We have had petrol price increases in the past 10 months, and we shall probably have a vicious increase next Tuesday. Coupled with their other measures on the rural economy, such as abolition of the Rural Development Commission—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. The right hon. Gentleman is going rather wide of the mark. Will he return to new clause 8?

Mr. Maclean: Of course, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was doing that by noting that the abolition of the Rural Development Commission means that job prospects in rural areas will be diminished. With effects of the minimum wage, we may get a rather rapid recession in the countryside—greater than we have had for 40 or 50 years, greater than between the wars.

Mr. Rowe: Is not my right hon. Friend pointing to the fact that extreme economic circumstances can arise in a sector very swiftly, whether through the influence of something over which Governments have no control, such as BSE, through some temporary cessation of supply, or through a severe frost in the fruit industry? In such circumstances, many people would rather keep their work force together by agreement with them than be forced to lay them off.

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is right. Many of us in rural areas recall the severe frost last May that destroyed a huge part of our plum crop. That damaged that sector of the economy.

When you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, reminded me to stay within the terms of the new clause, I was giving some examples of circumstances which might result in dire economic conditions, and in which it might be appropriate to use the order-making power in new clause 8. I shall return shortly to the subject of how essential that power is in relation to the countryside, but first I shall give another example of exceptional circumstances.

I was a member of the Government when Kuwait was invaded—I think it was 2 August 1992. During the build-up to the Gulf war, there was a severe downturn in the tourist industry, because many people were afraid to use airlines. Our tourist business was severely affected, and I remember statements being made by my colleagues in the Government and by the British Tourist Authority trying to reassure people around the world that it was safe to fly and to come to Britain. There was a huge downturn in the number of American visitors to this country. Thankfully, that effect was short-lived, but it had severe consequences for a rather fragile sector of our economy—the tourist industry.

That is a textbook case in which, for a period—for three months, perhaps extended for a further three months—it would have made sense to use the power in the new clause to lift the consequences of the minimum wage from that sector, where there had been a huge fall in employment. Tourism employs people seasonally or part time. People in that industry would have preferred to hang on to their jobs and take a pay cut while waiting for the war to end and the economy to pick up, rather than be dismissed because companies did not have the business to sustain their employment.

Mr. Bercow: Tourism is an apposite case, because, for much of the past few years, the industry has objected to the very idea of a national minimum wage, fearing that it will produce economic calamities for the industry. The circumstances of a particular downturn that my right hon. Friend describes make the application of a suspension that much more appropriate. Is it not a case of either being able to remain afloat in such circumstances or sinking altogether?

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Tourism is a textbook case, and it is an entirely apposite example of an industry in which the minimum wage could be suspended because of short-term economic problems.

We might have another oil crisis. I know that we have a convention requirement to stock 79 or 80 days' supply of oil to stave off such a crisis, but who can tell what form the next crisis may take? Events in the middle east or the Balkans may lead to another crisis, whether or not it is genuine. It does not require a genuine crisis to bring about a lack of confidence in the markets and among economic commentators, and, in those circumstances, particular sectors or areas of the country could be severely affected.

The Government would then be in a bit of a panic. They could do all the spin-doctoring they liked, but spin-doctoring would not remove the problem that the national minimum wage might severely affect workers in a specific area or sector. The Government would be powerless to do anything about it. However, if they could use the order-making power contained in new clause 8, they would be able to overcome a short-term crisis.

One of the main points of contention is the economic crisis that will affect rural areas and all types of employment there—not only agricultural workers, who are covered by the Agricultural Wages Board, but all other workers, such as those working in tourism or in agricultural supply. The dire economic circumstances envisaged in the new clause are coming about rather more quickly in rural areas than any of us would like.

The Government might ask what point there would be in suspending the minimum wage for three months, but the power would be extendable. In much the same way as we extend the Prevention of Terrorism Act annually, provision could be built into new clause 8 to allow the Government to extend the three-month period as they saw fit. The new clause would allow the Government to suspend the impact of the minimum wage in objective 5b areas, where people are suffering because of the economic crisis caused by the Government's bungling of policies for the countryside.

Mr. Boswell: My right hon. Friend may remember that I had ministerial responsibility for objective 5b areas, as he had in the early days of the scheme. I confirm that the economies of areas that are likely to benefit from an objective 5b scheme are highly marginal, and would be severely affected by a national minimum wage at anything like the indicated rate.

Mr. Maclean: When we refer to geographical areas, we tend to think of counties or regions, but I am quite clear in my mind that the areas that would benefit most from the power exempting them from the requirements of the minimum wage are those such as objective 5b areas. Large parts of the west country and of the north Pennines will suffer abominably in the next few years, unless the Government take positive action to help them. So far, the Government have shown that they do not understand how rural areas tick.

If we cannot teach the Government how rural areas work, we can at least give them the power to help those areas when they get into severe trouble as a result of more Government bungling, or of a minimum wage set at an inappropriate level. Such a level may work in a booming economy, but it would seriously impinge on rural areas whose economy is suffering.

I urge the Government to accept the new clause. They may not agree with my analysis of the downturn in our economy, or of the severe economic crisis that many rural areas face, but they must recognise that the new clause gives them a power they can use if they wish: the Opposition parties cannot make it happen; the Low Pay Commission is not in the driving seat, and cannot initiate these powers. The Government would decide whether to use this power. If they reject the new clause, it will be purely out of economic and political dogma, and not because they have great belief in the minimum wage.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): It is appropriate for us to debate this new clause 10 months into a Labour Government, because it makes provision for economic emergencies, which are synonymous with Labour Governments. Had we had a minimum wage in 1924, new clause 8 would have been needed within 10 months of the first Labour Government taking office, because they had collapsed in the face of rising unemployment. Had we had a minimum wage at the time of the second Labour Government in 1929, new clause 8 would have been needed, because by 1931 we had been forced off the gold standard, which triggered the worst recession this century.

We would have needed new clause 8 had we had a minimum wage at the time of the third Labour Government, from 1945 to 1951, when there were acute shortages and rationing was continuing after the war. We would have needed new clause 8 had we had a minimum wage during the 1964-70 Labour Government, who had persistent balance of payments crises. As my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) said, had we had a minimum wage, we would undoubtedly have needed new clause 8 at multiple points during the 1974-79 Labour Government, when the International Monetary Fund had to intervene, and we had the winter of discontent.

Mr. Lansley: In the Standing Committee considering the Bank of England Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry questioned the Economic Secretary to the Treasury on whether this power would have been used in those circumstances. She avoided answering him by saying that the question did not apply, because a different method of managing interest rates is being used: it is now by reference to an inflation target rather than by direct Government control.

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point, which enables me to refer to the excellent speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean).

In choosing to hand over control of interest rates to the Bank of England, the Government have made more likely the need for new clause 8. There will be substantial economic emergencies because of rapid rises in interest rates and the fact that the Bank of England is not required to pay attention to the wider needs of the economy but simply to aim at an inflation target.

The chances of the new clause needing to be triggered, if it were in the legislation, have increased as a result of some of the Government's decisions in their early months in office. There is clearly a need for such a provision, and the strength of the new clause is that it enables the emergency provision to be triggered in one of several circumstances. We have heard how it could be triggered by difficulties in a specific area. My constituency in Cumbria in the lake district adjoins that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border. As he and other hon. Members have said, among the sectors that will be most affected by the minimum wage are tourism and agriculture.

Let us imagine doomsday or worst case scenarios in my part of the world, which depends heavily on tourism. A repetition of the 1986 Chernobyl disaster, which resulted in the dumping over large areas of Cumbria of dangerous radioactive substances could cause severe economic difficulties for agriculture and tourism. Imagine—heaven forfend—what would happen if there were an outbreak of rabies in Cumbria. That would be an immense deterrent to visitors, and would trigger emergency action. New clause 8 would be relevant, because many people in my constituency and elsewhere who were coping with such disasters would much prefer to have, temporarily or on a prolonged basis, a lower-paid job than no job at all.

Mr. Forth: One thing which puzzled me in the early part of the debate, but which will probably emerge as the debate proceeds, is that there has been no mention of the differential impact on small enterprises, and especially those that are labour-intensive. I suspect that such companies predominate in my hon. Friend's constituency and that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean). Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the main aims of the new clause is to seek to provide easement or protection for such small labour-intensive companies? Does he agree about the significance of that?

Mr. Collins: My right hon. Friend is right, and his intervention is helpful. He mentions exactly the sort of factor that sensible legislation should take into account. The new clause would enable the easement of economic difficulties that could be ridden out by a large multinational. ICI is likely to survive anything. It has survived 70 or 80 years of depressions and recessions, and even successive Labour Governments, which testifies to the longevity of any company.

The small firms that provide only one, two or three jobs are likely to be the engines for future jobs. They are currently being assailed by advertisements to join the Government's new deal to help the young unemployed, and they are the firms most likely to find themselves in the economic firing line. Without the protection of new clause 8, they will not be able to deal with some of the problems that arise.

I think of the difficulties that might prevail in my county of Cumbria if there were an incident at the nuclear installation at Sellafield. That could cause severe economic problems throughout the north-west and north of England. There would undoubtedly be an emergency, and it would be imperative to maintain the economic fabric by keeping some jobs and enterprises going.

Imagine, for example, what might happen in our part of the world if, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border said, there were a recurrence of the oil crisis. In current circumstances, that is a distinct possibility. It is barely two or three weeks since the House was seriously conducting a debate on the general expectation—I think that it was shared by hon. Members on both sides of the House—that, by the time we reached this point in March, British, American and other forces would be engaged in combat in the middle east and in Iraq.

My right hon. Friend reminded us of the economic consequences of the Gulf war in 1990. We remember the oil crisis in 1973-74 and the immense effect that the sudden, overnight and unexpected acceleration of the oil price had throughout the economy.

Mr. Boswell: I do not know whether my hon. Friend has noticed the answer that I secured to a written question the other day about petroleum stock levels. It showed that they were only two days over the indicated level, which reflects several things, including oil companies' reluctance to continue with heavy inventories. Does he agree that, although it is important not to alarm people unnecessarily, that shows the vulnerability of any modern economy to economic shocks?

Mr. Collins: I agree with my hon. Friend. The other reason that new clause 8 is so important is that it reflects the fact that, since 1974, there has been substantial structural change in the modern industrialised economies. We have moved to what is called the "just in time" philosophy. That means that companies no longer have large stocks of equipment, supplies or other things in their factories. They are used to being able to call instantly on the resources they need, which will include labour resources as well as imported and domestic raw materials.

If an economy is so dependent on transport and on the idea that an order can be placed today and raw materials will be in place tomorrow, and if that network were impeded in any one of the ways we hear about—the impact of the millennium bug when we reach the new millennium, or of a terrorist attack on major installations of power complexes—the consequences could be terrible. I have referred my hon. Friends to a report earlier this evening on "Channel 4 News", which showed the desperate circumstances of businesses in Auckland, New Zealand, which face the prospect of months of power cuts.

By any definition, those are economic crises that would make it next to impossible for some businesses to stay viable and to pay a national statutory minimum wage, which might have been determined in circumstances where any of those things seemed completely remote: power cuts, computers failing, a massive oil crisis or international developments leading to war. All those might not have been taken into account by the Low Pay Commission in setting the national statutory minimum wage level, but all would amount to a clear and present economic emergency for many businesses in a geographical area, business sector or particular part of the country. In those circumstances, new clause 8 would afford them valuable and absolutely vital protection.

New clause 8 has several other merits. It allows for the Low Pay Commission to be consulted, if it is reasonably practicable. There is no question of it being sidelined by the new clause. However, it is intended to be triggered in circumstances of emergency, where there is likely to be urgency, so the Secretary of State is given flexibility. If the Secretary of State is confident that he or she has the power and time to consult the commission, they may do so. If not, that does not prevent them from acting.

Mr. Boswell: Does my hon. Friend agree that, if push came to shove, a telephone call to the Low Pay Commission chairman would be better than nothing?

Mr. Collins: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, who again demonstrates the essential reasonableness, rationality and moderation of new clause 8, which is, sadly, a little lost on the Government Front-Bench team. It may deeply regret not having accepted the new clause.

Mr. Syms: Will my hon. Friend consider this aspect? Would not consulting the Low Pay Commission be vital to politicians, who, faced with a crisis, could lean on a commission of experts to give advice on the matter, rather than take arbitrary political decisions?

Mr. Collins: I agree with my hon. Friend, who once again points to one of the great strengths of new clause 8. It would write into the Bill something that would be welcome in any legislation introduced since 1 May 1997—a requirement that Parliament be consulted and that the House takes the final decision on the fate of any orders brought in under new clause 8. Throughout the Bill, order-making powers are given to the Secretary of State, in very general terms, without any reference to this House.

A common pattern across the Government's legislation is the giving of immense discretion to Secretaries of State, other Ministers, new assemblies or parliaments or other quangos that the Government are creating or amending. New clause 8 would directly give Parliament the power to approve or disapprove an order. Of course the Secretary of State could act with immediacy and urgency in a pressing economic crisis, but equally it would be for Parliament to take a view on whether the Secretary of State had acted properly and whether he should continue with any action he had taken.

Mr. Bercow: In view of the evident reasonableness of new clause 8, does my hon. Friend agree that the only possible explanation for the Government's refusal to contemplate accepting it is that they have so often gone on the record insisting that a national minimum wage could not contribute to an economic downturn, and that they now feel unable to do an about-turn and admit that they might have been wrong? Is it not an example of what the late and distinguished economist and political philosopher Friedrich von Hayek described as the "fatal conceit"?

Mr. Collins: I agree with my hon. Friend, as I am sure he would agree with me that the Government are guilty of any number of fatal conceits, which will no doubt lead to their imminent demise.

I disagree with one small part of what my hon. Friend said, in that he advanced only one possible theory for the Government opposing new clause 8. There is another theory, which is that they are already beginning to hear the flapping wings of the chickens presently stacked over Heathrow but ready to come down to roost over Downing street. They fear that the powers given in new clause 8 to a Secretary of State would soon be powers exercised not by a Labour Secretary of State but by a Conservative Secretary of State. That is part of the reason why they are not sympathetic to new clause 8.

My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham rightly points me in a new direction, which is the Government's stance on this matter. Is it their contention—which would be the logical consequence of them opposing such a reasonable, modest and mild provision—that there are no circumstances whatsoever in which a minimum wage could deter employment, impede enterprise or restrict the ability of those who are working for another group of people to do so effectively and efficiently? If that is the case, we can only wonder why they propose to exempt the self-employed, the armed forces and those under the age of 26.

Why did the Deputy Prime Minister, in a famous Sunday television interview, observe, "Of course the minimum wage will cost jobs; any silly fool knows that"? That was a rather welcome outburst of candour from the Government, yet their attitude to new clause 8 is inconsistent with that.

If the Government believe that, even in normal economic circumstances, members of the armed forces should not be subject to the Bill's provisions; if they believe that, even in normal economic circumstances, people under the age of 26 would be difficult to employ if they were subject to a normal statutory national minimum wage; if they believe that, even in normal economic circumstances, self-employed people would find it excessively onerous, bureaucratic and a deterrent to their ability to create wealth and jobs to fulfil their commitments under a statutory national minimum wage, surely they recognise the powerful argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry, that, in circumstances of acute economic crisis and distress of the sort that we have discussed this evening, the whole economy or, alternatively, some parts of it, either geographical or according to particular businesses, might require some assistance.

New clause 8 is something of a test for the Government—a test of logic. The logic of Ministers' position on a series of other issues is that they should accept new clause 8. The new clause is a test also of their commitment to democracy, as it would include in the Bill new powers that would be clearly constrained by requiring reference back to the House. It is a test of their commitment to recognising potentially serious economic circumstances. It is a test also of their flexibility.

Earlier in the debate, we heard the Minister say, in a most extraordinary remark on a different clause, that an amendment was excessively prescriptive. If ever a Bill was prescriptive, it is this one: it gives the Secretary of State power to dictate by order the amount that people may be paid for performing jobs. New clause 8 is anything but prescriptive. It would give the Secretary of State power to intervene to suspend the Act; it does not require intervention. It does not say that, in certain circumstances, a Secretary of State might find himself or herself hauled up before a court or other body for not invoking it. Discretion is left to the Secretary of State.

Time after time, we have seen in the history of Labour Governments how often it has been necessary for provisions to be in place enabling emergency measures to be taken. How many previous Labour Chancellors of the Exchequer or Prime Ministers would have liked to have some means of getting themselves out of the holes into which they had dug themselves?

In passing new clause 8, the Government would get something for nothing—an additional discretionary power—which they should not fear. The new clause's provisions are consistent with what Ministers have said before. They can oppose it only if they are out of kilter with their previous statements and not as confident as they pretend to be of being in office for perpetuity.

Mr. Ian McCartney: For almost an hour and a half, we have been treated to one of the most extraordinary debates so far on the minimum wage legislation. Conservative Members have repeatedly attempted, both in Committee and outside the House, not only to construct the most bizarre reasons why we should not establish a minimum wage but to justify their role as apologists for low pay. However, tonight's debate has surpassed all the previous debates and statements, setting an absolute record of contempt and showing an absolute lack of concern for poverty in rural areas and poverty in general. We have seen in this debate Conservative Members' apparent denial of the reasons why they lost the general election—leaving the Government with a massive inheritance to clear up.

Conservative Members who have spoken in this debate have been no more than a smokescreen for a dubious campaign to prove how well the previous Government represented rural areas. Let us consider their record. The previous Government's bus deregulation destroyed almost every public transport system in the countryside—but not a single Conservative Member uttered a single word of opposition to the closure of rural transport links. The previous Government—not once, not twice, but three times—tried to destroy the rural post office network by privatising it.

What of the closure of rural railways? The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) was a member of a Government who destroyed rural railways—against which destruction not a single word was uttered by Conservative Members. Conservative Members campaigned to abandon the Agricultural Wages Board, although thousands of constituents of at least two hon. Members who have spoken in this debate are covered by the Agricultural Wages Board and by minimum wages. Those poor rural farm workers are still covered by minimum wages because farmers and farm workers joined together and revolted against the previous Government's attempts to abolish minimum wages in rural areas. What about the sale of housing association homes in small villages, which has led to a collapse in the supply of affordable homes in rural communities?

What about the BSE crisis? The right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) spoke so piously, but he was a Minister in a Department that denied—not for months, but for years—that BSE caused damage, posed dangers or formed a link in the food chain. He bears heavy responsibility—by his inactivity, because he could have done something about it—for what has happened to United Kingdom agricultural interests. His abysmal failure—both personally and collectively—to do so something about it has left us with a legacy of job losses, of billions of pounds of losses to the British economy and of damage overseas to our industry. He stood at this very Dispatch Box and denied that a problem even existed. He had better not give Labour Members any lessons, or lectures, about the rural economy and the effects of Government policies on rural areas.

Mr. Maclean: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McCartney: In a moment.

I have never thought of the hon. Member for Daventry as subversive, in any circumstances. I think I told him in Committee that I thought of him more as a Captain Mainwaring—the leader of a Dad's Army. Certainly, he has come into battle tonight with something of a battered shield in trying to stop the onward march of the national minimum wage.

The hon. Gentleman normally puts up a substantial argument in Committee, intellectually. My hon. Friends and I have to think carefully about most of the points that he makes, and on occasion he has made points that I have been prepared to concede, both because of the rightness of what he has said and because of the way in which he has said it. The new clause, however, is no more and no less than an opportunity for Conservative Members, in a completely undisguised way, to attack the whole concept and principle of the minimum wage.

Let us consider some of the arguments that we have heard. We have heard arguments about the single currency. Can the hon. Gentleman name any country in Europe which has signed up to the first wave that has decided to suspend the national minimum wage legislation, or has given any reason to do so? Then there is the argument about BSE. Interestingly, the new clause does not refer to the Agricultural Wages Board or to the suspension of agricultural wages legislation. It is possible that, if workers in rural areas were covered by the board, there would be no suspension, despite what has been said by the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) about the crisis caused by BSE. Rural workers who have no interest in agricultural activities will have their wages arbitrarily cut, while agricultural workers involved with BSE will not be covered by the new clause.

The whole thing is a shambles, for one simple reason. There has been no intention of thinking this through; it was just another hook on which to hang the prejudices on which opposition to the minimum wage is based.

Mr. Maclean: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McCartney: The right hon. Gentleman need not worry. Before the end of the day I will give way.

The issue of rabies was raised. Here is a sound reason why the poorest people in Britain should not have a minimum wage: someone might be rabid. The only people I know of so far who may be rabid are Conservative Members: they become rabid as soon as we mention the minimum wage. The same is true of the issue of Chernobyl or Sellafield. There is a possibility that at least a million people in Britain earning under £2.50 will immediately have their wages cut on the grounds of a crisis in Sellafield.

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman made a strong attack on my handling of the BSE crisis when I was a Minister. Can he give a single example of any official advice that I ignored, or did not put into effect? Has he brought any of his allegations to the attention of Lord Justice Phillips?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the Minister replied, he would stray rather far from the terms of the new clause.

Mr. McCartney: I accept that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but you obviously decided that it was in order for the right hon. Gentleman to raise the issue of BSE as a reason for cutting low-paid workers' wages. My point was that the BSE debacle happened because the right hon. Gentleman, as a Minister in the last Government, allowed the situation to develop as it did. I withdraw nothing that I said about that.

The next item on the agenda is the possibility of suspending the minimum wage—in fact, cutting wages—for workers on the basis of the millennium bug. Were Opposition Members suggesting that if people were paid a minimum wage there might be power cuts and a further oil crisis? Quite frankly, it beggars belief that they ask us to take the new clause seriously as a genuine attempt to improve the Bill.

Mr. Lansley: It appears that the Minister cannot accept that it would be right to suspend the national minimum wage in any of the circumstances that have been described. Does he believe that, because he cannot envisage any circumstances in which it should be used, such a power should not be included in the Bill?

Mr. McCartney: I shall come to what powers should be on the face of the Bill in a moment, but may I ask Opposition Members one question that they have never answered? In envisaging a crisis that was so real and of such consequence that it was necessary to cut the minimum wage, why have they remained silent about everyone who is paid more than the minimum wage? If, in the event of a national crisis, the very poorest—because no one will be paid less than the minimum wage—are to bear the entire brunt of that crisis, which is surely the intellectual argument that Opposition Members are making, what will happen to those who are better off or well off? Are people with huge resources to be excluded from the consequences of any financial or economic crisis that may arise while the lowest-paid workers in Britain bear the full weight of that crisis? It is economic illiteracy.

The Opposition are using the new clause for one simple purpose: to make a further attack on the principle and concept of establishing a national minimum wage and dealing with the inheritance that they left the United Kingdom. There are large areas of low pay in Cumbria, Scotland, Northern Ireland, Wales—in the north, south, east and west. Huge numbers of families who work full time are paid so little at the end of the week that they have to rely on state benefits. That is the legacy of the Conservative Government. We are addressing the real national emergency—their legacy of poverty pay, not their spurious arguments that we have heard so far in support of the new clause.

Mr. Maclean: To return to the subject of economic illiteracy, does the Minister not understand that it is not necessary to have such an order-making power in respect of those who are paid more than the minimum wage because there will be no statutory bar to their accepting lower wages? Those who are covered by a minimum wage provision, however, would require such an order-making power to take them outside the statutory provisions in an emergency. The new clause is not putting the burden purely on the poor; people who are paid more can have their wages reduced more easily.

Mr. McCartney: That is more absolute nonsense. Under the new clause, the low-paid can have their wages cut, but the better-off and the very wealthy can think about it. They will think about it for exactly one second and get on with the rest of their lives.

Mr. Ian Bruce: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wonder whether the House authorities can check whether the speakers are working on the other side of the Chamber? The Minister is obviously not listening to what is being said or not hearing it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a sensible point of order.

Mr. McCartney: Your comment about the hon. Gentleman not making sensible remarks is probably the most sensible observation that I have heard in 11 years in the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The hon. Member for Daventry mentioned the Bank of England Bill which deals with the macro-economy and allows the economic levers controlled by the Bank of England to return to the Treasury under certain circumstances. The National Minimum Wage Bill is about individual rights and covers a relatively small part of the economy. It is a matter of proportion. Even the Tory Government did not provide a mechanism for removing unfair dismissal rights in a national economic emergency.

Suppose that I had taken as genuine what the hon. Member for Daventry said—that the new clause sought to assist. It would quickly have become quite clear from Back Benchers' speeches that their arguments had nothing to do with assisting the Bill and everything to do with the continuation of low pay among large sectors of British society and with protecting employers who are quite prepared to continue paying £1.20, £1.30, £1.50 or £1.60 per hour. Perhaps Conservative Members will answer a question that they have never answered: do they intend to fight the next general election on a promise to scrap the national minimum wage? If the Conservatives press the new clause, I ask my hon. Friends to vote against it.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): I shall speak only briefly on the new clause. I do not intend to go into the various extreme economic circumstances that might lead to the necessity of operating the provisions of the new clause.

I was astounded by the Minister's reaction to our sensible proposal. I admit that I was not on the Standing Committee that debated the detail of the Bill, so I had not hitherto had an opportunity to see the Minister in full flight on the Bill. Having heard several of his responses so far, I am disappointed that he is not able or willing to address the issues that are raised. He merely talks about the dogma of whether there should be a national minimum wage. The Bill is about a national minimum wage. Our new clauses are about the practicalities of the operation of the Bill.

Mr. Ian McCartney: The hon. Lady is right—she was not in Committee. She obviously did not listen to the hon. Member for Daventry when he moved the new clause. The new clause would not provide for a national minimum wage; it would get rid of it. The purpose of the new clause is to suspend it or cut it.

Mrs. May: The Minister obviously was not listening to what I just said. I listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell). The Minister's responses are all about whether there should be a national minimum wage. He has not addressed the practicalities of how it should be operated. The new clauses that the Conservatives have proposed have all addressed practical issues about the operation of the national minimum wage in certain circumstances. New clause 8 is a good example of that.

[Mrs. May]

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Can my hon. Friend somehow get it through to the Minister that the purpose of the new clause is to allow those who would otherwise lose their job in extreme circumstances to hold on to it and have a wage at all?

Mrs. May: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that very valid point. He makes it with rather more force than I could. In extreme economic circumstances, when the choice is between people losing their job or keeping it at a lower wage, the Minister is saying that people should lose it and have no wage. He does not want the flexibility of allowing employers to step aside from the provisions of the national minimum wage for a limited period in extreme economic circumstances.

We are extending a generous helping hand to the Government. We are giving them the means of saving them from themselves. [Laughter.]

Mr. Ian Bruce: My hon. Friend is getting guffaws from Labour Members. They seem not to appreciate that, despite the many hours that the Bill spent in Standing Committee, seven of the groups of amendments are Government amendments because they did not get it right before. Madam Speaker is keen to ensure that amendments that have already been well debated are not selected, yet there are 16 groups on the selection list. That shows what a mess the Bill is in. Labour Members should listen to my hon. Friend rather than laughing at what she is saying.

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is extremely disappointing that, despite the fact that the Government have had to table a whole series of amendments because they failed to get the Bill right first time round, they will not spend time listening to the practical points that we are raising in a spirit of generosity. We are trying to help the Government out of the problems that they are causing.

There are two types of circumstances in which it could be necessary for the new clause to operate. The first is where extreme economic circumstances have been caused by some external shock to the system. A variety of such examples have been given by my right hon. and hon. Friends. I seem to recall that, in moving the new clause, my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry referred to a circumstance in the 1970s, when the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, now Lord Healey, had to be turned back at the airport. I recall that, at the time, Lord Healey made the famous remark, "Crisis? What crisis?" It is therefore not surprising that the Government are not taking any notice of the issue. It is obvious that the Labour Government would not see an extreme economic circumstance if it came up and hit them.

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend is making an interesting argument. Does she agree that, although the Labour Government could not recognise an economic crisis, and would be powerless, unable or unwilling to do anything about one, we would suffer?

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend is exactly right. The people who would suffer particularly are those who lost their jobs because the Government had not taken unto themselves the power to set aside the national minimum wage provisions for a limited period.

The Government are creating the other set of extreme circumstances themselves. That is precisely why I say that we would be saving them from themselves in pressing the new clause. My right hon. and hon. Friends have referred to circumstances that are being created at the moment. Given the strength of the pound, the five interest rate rises and the impact of the Chancellor's first Budget, many firms are in extreme difficulty.

Mr. Syms: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is not just a question of suspending the national minimum wage to help companies? A company that stays in business is one that can pay its debts to other companies. In a crisis, a number of companies may go out of business. The temporary provisions could well provide a structure that would enable many businesses to remain in the industry.

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend's point is extremely well made. Given the Minister's interest in payment of debt, I trust that the Government have listened to that point and will take it on board.

It is absolutely clear from the Minister's response that he simply does not understand the impact of his own legislation. I repeat—it bears repeating, because I fear that the Minister has not understood the point—that, in extreme economic circumstances, where it is necessary to relieve pressure placed on firms as a result of the national minimum wage, the choice will be between unemployment and employment at a reduced wage. If there has been economic illiteracy in the debate, it has been the Minister's response, "Oh, well: only the poor will have their wages reduced".

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) said, the wages of people not on the national minimum wage could be cut easily because there is no statutory backing for the level of their wage. If circumstances made it necessary to cut the wages of those on a national minimum wage, but it could not be done because of statutory provisions, those people would lose their jobs.

Mr. Bercow: I am following the logic of hon. Friend's argument closely. Does she agree that the Government's rejection of new clause 8 is not only wrong but illogical? It is illogical for Ministers to argue that, in economic good times, it is prudent to raise the level of the national minimum wage, but to reject the notion that, in economic bad times, it is somehow not prudent to suspend, disapply or lower the national minimum wage.

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The illogicality is more evidence of the fact that, although the Government consistently talk these days about flexibility of labour markets, they do not understand what that means.

Mr. McCartney: The hon. Lady has almost made my point for me, so perhaps she will confirm it. Does the Conservative party advocate general wage cuts in all economic circumstances? Is that what the hon. Lady is advocating? Is it true that the Conservative party stands for general wage cuts throughout the economy?

Mrs. May: No, that is not what I am advocating, and that was not what I said. Perhaps the Minister would care to listen more carefully to what I say in future.

I said that I would speak briefly on this matter, but the Minister has proved, by his response and his continual interventions, that he has completely failed to understand the impact of the Bill or the necessity for the provisions in new clause 8.

The Government fail to take on board the reserve power that is proposed in new clause 8. I find that illogical in another sense. I sat through the Committee that considered the School Standards and Framework Bill, in which the Government were constantly incorporating provisions for reserve powers, saying, "Trust us; don't worry; they are there in case of emergency circumstances." Yet now, suddenly, the Government are completely unwilling to incorporate in this Bill powers that would enable them to cope with emergencies.

We are not suggesting that new clause 8 is about a general wage cut. We are saying that, in certain economic circumstances, in certain areas, if people are to keep their jobs, the national minimum wage provisions must be set aside. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border said in his excellent contribution, one can only assume that the Government are driven purely by dogma rather than by concern for the low-paid or for those on low pay scales whose jobs may be affected in difficult economic circumstances. The Government are only interested in their own dogma.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): I have listened with great interest to the illuminating contributions of my right hon. and hon. Friends and the Minister. I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) and my right hon. and hon. Friends who spoke subsequently have significantly undersold the merits of new clause 8, for two reasons in particular. I hope that the Minister finds my argument sympathetic; I believe that it accords with the logic of the Bill.

First, I believe that, in Opposition contributions to the debate, a somewhat loose use has been made of the very precise wording of new clause 8, which refers not to economic crisis—which might be regarded as unlikely to occur frequently—but to "extreme economic circumstances". This takes us to the heart of the issue of the minimum wage and its effects on employment.

As the Minister will no doubt agree, the principal feature of the minimum wage is that it works if it is set at a level where the marginal utility of labour exceeds the minimum wage—where the employer finds that an extra employee earns more for the firm than the minimum wage that must be paid, taking account of the social costs of labour, national insurance contributions and so on. Therefore, the phrase "extreme economic circumstances" has a specific meaning in the context of the Bill, because it does not necessarily refer to a generalised catastrophe in the economy. It could also refer to any set of circumstances that alters the marginal utility of labour.

In some circumstances, companies could survive quite nicely using capital assets, perhaps making large profits, but those same circumstances might mean that the additional employee, who was well able to find a job a little earlier in the economic cycle because he was able to earn for his employer, as an extra employee, slightly more than the minimum wage, finds, later in the cycle, that, governed by the same minimum wage, set, perfectly reasonably, by the Low Pay Commission or the Minister on its advice, he can no longer earn enough for the firm to justify that minimum wage.

Currently, such extreme economic circumstances are easy to imagine. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) mentioned economic and monetary union. In all probability, the Minister and the Labour party are determined to take this country into that mechanism at a certain point. In those circumstances, it is easy to imagine a concatenation of interest rates and fiscal policies which for this element of the European Union would result in a significant adjustment of the marginal utility of labour.

The policies may provide for perfectly reasonable distribution of labour costs and profits around the continent as a whole, but leave us and perhaps one or two other countries in a position where the additional employee no longer earns as much for the firm as the minimum wage would force the employer to pay. Under those circumstances, only powers of the sort that new clause 8 provides could allow a Government to adjust without disrupting the entirety of the minimum wage legislation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) clearly spoke the truth, which is that new clause 8 would help the Government to save themselves from themselves; or, to put it more generously, it would assist the Government to make the Bill workable.

A second reason for the Government to accept new clause 8, which is even more important to the Government's case and their logic, springs from the first reason. Hon. Members on both sides of the House will agree that circumstances may arise in which the minimum wage is set at a level in a given year or set of years that is in practice acceptable to employers in the sense that they would want to employ additional labourers. However, they may fear that there might come a time thereafter when those circumstances will no longer obtain and so, in advance of extreme economic circumstances, they might be unwilling to take on additional labour simply because of the fear of the inflexibility of the legislation that would obtain in the absence of new clause 8. The presence of the new clause would act as a signal to those employers that under such circumstances the Government could alleviate the situation by using the reserve powers.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Has my hon. Friend read into the clause the intention that I would attribute to my hon.

[Mr. Ian Bruce]

Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell)? For instance, if there were a natural disaster, local low-paid workers might volunteer to do additional work—they are usually the first to do so—for their employers, for the public good or whatever. The employer might suddenly say, "Hang on. I can't pay you." The worker might say, "It's all right." However, the employer would answer, "No, I'll get prosecuted under the minimum wage legislation." Surely then the Government could say that, given the snow or the floods—whatever the catastrophe—they would temporarily suspend the minimum wage order.

Mr. Letwin: Such circumstances are a possibility, but I was trying to point out that the new clause would rescue the Government and the Bill from a wider danger—the danger that, across the economy as a whole, employers would be reluctant to take on additional labour that might be justified even with the minimum wage set at whatever level it had been set at simply because they feared that at some later stage in the economic cycle some relatively unforeseen and extreme economic circumstance—extreme only in the sense of adjusting the margiral utility of labour—might make that the wrong decision.

I am not speculating—that has happened. Under previous Administrations, before certain reforms of the labour market and of employment law, employers were more willing to take on additional labour. There was a time when employment protection—the legislation was well intentioned—was so restrictive and made dismissing an employee so costly that employers were unwilling to take on people. The loosening of those employment laws was heavily responsible for the change in our labour market and the difference between unemployment in this country and in our European counterparts at every stage of the economic cycle.

The same structure of argument applies to the new clause. [Interruption.] If the Minister wants to intervene, I am more than willing to give way. The new clause would permit the Government to make an exception and therefore would enable employers to employ people without worrying that they would later face the twin constraints of a decrease in the marginal utility of labour and the minimum wage.

Mr. Swayne: Will my hon. Friend answer two questions? First, to what extent would such a power have to be used to create the environment of reassurance that employers would require to continue to take on employees rather than to replace them with capital? Secondly, in what ways does he envisage the power in new clause 8 being used? As I understood his remarks, it is likely that the power would regularly be appropriate during a particular phase of the economic cycle and that it would not be a severe shock.

Mr. Letwin: My hon. Friend asks characteristically acute questions. I do not envisage—this is made clear in the new clause—that the power would be invoked regularly at a particular point in the economic cycle. My argument is that the fact that it could be invoked at a given point in the cycle would have an effect—I think that this is undeniable—on the behaviour of employers before that point. There is an asymmetry between likely reality and fear, which the Government ignore at their peril and, more important, at the peril of those who are employed or would like to be employed.

On my hon. Friend's other point, the powers in the new clause would typically be used only in "extreme economic circumstances". The definition of extremity relates to the marginal utility of labour. If the Government took that argument seriously—manifestly, from the Minister's guffaws and amused expression, that is far from likely—it would be to the benefit of the Bill.

I offer a mild prophecy: a year or two from now, the Government will return to the House seeking precisely such an order-making power because some minute and unforeseen circumstance will have arisen in which such a power is required to prevent what would be, from the Government's point of view, although not from that of Conservative Members, a much greater calamity—the need substantially to revise the whole Bill in order simply to avoid a particular, local problem.

Mr. Boswell: This has been an interesting, lively and well-attended debate. I do not intend to speak at length. It is good to see at this late—or early—hour the attendance of so many hon. Members, although there has been a deficiency, now modestly repaired, on the Liberal Democrat Benches.

I shall respond first to the remarks of the Minister, whose metier may lie outside the House as a fairground barker or something similar. He made some unwarranted comments about my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) in respect of BSE. It is rather silly and injudicious to set up an inquiry under Lord Justice Phillips and not to wait for its conclusions, which will be of more interest than the Minister's remarks tonight.

The Minister asked why no other European country among the 11 who are likely to join the first stage of economic and monetary union had a suspensory power. First, those countries are unwise not to have such a power. Secondly, I think that their unemployment record would suggest that, in general, their labour market policies are not of the wisest.

The Minister asked why I had not tabled any amendments concerning the Agricultural Wages Board. That is not the subject of the Bill, and Ministers have been, at pains to say that any changes that they are proposing to the operation of agricultural wages legislation are confined solely to matters relating to the implementation of the national minimum wage. Had I tabled any such amendments, they would have gone wider and would probably have been outside the long title of the Bill.

If the Government were to accept the new clause, which is modest and well intentioned, they would effectively be letting their cat out of the bag, because they would be giving themselves powers to do something about the consequences that will inevitably follow from their decision to implement the minimum wage broadly universally and at a single rate. There will be industrial consequences, and the economy may not be able to respond competitively to international shocks.

There is an essential ambiguity in the Government's attitude. The Bank of England Bill implements one of their treasured policies, about which I have grave reservations: to introduce a Monetary Policy Committee, independent of the Chancellor, to run our monetary policy. In that Bill, they provided for a way out in cases of external economic shocks.

We have copied that provision into our new clause, but because of their political commitment, given regardless of the economic consequences, the Government are not prepared to provide for themselves the powers to take action to meet any such shocks. What is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. A clause in one Government Bill should be a new clause added to this Bill.

Question put and negatived.

OPERATION OF AGRICULTURAL WAGES ORDERS

'. Within twelve months of the laying of the first regulations under section 1 or 2 of this Act, the Low Pay Commission and the Agricultural Wages Boards acting jointly shall make a report to the Secretary of State and to the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on the operation of section 44 of this Act and the enactments mentioned in section 45(1) and (2) of this Act, and may make recommendations for such amendment of that section and those enactments as, in the opinion of the Commission, may ensure the more effective application of this Act to agricultural workers.'.—[Mr. Boswell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Boswell: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 29, 31, 36, 37, 30, 32 and 38.

Mr. Boswell: The strongest single case for the new clause is the list that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, read out of no fewer than seven Government amendments that have attached themselves to the new clause. They form part of no fewer than 11 Government amendments to schedule 2, the agricultural wages schedule, not to mention the many Government amendments that were tabled in Committee. If those provisions are meant to achieve a blending of the conceptual streams of the National Minimum Wage Bill and the agricultural wages legislation, it is an untidy blending indeed.

When I was in Germany in the autumn, I visited Koblenz—the name stems from the Latin word confluencia—where the Rhine and the Moselle join. There is a visible difference in the colour of the water, one being greener and the other blacker. Despite the Government's best efforts, they have not achieved an imperceptible blending of the agricultural wages legislation and the Bill. That is not surprising; they are different concepts and they were written in different generations.

I was the tender age of five and a half, and just about to start primary school, when the Agricultural Wages Act 1948 was introduced. Some 50 years later, we are introducing national minimum wage legislation. I do not scoff at the Government for doing so, because it is a difficult task. They have decided to have a national minimum wage, and they want it to fit with the agricultural wages legislation.

As Ministers will know, we have already had a debate about the permit system under the agricultural wages legislation. I regret its passing—at least up to the level of the national minimum wage—and wish that it could have been extended to make wider provision for those who are so disabled as to be unable to earn the national minimum wage. The Government will come to regret that that has not been done. More immediately, the 102 persons who currently avail themselves of a permit under the Agricultural Wages Act 1948—which I remind the House was introduced by a Labour Government—will regret the consequences of the imposition of the national minimum wage.

The need for harmonisation—the Bill provides powers to make further changes to the agricultural wages legislation so that it fits better with the national minimum wage—argues strongly for a joint approach by the Low Pay Commission and the Agricultural Wages Board to report to Ministers before any changes are made. The Minister will recall that, when we discussed the issue in Committee, she explained that this year's review by the Agricultural Wages Board would be deferred for some 12 months so that those involved could see how the legislation fitted together. New clause 12 is a logical extension of the Minister's proposals.

The raft of Government amendments that have been tagged on to new clause 12 need a more precise explanation from the Minister than we have had so far. We need to see the colour of her money. The concepts in the Government amendments do not leap easily off the page, the hour is already late and I find it difficult to disentangle what is going on. The broad concepts behind the amendments are intelligible. Government amendments Nos. 31 and 37 are intended to prevent overlapping powers, or double jeopardy. That may be sensible.

Government amendments Nos. 36 and 30 deal with the dog rate. The Minister may remember that, in Committee, I referred to the intriguing concept of the dogs' national minimum wage. Under the agricultural wages legislation, agricultural workers may obtain an allowance for keeping a dog. For example, a shepherd might be required to keep a dog by his employer. Such arrangements are set out in the legislation, although I suspect that not many people make use of it. It is an interesting relic that some people may still find useful. I understand why that should be excluded from the national minimum wage because we are not extending the payment to dogs, even if we like dogs as a class of animal.

I am more concerned about Government amendment No. 29 and, in particular, about the component rate. It seems that the Government are playing both ends against the middle because they seek to exclude the top component, the night work rate. As it is now 12.14 am, it is appropriate to discuss night work rates because they apply at night after the first two hours and are a modest but appreciated supplement to the agricultural wages basic rate. If that is the normal pattern in which someone works, it is not self-evident a priori why they should be excluded, certainly not without a recommendation from the Low Pay Commission to explain it. After all, such rates are paid by employers and may reflect a regular pattern of payment. It is for the Minister to make her case on that.

12.15 am

I am conscious of the time, but I want to say a word or two about the overall implications of the agricultural wages orders, which I should have thought a joint study by the Low Pay Commission and the wages boards should cover, as proposed by new clause 12. Agriculture is an interesting industry.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Hear, hear.

Mr. Boswell: It is nice to have the support of the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), who has a considerable knowledge of the industry and is influential in high places. As a bigger, and perhaps even better, farmer than me he knows that the industry is not doing too well. There was a decline in farm incomes of 45 per cent. last year. No commodity or group of commodities is flourishing. That is putting severe pressure, both economic and psychological, on farmers and their employees. The number of employees has been diminishing for years. Only about 170,000 farm workers are now covered by the agricultural wages orders, but within that are several interesting and different cases.

I said in Committee, so I shall not dilate on it tonight, that in the arable sector and stock keeping there is a significant number of highly skilled craftspeople who are paid substantial rates. The Agricultural Wages Board by no means any longer, whatever it may have done initially in 1948, prescribes only for those at the bottom of the pile. It provides a ladder related to craft, permanence of employment and the attaining of certain responsibilities and qualifications. It is possible to find from that an average or standard rate, as it were, of about £4.17, which is substantially above what we now hear from the Government about the likely rate of the national minimum wage. The figure goes up to about £8 an hour for some of the appointment grades. Those people are in no sense unskilled or particularly underpaid. Some have salary arrangements, and are valued employees.

That part of the agricultural economy exists alongside other people, often in casual employments, who are paid at lower rates, which can drop as low as £3.06 an hour but still comply with the order. That is particularly true of horticulture, which employs a significant proportion of the total labour force—some 50,000 out of the 170,000. Not all those people are paid for; some are partners in the business. Horticulture is a significant component.

Then there is seasonal work; for example, fruit picking or planting, which are jobs that do not necessarily involve a high level of skill, although they may involve an increasing level of skill—I hope they do. Some such workers will be paid at a relatively low rate, but if labour is not supplied at that rate, or if the rate rises, it is uneconomic to pick. I find that rather sad, because it could lead to the demise of the British apple. If my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) were still here, I am sure that he would talk on that subject. In the evidence of the National Farmers Union, horticulture is singled out as an area of particular stress.

We do not know what will happen in the next 12 months. We know now that agriculture across the piece—from arable farming, which is often highly capitalised, through livestock farming, which is organised extensively throughout the United Kingdom, to horticulture, some of which is intensive and highly capitalised and some of which is reliant on seasonal or casual labour—currently faces difficulties.

It would be sensible to look at the technical aspects of agriculture and its interaction with the national minimum wage in, say, 12 months' time and to consider some of the wider economic implications, because no one can look at the industry at the moment and feel happy with how things stand. Nor can anyone regard with complete confidence the introduction to the industry of a national minimum wage—albeit not all workers in the industry will be affected because the statutory rates may exceed the minimum wage rate.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I wonder, because I did not serve on the Standing Committee, whether the Government gave any indication that they were considering extending wages boards back into other industries once they got the minimum wage set. They have been keen on wages councils and boards in the past, but have they given any indication of their plans for the future? It is important to our consideration of this group of amendments to consider what report we may get on how the Agricultural Wages Board works alongside a national minimum wage.

Mr. Boswell: My immediate reaction to my hon. Friend's perceptive intervention is to say, perish the thought. In fairness to the Government, I do not think that they have it in mind to impose, on top of the national minimum wage structure, a superstructure of wages boards. Indeed, if we are to have one or the other, generally speaking it may be worth considering a national minimum wage because of the anomalies in the various wages councils.

However, I should say quickly that the Agricultural Wages Board provides a not individually, but nationally, negotiated framework for minimum remuneration which goes far beyond the lowest possible rates and extends up to quite significant levels of remuneration. That is not the same as a national minimum wage and, in considering the long-term future of the Agricultural Wages Board, I am sure Ministers ought to want to look at that on its merits in due course. The purpose of the new clause is largely to steer them toward doing so.

There is no doubt that agriculture is currently experiencing difficulties. There is little doubt that the national minimum wage would add to those difficulties. We do not necessarily ask for special treatment—exempting agriculture just like that—but we do ask the Government to be sensitive to the sector's difficulties. We invite them to explain their amendments in greater detail and to consider the suggestion in new clause 12, which would provide for a review in 12 months' time to see whether the situation is capable of improvement—as I suspect it will be—after that time.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I am somewhat perplexed by the Bill. I came to it late, because I thought that the Labour party had made a clear commitment in its manifesto, and that the legislation would sail through, given the Government's majority. I thought that it would be a simple Bill that everyone would understand, and that we would know what hazards were involved. I did not pay a great deal of attention to the Bill until recently. [Interruption.] If hon. Members want to intervene, I am happy to take interventions at any time. I have tried to get a grip of what is happening. Perhaps I am wrong to assume that a wages council that currently has a basic rate of £1.84 for a 16-year-old would have difficulty with the Government's proposals.

The Government have gone down a complex and foolish route by trying to combine a minimum wage scheme with the Agricultural Wages Board. They should be given the opportunity in 12 months' time to review what has happened. The Bill and the amendments that the Government have been forced to table leave me perplexed.

I heard an apocryphal story about an inspector sent by the Agricultural Wages Board to see a small farmer. He questioned the farmer about the rates of pay on the farm. The farmer said, "My stockman has been with me a long time and does all the milking. He is paid £5.50 an hour. The woman who deals with the chickens is on £4.80." The inspector said, "That's fine, but I've heard rumours that you are underpaying your workers. Is there no one else?" The farmer said, "Well there's the halfwit who works 80 hours a week and gets £1.20 an hour." The inspector said, "That's ridiculous. I must meet him." The farmer said, "You're talking to him. I earn £1.20 an hour and I work 80 hours a week." That is one of the problems we shall face. The farmer is not currently covered by a minimum wage because he is probably a director or a limited company, whereas he will be covered by the Bill.

I tried to help the Government earlier by pointing out that they would have problems if they did not exclude directors, who are, in effect, self-employed. A director is different from a limited company: hon. Members often do not understand the difference. Running an Agricultural Wages Board and a minimum wage scheme will cause complications. If a report were produced, we would know what was happening and directors could be excluded.

I asked my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) whether the Government intended to introduce wages boards to decide the differentials for people on the minimum wage upwards. When in opposition, the Labour party fought tooth and nail to maintain wages boards. That was foolish, because wages boards did not uplift but institutionalised the pay of low-paid workers. The record that shows what happened from the time wages councils were set up until they were abolished, and even afterwards, provides no evidence of the councils helping people to get out of low pay. In many cases, they had the opposite effect, and groups of workers were kept down.

I repeat the minimum wage rates that were set by the Agricultural Wages Board. They are: £1.84 for a 16-year-old; £2.14 for a 17-year-old; £2.60 for an 18-year-old; and £3.06 for those aged 19 to 65. The briefing supplied to Labour Members states that people who are employed full time all year in agriculture get £4.12 and not £3.06, but that does not apply to low-paid agricultural workers. They have to get work where they can find it, and the wages board does nothing to protect them. Anyone who suggests that the rates that I have described protect people is talking nonsense.

The rates allow low-paying employers to offer £3.30 an hour, and the response to the complaint, "That is a terrible rate," is, "It is 24p an hour more than the minimum. I am a generous employer." That was my experience when I worked in an employment agency for industrial workers. The first time I came across one of the terrible wages councils was when I encountered the Aerated Waters Wages Council. Hansard did not believe that there was such a body. It set the wages for those who put the fizz into pop. I suspect that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition could probably give us a more complete treatise on the fizzy pop industry than I could, although I was working in Yorkshire at the time. I cannot give a treatise because you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would rule me out of order. You are my hon. Friend, but you are keen to keep us on the right route.

The Minister is one of my favourite Minister and I hope that she will explain how she intends to escape from the complications that she has got into as a result of trying to get the Agricultural Wages Board working with the national minimum wage. She is weaving a complex web, and I suspect that it will get the Government into even more difficulties.

We must examine the dilemma of a worker saying to himself, "Under human rights regulations and so on, am I getting the same deal as everybody else?" Everybody may be eligible for the minimum wage, but a small specialist group of workers may be given additional rights. I hope that the Minister will explain how the rates will operate. If the minimum wage is set at £4 an hour, will the time-and-a-half rate be calculated on that amount? What about the additions? Would we return to the agricultural rates to calculate the overtime rate and be satisfied with that as long as it was over the minimum wage rate? That is an important issue.

Agricultural wages orders not only deal with the rate for the job at a specific age, but state what the overtime rate shall be and the percentage of pay that may be taken for a cottage. They may state the allowances for a dog and for the provision of food, lodgings and so on. It is a complex web. Do we assume that the basic rate will be used in the calculations and that amounts thereafter will be based on that?

Are we saying that we trusted the Agricultural Wages Board? The Conservative Government said that they would continue to have the Agricultural Wages Board, but the Labour party never did. The Conservative Government never proposed to do away with the board, although I did not agree with that. Will all the grades just be amalgamated? Will the board be told to say that the minimum rate is now £3.50 or £4 an hour, that that has to apply to the 16-year-old and that everything from there will be ratcheted up?

One of Conservative Members' fears is that people who know that they are more skilled, more experienced—they may have worked on the farm for 10 years—and better workers than someone below them who receives the same minimum rate will ask, "What about my differentials?", even if the minimum wage is more than they currently earn. If they consider what has happened with the Agricultural Wages Board, which is affected by the national minimum wage legislation, they are entitled to ask what the situation is and how the system will operate.

We do not deal with these issues in isolation, but in terms of the real experience of the agricultural sector. Most of the farmers in my constituency tell me that they are not fearful of a minimum wage because most of them already pay all their workers above the minimum rates that were set by the Agricultural Wages Board. They assume, perhaps incorrectly, that any minimum wage will be below those.

I think that those farmers are making a mistake, but what is important is that, as we all know, a small—perhaps a 10 per cent.—difference in the value of the pound can have a dramatic effect on farmers' earnings. In the first year of this Labour Government, farm incomes have gone down by 40 per cent. The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has said that they will go down further. He cannot promise that they will improve, and I think that he is right.

We do not know how far incomes will go down and we all know the situation for the farmer. He is all right as long as the banks are with him and he still has some cattle to sell off to keep the farm going. Farmers are fantastic at keeping going. The last people whose wages they will try to cut are their agricultural workers.

Farms are small businesses. Farmers live cheek by jowl with their work force, not hundreds of miles away. They do not, at the stroke of an accountant's pen, cut everyone's wages. They work closely with their work force. The work force continue to be paid, even when farm incomes are low, but we shall be in the strange position whereby many farmers—and most of them are in limited companies and earn wages—will have to say to their workers, "We are all going to have to work for a minimum wage. I am going to have to put my wages up because I was willing to work for nothing. I shall have to use my savings and to send the wife out to work."

Many farmers' wives work to support their husband and to keep income coming in. Farmers will have to negotiate with people who earn considerably more than any minimum wage that might be introduced and who will have to take a pay cut, perhaps down to the minimum wage—not up to it, as Labour Members believe will happen. The farmer will put his income up, not because he wants to or thinks it fair, but basically because the new Labour Government, the new people's Government, are telling him to do so.

I am extremely upset and concerned—[Hon. Members: "Ah."] I am grateful for that fellow feeling; we in Dorset need that. I wish that I had seen the many smiling faces here tonight on the countryside march the other Sunday. They would have been welcomed with open arms and would have come to understand the issues that we are talking about.

I am concerned and I think that my hon. Friends are concerned. I see avid looks on all their faces as they keenly wait to find out what the Minister is going to say. I am sure that many of them will want to comment on the Government amendments, and I will not detain the House further at this time.

Mr. Hammond: I am not a farmer, like my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell); nor do I represent a rural constituency, like my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce). However, in my constituency there are a number of horticultural enterprises, and over the months, I have become aware of some of the problems facing the agricultural sector in general and the horticultural sub-sector in particular. It is common ground that in so far as the minimum wage will have an impact on the agricultural sector, it is the labour-intensive part that will be most seriously affected, and horticulture represents a significant part of that labour-intensive sub-sector.

In a sense, it is special pleading to propose a new clause that makes provision for a report on the impact of the Bill on one particular sector—in this case, agriculture. However, a certain amount of special pleading is justified, not merely because of the extreme pressure that the sector is under—an issue frequently discussed in the House, and of which all hon. Members are aware—but because, in the legislation governing wages, agriculture has a unique position compared with other sectors of industry.

The pressure that agriculture is under is well rehearsed and I do not need to recite the litany of problems that it faces, which we hear about regularly during Question Time and in debates. Suffice it to say that the National Farmers Union has calculated that a minimum wage introduced at the level of £4.61—or half male median earnings, which is the level sought by the trades unions—would cost the agricultural sector some £250 million per annum. Even if the rate were introduced at a rather more modest £3.50—a level that would disappoint many of the Minister's hon. Friends—according to NFU estimates, it would still cost the agricultural sector £43 million per annum. That is without any account being taken of the cost of restoration of differentials. I will discuss differentials later in my speech, as it is an important issue in agriculture.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Does my hon. Friend remember that literature from the old Labour party said that half male median earnings was not the end point, but the start? The Labour party made a commitment that it would start with that and then move to two thirds of male median earnings as a medium-term strategy. Has my hon. Friend, knowing that the Government are a little chary about coming in too high, made any assessment of what figure they are likely to move to and how many jobs it will affect?

Mr. Hammond: It is curious that we have not heard much about two thirds of male median earnings for a long time. In Committee, it became apparent that the Minister was not keen to talk about even half male median earnings. On my hon. Friend's question about whether I have made any assessment of where the minimum wage level might be set, I assure him that, throughout the Committee's deliberations, I and my hon. Friends did nothing but repeatedly inquire of Ministers about what level the minimum wage might be set at—but, alas, to no avail.

Mr. Boswell: Does my hon. Friend recall that the Minister expressed a certain enthusiasm for the beneficial consequences, as he saw them, of a minimum wage for jobs and growth? Was not the logic of his position the higher, the better? Is it not, therefore, strange that there seems to be a certain reticence among Ministers about introducing a high rate?

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend reminds me of the important contribution to economics made by the Minister in developing the upward-sloping demand curve for labour—the McCartney curve, as future generations of student will come to know it. That economic theory posits that, as the cost for labour rises, so will the demand for

it. The logical conclusion of the theory is that a minimum wage set at an infinitely high level in the United Kingdom will ensure full employment for ever more.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be reminded also of the strict terms of the new clause that we are discussing.

12.45 am

Mr. Bercow: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. I also note your strictures, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and shall ensure that my intervention is in conformity with them. Does my hon. Friend agree that, if the Minister has not abandoned the curve but simply hidden it, and if the Government intend, over time, to increase the national minimum wage for agricultural workers, that might well explain the Government's unwillingness to accede to new clause 12, which would require publication of a report commenting on the effect of the national minimum wage on the agricultural sector? If the Government were planning such an increase, that might well explain their reluctance—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman may have kept his remarks in order, but they were far too long.

Mr. Hammond: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. As he said, there may be various reasons why the Government are reluctant to have any formalised report on the agricultural sector. The direct impact of the minimum wage will be only one of those reasons.

I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for having strayed a little in my earlier remarks, having been tempted by my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry to recount to the House the economic theory proposed in Standing Committee by the Minister of State. I shall move on.

I have suggested that there is indeed a case for treating agriculture as a special case. The very existence of the Agricultural Wages Board underlines that case. Agriculture is now the only sector that has any form of statutory wage-setting arrangement. It is therefore relevant for us to examine the experience in that sector and how those arrangements have worked.

The most important factor in the wages council regime was that it was a sectoral approach, as it still is in the Agricultural Wages Board. The Government, in introducing their national minimum wage legislation, have set their face firmly against any type of sectoral approach—as they have against any regional approach or any other type of flexibility, which many people might think was necessary to ensure that a workable regime of statutory minimum wages was introduced.

The Bill's proposal to graft the national minimum wage on to current agricultural wages legislation, rather than completely to replace that legislation, is already a significant breach of the universality principle which so exercises Ministers. Alone among the sectors of the economy, agriculture will enjoy a different and distinctive regime of minimum wages—which will give rise to a problem that would be very difficult for any industry or sector to deal with, but which is particularly dangerous in a sector that is currently as fragile as the agricultural sector. I am referring to the differential restoration problem which will arise if the minimum wage introduced by the Bill is set at a level that falls between the casual rate currently payable under the Agricultural Wages Board legislation of £3.06 per hour and the permanent full-time rate currently set by that legislation, which is £4.12 per hour.

For a fairly long time, an established and well-understood system has defined the relationship between the pay of full-time, permanent workers and that of casual seasonal workers. That is particularly important in the horticultural sector, in which a large percentage of workers are seasonal. Once the minimum wage intervenes, the higher rate will remain unchanged, but the lower rate will be brought up to whatever level is set in the legislation. Surely it stretches credulity to suggest that permanent, full-time workers in an agricultural enterprise, who have been used to earning £1.06 per hour more than the casual workers whom they are frequently supervising and controlling, will not demand restoration of the differential that they have hitherto enjoyed.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I did not mention this in my brief contribution, but—having run an employment agency and provided temporary workers for about 12 years on a very intensive level—I recall that what upset trade unions most was the fact that temporary industrial workers, in particular, were sent in at a higher rate of pay than anyone on the shop floor. Indeed, we made sure that there was a big differential between temporary and permanent workers. My hon. Friend is making an extraordinarily important point.

Mr. Hammond: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. As I have said, differential restoration—as a result of the cutting in of the national minimum wage between two levels of pay that already exist within an enterprise—will be a problem across all sectors of industry, but there is no other sector in which there is currently a statutory arrangement for fixing wages, and I think that it will have a particularly important effect on agriculture.

As I said, I do not represent an agricultural constituency. I hope that Conservative Members who represent rural and agricultural constituencies will be able to speak more fully than I can from my limited perspective, but let me emphasise again the problems that exist in the horticultural sector—alas, the only agricultural sector of which I have any significant constituency experience. In that sector, the minimum wage will have a significant impact.

I understand that, in horticultural establishments in my constituency, wages set by the Agricultural Wages Board are almost always the wages actually paid, according to current practice. According to my observation, there appears to be no process by which those wage rates form a floor. They are the accepted going rate for the job and, when they are uprated annually, wages are uprated accordingly. This is not some theoretical construct according to which—as may obtain in many other sectors—wages are paid at higher levels. In the case of the horticultural sector and, I suspect, more widely in agriculture, the rates of pay laid down by the Agricultural Wages Board are the rates currently paid.

The arrival of the minimum wage will provide a dislocation and a shift in those arrangements. It will provoke not only a burst of differential restoration, but some industrial relations difficulties, as it will upset a very well-established and widely accepted regime of wage rates at a time when many producers, particularly in the horticultural sector, are suffering the effect of the strong pound sterling. Many of the products that are produced in my constituency for supermarkets in the United Kingdom are forced to compete with products grown abroad—particularly in the Netherlands, which has seen the value of its currency depreciate significantly against the pound in the past 18 months.

Producers of specialised horticultural products are price-takers, unable to affect the market price. Horticultural products are often grown to a specific picking date and have to be sold on that date. They are planted and harvested according to a strict rotation. On the date when they are delivered to market, the producer is, effectively, a price-taker and has to accept whatever price the market sets. Horticultural producers have seen prices in sterling decline by about 25 or 30 per cent. over the past 18 months.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My hon. Friend is modest in saying that he knows little about these issues as he clearly knows a great deal. Almost all hon. Members have a big interest in agriculture because their constituents are consumers. Does my hon. Friend recall the McCartney curve, whereby as people get more money, they can go out and buy more goods? Will not an increase in agricultural wages almost certainly put many people out of work? They will then have no money to put into the local economy, and everyone will suffer the effects.

Mr. Hammond: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. I shall not risk your wrath, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by being tempted into an analysis of the finer points of the theory of the McCartney curve. I agree, however, that people with no jobs are unlikely to be effective consumers.

The impact of the minimum wage legislation will be felt most seriously in sectors of industry and business where the United Kingdom is vulnerable to imported competition. We debated the matter extensively in Committee, and we all understand that in certain sectors where low wages are paid, such as the service industry, the economic impact of imposing a statutory minimum wage is not as serious as it might be in a sector that is vulnerable to imports for the simple reason that, in most cases, there can be no substitution by imported services. The agricultural sector, however, and the horticultural sector specifically, are significantly vulnerable to imports.

The fact that British agriculture is under extreme pressure—for a variety of reasons that we all know—coupled with the strength of the pound makes this absolutely the worst moment to impose a double-jeopardy burden on the industry. Unlike the rest of British business, people engaged in agriculture will be faced not merely with the national minimum wage as a statutory requirement, but with the national minimum wage plus the higher levels of Agricultural Wages Board rates that have been set and will continue. In addition to that panoply of regulation, they will have to deal with the upward pressure on those higher rates of wages caused by the inevitable clamour for differential restoration as the minimum wage rate cuts in and subsumes the lower parts of the structure within the existing Agricultural Wages Board system.

I support the new clause. By drawing attention to the specific concerns of agriculture and its special position, it does a great service, and would greatly enhance the Bill.

Mr. Letwin: I cannot match the sustained eloquence of my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) and the wide scope of his inquiries into the effects on agricultural wages. I should like to raise with the Minister a particular set of problems that arise in connection with the Agricultural Wages Order 1997. The new clause would permit the Government and the various agencies to investigate those circumstances 12 months ex post. Perhaps the Minister could explain in advance how the circumstances have been approached and thus remove at least one reason why the new clause is necessary.

I draw the Minister's attention to paragraph 6(9) of the Agricultural Wages Order 1997—with which she is no doubt familiar—which deals with standby duty rates, an important feature of agricultural wages in my constituency. The workers are not standing by in the sense in which dockers were paid to stand by when they watched ships being loaded under the dock labour scheme. That was a form of diseconomy institutionalised by the dock labour scheme and the Jones-Aldington arrangement.

Standby duty rates have a great economic significance in agriculture. The flexibility of farm labour depends in some circumstances on having individuals available for duty but not present on the farm and working at a given moment, as hon. Members on both sides of the House who are familiar with the issues know. The Agricultural Wages Board has taken that into account for many years and has established specific standby duty rates.

That makes the new clause necessary and provides an interesting test of the principle of minimum wage legislation. Paragraph 6(9) of the order gives the minimum standby duty rates. The rates increase for those between the ages of 15 and 18, with the top rate applying to those aged 19 and over. I shall not refer to the rates that cover those between the ages of 15 and 18. The Minister has no doubt considered the issue and would argue that the possible exemption of those under 26 could apply.

Mr. Hammond: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is not clear how the agricultural wages legislation will interact with the minimum wage legislation on that? It is not yet clear how waiting time and standby time will be treated in calculations of whether the minimum wage has been paid.

Mr. Letwin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. That is my point.

The category of those who are 19 and over includes those between the age of 26 and retirement age. The standby duty rate per whole standby duty day is £16.50. The number of hours implied is in doubt. It would be reasonable to assume that we are talking about an eight-hour day. It does not take any elevated mathematics to divide eight into £16.50 and find that the implied hourly rate for standby duty is just above £2—presumably well below any minimum wage.

That is a vivid example—not unique, but nevertheless most striking—of the conflict between the minimum wage provision and the structure of the Agricultural Wages Order, which we must remember has been developed not by accident but in response to the very particular circumstances of agricultural labour.

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend is making a perceptive speech. Does he agree that, for the time being, the Agricultural Wages Order is the responsibility of a board which has a very high proportion of representatives from both sides of the industry, together with a significant number of independent members? They should know what they are talking about.

Mr. Letwin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is absolutely right. I can go further. I have taken the trouble in the past few days to talk to a number of my constituents—[HON. MEMBERS: "For a change."] I am grateful to hon. Members for their confidence in my constituency activities. I have talked to constituents who are on both sides of the fence: employers, who depend on the level of flexibility of standby duty, and those who benefit from the possibility. I asked them quite specifically how they would feel if the minimum wage legislation rendered it impossible to continue with standby duty at the rate specified by the Agricultural Wages Order. The response has not been favourable. I expect that it would not be favourable in many rural constituencies.

I hope that the Minister will be able to give the House a specific solution to this problem that shows that she and her officials have properly considered and have accommodated in the minimum wage legislation what is, after all, a major element of the Agricultural Wages Order, which has been much debated in the past. We could then rest easy: the Minister would have passed the test. I fear, however, that we shall not hear such an explanation.

I have to admit that, unfortunately, I was not a member of the Standing Committee. I have however read very carefully the entire lengthy debate in Committee on the relevant clauses—clauses 43 and 44 as they were; clauses 44 and 45 as they are—and found not the slightest reference to the issue to which I have referred. I find that surprising. I would have expected the Minister to vouchsafe such an explanation if it existed. That makes me think that this is a lurking problem that has not been properly explored.

I draw the House's attention to the fact that the new clause does not seek specifically to remedy the defects. That would be misguided because there are too many such possible defects in the Agricultural Wages Order from the point of view of its interaction with the minimum wage legislation. On the contrary, we are seeking, as we did in the previous debate, to protect the Government from themselves, and to protect the Bill from its latent defect.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I have had the honour and the privilege of listening to my hon. Friend talking to farmers in his constituency and I know how appreciative they are of his perception on the issue. [Interruption.] The Liberal Democrats are heckling, trying to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. Gentleman that he should be addressing the Chair, not simply turning to his hon. Friend?

Mr. Bruce: I was reluctant to say that the Liberal Democrats were heckling because I knew that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, were being very attentive. Has my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) ever—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am trying to persuade the hon. Member that he should be addressing me.

Mr. Bruce: I thought that I was. Perhaps I was looking in the wrong direction at the same time. Perhaps, looking you directly in the eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I may ask my hon. Friend whether he has ever found a group of workers who were not overwhelmed and overjoyed to be given money in their hands to sit at home on standby, waiting to be called in to work. That happens not only in agriculture but in many industries, and we need to know what the Minister is doing about it.

Mr. Letwin: My hon. Friend makes a correct and helpful point. [Interruption.] It is helpful indeed, as hon. Members below the Gangway are helpfully adding, because it draws attention to the importance that individuals attach to that. However, I go further, because the important issue here, as in relation to many aspects of the Bill, is flexibility, which enables some of those workers in my constituency to be employed.

That is the point at which we cease to deal with a laughing matter and start to deal with something of the utmost seriousness. The need for flexibility is obvious in other parts of the Bill, but we are discussing new clause 12, which does not mandate a specific solution to the problem. It specifically makes it possible for the admitted experts, chosen by the Government, to review the situation at a decent interval, 12 months hence, and to ask themselves whether the interactions between the minimum wage legislation, the Agricultural Wages Board and the Agricultural Wages Order are such as to avoid any inconvenience.

I am sure that the omission in the Bill is an oversight on the Government's part. I am sure that the Government have no intention of throwing people on the dole heap because of a mistake in the implementation of the Bill in relation to the Agricultural Wages Order. I am sure that, if the Government carefully consider the matter—if they are unwilling to do so tonight, perhaps they will do so in another place—they will wish to reinstate something very similar to new clause 12, but slightly differently worded.

My hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) tabled new clause 12 in all seriousness. I beg the Minister to take it in the spirit in which it is intended, and to look carefully at the Agricultural Wages Order, especially at paragraph 6(9), which has unfortunate consequences in the absence of a new clause along the lines of new clause 12.

Mrs. Roche: Once again, we have had a wide-ranging debate. That may be the kindest thing that I can say about the contributions. None the less, I shall do my best to keep in order, and to speak to new clause 12 and to the Government amendments in the group.

New clause 12 seems to bear a fair degree of similarity to a new clause that was proposed in Committee by Conservative Members. Once again, we are in the territory of the interface between the national minimum wage and the agricultural minimum rates; the relationship between the Low Pay Commission and the Agricultural Wages Board; and the forthcoming review of the Agricultural Wages Board.

In Committee, I explained in general terms the key principles that we are seeking to follow in applying the national minimum wage to the agricultural sector: first, that the minimum wage should apply in the agricultural sector as elsewhere; and, secondly, that we should not seek to make wholesale changes to the existing agricultural wages regimes in England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

New clause 12 would require the Low Pay Commission and the Agricultural Wages Board to report to the Secretary of State and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food within 12 months of the national minimum wage being set. The report would cover the operation of the clauses in the Bill that govern the interface between the national minimum wage regime and the agricultural wages regime.

In effect, the new clause would pre-empt the discretion of the Secretary of State to determine the timing and the nature of any future referral to the statutory Low Pay Commission. Of course, the Secretary of State might wish the Low Pay Commission to consider agricultural issues at some time. As the House knows, the Government's evidence to the commission includes a discussion of the agricultural sector. However, new clause 12 requires a joint report to be prepared within a year of the minimum wage being set. We feel that that is quite arbitrary.

Mr. Boswell: I would not necessarily want the Minister to commit herself to having a joint report, but does she agree that it would at least be worth considering whether it might be to the benefit of both the Low Pay Commission and the Agricultural Wages Board if they considered the matter together rather than separately? They are more likely to get it right if they do.

Mrs. Roche: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. He has made it before and I understand the way in which he puts it. However, at this stage I would not want in any way to pre-empt what the Secretary of State might want to do on some future occasion.

Mr. Hammond rose—

1.15 am

Mrs. Roche: I will not give way as I want to make some progress, if I may. New clause 12 seems to suggest that the Low Pay Commission should inevitably be involved in the forthcoming review of the Agricultural Wages Board, which is planned by the end of 1999. Such a review was last carried out in 1993 under the previous Conservative Government. I cannot resist pointing out a fundamental inconsistency that the Opposition display time and again. The previous Government decided that they would retain a statutory minimum pay regime for agriculture alone. So, Conservative Members have already conceded the principle that there should be a minimum pay rate, although one would not know that from some of the contributions made this evening. For various reasons, which seem unclear, they want to confine it to one sector—agriculture—but low pay is low pay wherever it occurs. That is why the Bill will apply in every sector. The Opposition seem determined to let low pay continue and that is why they have consistently opposed the Bill.

For the 1999 review, there will be a full consultation and views will be requested on the way in which the two systems are operating together. Of course, the Low Pay Commission could be asked to contribute to the 1999 review, but we are not saying now that it must take part. The essential difference between the Government position and that outlined in new clause 12 concerns flexibility. The Secretary of State can refer any matters to a statutory commission, if such a commission is appointed. No doubt, we will consider that possibility nearer the time of the general review. Therefore, the new clause is unnecessary and, if Opposition Members persist with it, I must ask the House to reject it.

Mr. Hammond: I thank the Minister for giving way just before she concludes. Does she agree that one of the benefits of the new clause would be that it would send a clear signal to the agricultural community that there is a recognition of the special problems under which it is labouring and that the Government recognise that up front and are prepared to say that there will be a review at a fixed point in time?

Mrs. Roche: The Government are doing that already, as is shown by the amendments. We have argued that the two regimes should exist side by side, and there is to be that review in 1999. As I said, it will be a full consultation.

Mr. Ian Bruce: The hon. Lady is always most courteous. If the report is simply from the Agricultural Wages Board, the Government will know what is happening only as regards minimum wages within agriculture. The Low Pay Commission may well want to make recommendations. The old Labour party wanted all industries to have some form of wages board. With a majority of 77, I acknowledge that many of my constituents voted for a Labour party that was going to bring back wages councils, and we believe that new clause 12 would allow the Government to do that. Does the Minister intend to bring back wages boards throughout industry?

Mrs. Roche: The next review of the Agricultural Wages Board would have been this year, but the Government decided to postpone it until late 1999 to take account of the introduction of the national minimum wage. That is a clear, sensible and coherent way of moving the system forward.

The Government amendments make further changes to the Agricultural Wages Act 1948 and the equivalent legislation in Scotland and Northern Ireland. They are intended to clarify and remove possible ambiguities in the application of the Bill to the agricultural regime. They fall naturally into two subgroups: amendments Nos. 29, 36 and 30, which deal with supplemental agricultural minimum rates—such as the night-work premium, to which the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) referred—and amendments Nos. 31, 32, 37 and 38, which deal with the overlap between enforcement powers.

Amendments Nos. 29, 36 and 30 were designed to deal with a technical problem in the Bill's drafting, arising from the fact that where the Bill changes the agricultural wages legislation—for example, in schedule 2, paragraph 2(2), which incorporates a new subsection (2B) into the Agricultural Wages Act 1948—it sets out the requirement that > "No minimum rate . . . shall be less than the national minimum wage."

That is fine for the basic agricultural minimum rate, as the intention has always been that agricultural workers should receive no less than the national minimum wage.

The drafting leaves a question mark over the various other agricultural rates and supplementary allowances, of which mention has been made. It could be read as meaning that the other supplementary rates should also be at least at the same level as the national minimum wage. Amendments Nos. 29, 36 and 30 make it absolutely clear that the requirement that an agricultural minimum rate must be no less than the national minimum wage applies only to standard time, or piece-work rates of pay. They explicitly disapply that requirement in respect of supplemental or additional agricultural minimum rates.

Mr. Letwin: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Roche: No. I want to make some progress, if I may.

Holiday pay and sick pay are in a slightly different category, as they could be viewed as substitute pay rather than supplemental allowances. The amendments confirm that the requirement that an agricultural minimum rate must not be less than the national minimum wage will not automatically apply to holiday pay and sick pay for agricultural workers, unless the national minimum wage is determined, under regulations made under clause 2, as being payable generally in respect of time when a person is on holiday or sick.

Mr. Boswell: I am not sure that I have the matter clear, so I should be grateful for a further explanation. Bearing in mind the helpful comments of my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) on standby rates, I think the hon. Lady is saying that the national minimum wage should apply to the basic rates. I have been critical of that, as I have objected to the exclusion of any additional component from the equation. Is she now saying that each of the additional components will not have to apply to the separate national minimum rates? If so, is that also the case for standby rates?

Mrs. Roche: The change is set out in the amendments. The national minimum wage will apply only to standard time or piece-work rates of pay. I give an example. The hon. Gentleman has already mentioned the "dog allowance", as it is sometimes known. No one is suggesting that the shepherd must be paid at least the rate of the national minimum wage for his dog over and above the standard rate of pay, which must be at least the level of the national minimum wage. We want to clarify some of the points that were discussed in Committee.

[Mrs. Roche]

Amendment No. 29 deals with the situation in England and Wales, and amendments Nos. 30 and 36 make parallel changes in Northern Ireland and Scotland.

By contrast, all agricultural pay rate entitlements will be enforceable under the national minimum wage enforcement provisions as applied to agriculture. The amendments make that clear. Amendment No. 31 deals with the situation in England and Wales, and amendment No. 32 is a consequential amendment to schedule 3. Amendments Nos. 37 and 38 make parallel changes in Scotland.

The amendments may appear complicated, but they all contain commonsense measures that will remove possible doubts as to the Bill's effects in agriculture. We have always been aware of the need to ensure that the interface works effectively and without difficulties, and that is what the amendments are designed to do. I commend them to the House.

If Opposition Members press the new clause to the vote, I urge the House to reject it.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): It struck me that much of what the Minister said was irrelevant to the real problems of the countryside. I am acutely aware of those problems, as I represent a large arable constituency.

I made the effort to obtain the latest documents from the Agricultural Wages Board. To read them, one would think that, if the lot of the agricultural labourer was not exactly rosy, the board was at least maintaining his position in society. That is true at one level. For instance, we know that the average weekly earnings of whole-time hired men aged 20 and over increased by approximately 2.5 per cent. in 1996, from £237 to £243. That is hardly a king's ransom, but at least, as the report makes clear, it "represents a maintaining of earnings in real terms, when deflated by the RPI."

It is simply not the case that agricultural labourers are maintaining their position. That is why the new clause should be carefully considered. Agriculture in general is in crisis. On arable farms in my constituency the work force has been cut in recent years by a quarter.

Whole areas of our countryside are being depopulated of workers. That has nothing to do with wages and everything to do with the new forms of agricultural production. The city dweller—[HON. MEMBERS: "What about the new clause?"] What I am saying has everything to do with the new clause, which is designed to bring to the Government's attention the problems of agriculture and the fact that there should be a proper review.

The Minister did not address the crisis facing agriculture. The Government need to take the crisis seriously and to understand that it goes wider than the question of wages. The city dweller has a rosy view of agriculture.

The agricultural labourer is effectively being deskilled. He used to be held in high regard because of his awareness of the local subtleties of the soil and so forth. Now so much of agriculture is related to agribusiness and the ethos of his life and his skills are held in far lower regard. The Government must take action. They cannot consider the crisis simply in terms of wages: they must consider the wider problem and try to bring back to the agricultural labourer real pride in his work.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that it is not sufficient to make occasional reference to the new clause. He must address his remarks directly to the new clause and not make a Second Reading speech.

Mr. Leigh: I am grateful to you for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have made my point and, although the hour is late, it is a point that will be made again and again by my hon. Friends and myself who hold the countryside in real regard and are deeply concerned about what this Government are doing to it.

1.30 am

Mr. Boswell: This has been an interesting debate, which has ranged from dogs and night rates—as opposed to nitrates—to the overall state of agriculture. My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), who has just made his first contribution to our deliberations, has performed a service by reminding us that man does not live by bread alone, and that the countryside has spiritual as well as economic problems. However, it may be difficult to solve them by the introduction of a new clause, even one as modest and as ingeniously drafted as new clause 12.

I thank the Minister for her explanation of the Government amendments. I find it a little difficult—not wholly because of the hour—to unpick the finer meaning of her speech, because the subject is so complex. Her clear explanation merely reinforces my support for new clause 12, because the impact of the interaction of main and additional rates should be considered alongside the issue, which we discussed in Committee, of the impact of pay reference periods—a doctrine from the National Minimum Wage Bill—compared with the non-existence of such periods in the agricultural wages legislation. The issues are complicated, and that fact itself makes the case for a joint review some 12 months from now to examine the way in which the legislation is working.

I look the Minister straight in the eye and invite her to reflect on whether she can search her conscience and assure us that no further amendments will be introduced to make the two pieces of legislation work more closely together. We have already seen more than a dozen such amendments, and, if one is a buff of the agricultural wages legislation, one begins to doubt whether the cascading process of change has yet come to an end.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I listened carefully to the Minister, and I am concerned to hear my hon. Friend suggest that the Government should not reconsider their position. I did not hear the Minister say anything about the standby rates. The Bill is defective, so we want the Government to table additional amendments when it is considered in the House of Lords.

Mr. Boswell: I was, I hope, suggesting to the Minister that she might consider that point. If the choice is between leaving the Bill in an unsatisfactory or unclear condition or amending it to make it clearer, I would settle for one or two more amendments if they improved the Bill, despite the fact that I have castigated the Government on their cascade of new amendments.

The Government should reconsider the situation, and the Low Pay Commission and the Agricultural Wages Board should also be asked to examine the issues. We have all been studying the Agricultural Wages Order 1997—my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) more assiduously than anyone—but we can all make mistakes on the details, and I wish to correct the record on a point that I made. I said that the standard rate for farm workers was £4.17 an hour when it is £4.12. That is one of those King Charles's heads that I have had throughout our proceedings. I think that I saw the figure mistyped in something such as my NFU Journal. It has stuck in my mind, and if one can consistently waver, I have done so between the two figures. It is £4.12; I checked the order.

It is a serious point: the orders are complex, and it is important that they work properly. To use a phrase that we have not used tonight but that the Minister of State used extensively in Committee, it is important that the Bill is not discredited. We urge the Under-Secretary to continue to reflect and analyse and to make any appropriate changes.

I would not like to close without passing reference to the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and others about the state of agriculture. The Minister knows that this is a difficult time to introduce a national minimum wage. That reinforces the argument for a proper review in about 12 months. Opposition Members know that, every time the Government reach a difficulty, and sometimes when they have not reached one, they review the situation. They are doing so to the tune of more than 100 reviews. One more in a good cause would not be inappropriate.

Question put and negatived.

New clause 14

FINANCIAL STATEMENT AND BUDGET REPORT

'. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, acting in consultation with the Secretary of State, shall include in the Financial Statement and Budget Report an assessment of the cost of the national minimum wage to Her Majesty's Government in respect of employment costs in the public sector.'.—[Mr. Boswell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Boswell: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

It is interesting that we are now making excellent progress, and coming to the end of the new clauses. It is always right to end with a bang not a whimper, and this is an important new clause.

The concerns expressed in new clause 14 may seem some way from those that have just been expressed about agriculture, because the clause provides for something different. It provides for something topical, which I would loosely call seasonal. It imposes a duty on the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Some of us like the idea of imposing a duty on him slightly more than that of his doing so on us, as I fear he may do shortly.

The Minister need not feel left out, because the duty is to be performed in consultation with the Secretary of State. It is to include in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report", or Red Book, as we used to call it before it unaccountably changed colour,

"an assessment of the cost of the national minimum wage to Her Majesty's Government in respect of employment costs in the public sector."

That is obviously important for the overall implications of the minimum wage.

It was clear when we at last sighted the Government's evidence to the Low Pay Commission, two thirds of the way through the Committee, that they were also somewhat exercised about the matter. The extent of their concern is the only logical explanation for the fact that, while 600 other organisations had got round to doing their submissions to the commission in the six months after its establishment last July, the Government were unable to. Like the apostle Paul, the Government regarded themselves as born out of due time, but in the end they got their submission in.

I defer to my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), in his detailed knowledge of Whitehall-speak, of which he has even more experience than me, but it is possible by looking at the Low Pay Commission to see storm cones being hoisted, expressions of distress being rehearsed and very clear messages being transmitted in the most opaque Whitehall language.

If I were the chairman of the Low Pay Commission, who is no doubt doing an excellent job—and, even at this hour of the morning, I am glad that it is he and not I who has that task—I should be able to pick up those signals which say, "Whatever the Low Pay Commission recommends, please do not set a rate too high." The whole thing depends on a moderate rate being set for the national minimum wage. That will, of course, disappoint some Labour Members, but too bad—the interests of the economy demand that the rate should not go too high.

Mr. Hammond: May I remind my hon. Friend that, with the financial memorandum that appeared with the original draft of the Bill that was considered in Standing Committee, the Government spoke of setting a sensible rate, which would have no effect on the level of employment? Would he care to comment on that?

Mr. Boswell: Yes—the short answer is, I do not think that that was a starter then, and it certainly is not now. It is virtually impossible for the national minimum wage legislation to do something without doing some harm.

That fact emerges clearly from the Government's evidence to the commission in relation to what is described as the "Exchequer implications". That category is a wide one, and the implications are set out extensively on pages 19 and following of the Government's evidence, but I shall start by quoting the reference at the beginning to their concern. Their evidence states:

"However, for a given inflation target and assuming the underlying productive potential of the economy remains unchanged, then there will be an offset from reductions in the tax take elsewhere."

That is understandable.

"If the minimum wage were set at a level which resulted in a fall in productive potential, then we would expect an adverse effect on net tax revenues."

That is a storm cone—one that is hoisted even more explicitly in paragraph 97, which is the final paragraph dealing with the impact on the Exchequer. It states:

"If the national minimum wage is sensibly set at a level where real GDP and employment are left unchanged, then the net effect on the public sector borrowing requirement is likely to be relatively small. At higher levels of the minimum wage, the potential for adverse effects on tax revenues and public expenditure increases, with the risk of an adverse effect on the PSBR."

Mr. Ian Bruce: I have been lent a copy of the financial memorandum, which is apparently not reprinted for debate on Report. One reading suggests to me that the Government have decided to set the minimum wage at the lowest rate paid to anybody they currently employ, which is an extraordinarily low rate in comparison with what was talked about previously. Have the Government indicated that that is precisely what they are trying to do?

Mr. Boswell: If there were to have been such indications, they would have been suppressed, because that would not meet the political objectives of Labour Members. As an ex-Education Minister, I know that, whereas the Department for Education and Employment pays £4.91 in London, the lowest rate paid in the provinces—probably in Darlington or Sheffield, where it has major establishments—is £3.59. That shows the differential between London and the provinces, and I leave the House to speculate which of those two rates is likely to be nearer the rate set for the national minimum wage.

It is clear that any upward movement is likely to have an effect, both directly on the costs to the Exchequer of employment, and indirectly through its effects on differentials.

Mr. Lansley: Before my hon. Friend moves on from that point, has he observed that the Government present in their evidence to the Low Pay Commission a graph illustrating the cost impact?

Mr. Boswell indicated assent.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend indicates that he has seen it. Although it takes no account of differential implications, is it not significant that the gradient on that graph begins to sharpen substantially at £3.60? That is precisely the rate that the Government are trying to spin should be the appropriate rate, which would presumably serve their own purposes in respect of public sector and Exchequer implications.

Mr. Boswell: I am sure that my hon. Friend would not be so unworthy as to suggest that the Government would put a spin on anything, or would seek improperly to influence opinion. I was about to refer to that graph, because it is germane to our discussion.

I commend the Government on their record on public sector pay. Perhaps I should commend the previous Government, as the regime was set by them. A comparatively small proportion of the public sector is paid at a rate below £3.50 an hour. Only one in 10 of the labour force at that lower level are employed in the public sector.

The legislation will have an impact in various ways. There will be a direct tax impact, and there will be savings on in-work or out-of-work benefits, which is a sensitive subject. Differentials must also be considered. There are consequences for the Government's activities, which centre on the national health service. The Government say in their evidence that the Department of Health is undertaking a survey of NHS earnings, and will submit cost estimates. Those estimates have not yet been sighted, and I dare say that the Chancellor will not find them very congenial.

There will also be indirect effects. Charities and other not-for-profit organisations carry out important social care activities on behalf of Government. The residential care sector is one of the low-paying sectors of the economy. The Government's evidence shows that 142,000 cases in the United Kingdom have preserved rights to specific help with charges, and the median wage for care assistants was £4.29 an hour in 1996. Apart from those specific preserved rights, other elderly residents of care homes will expect to face higher charges as private sector homes have to meet the costs of the national minimum wage. That will in turn generate demand for further benefits.

There will be a knock-on effect on benefits if the Government are minded to improve benefits for child care. That is also referred to in the Government's evidence. It is suggested that over 30,000 cases already receive extra benefit to help with child care charges. The average wage in the child care industry, excluding nursery nurses, was £3.85 an hour in 1997.

The appendices to the Government's evidence give an overall figure of two thirds of a million people employed in various aspects of the care industry. Not all are low paid, but one would expect wages in that industry to rise. Given that it is largely publicly financed, directly or indirectly, there will be a significant impact on public revenues.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Is my hon. Friend as confused as I am by the way in which the Government give out statistics? When they want to show that any rise will cost industry and the Government very little, they say that hardly anybody is being paid below the figure they are considering for a minimum wage. However, in the rest of their rhetoric, they tell people that the greatest scourge of British industry and commerce is that literally millions of people are rushing about for £1 or £1.50 an hour. Has my hon. Friend been able to get to the bottom of why the Government are so schizophrenic, so Jekyll and Hyde, on this issue?

Mr. Boswell: Up to a point. I have not been able to get to the bottom of that. Perhaps the Low Pay Commission will do that for us. The facts that I am setting before the House are incontestable. The general impact on tax revenues will depend on what happens in the economy generally. We think that the legislation will make the economy less competitive and will have a long-term effect on the gross domestic product. That will tend to increase the net cost of the operation.

I acknowledge that the changes are speculative, and I shall return to the table to which my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire referred. It shows potential national minimum wage rates of between £2.50 and £4.75 an hour plotted against the increase in total labour costs and the number of workers who will be affected. It would not be feasible, and would probably be out of order to display the chart in the House, so I shall do no more than say that the two curves tend to move more or less in step: they are not widely divergent.

I shall concentrate on the cost curve rather than the number curve. The impact starts to accelerate at a minimum wage of about £3.50 to £3.75 an hour. An interpolation from the table shows that a hypothetical minimum wage of £3.75 will cost £220 million a year in direct labour costs alone. However, if the minimum wage were edged up by only 25p an hour to £4, that cost would almost double, to more than £400 million. There is a huge escalator effect, or, as it was elegantly put earlier, the steep gradient on the economic curve kicks in at that minimum wage range.

The calculation makes no significant allowance for pay differentials. When we add those, the figures become even more horrendous. One can thoroughly understand why, according to the bits of the Whitehall debate that are revealed one way or another in the newspapers, the Chancellor has been campaigning for a modest rate, and is very concerned at the suggestion by what might be termed the traditional wing for £4, or a half-male median earnings rate, which is interpreted most accurately as about £4.61. The Chancellor is dead worried about that.

Evidence from the Department of Trade and Industry, no doubt influenced or sanitised by the Chancellor, shows that it is saying, "Please do not set a rate that is too high, because, if you do, the escalator, the cost impact, will rise dramatically." It is also expressing grave reservations about a substantial rate for those under the age of 26. We shall come to that later.

Mr. Syms: So far, the Government have not said what the rate will be, or whether there will be annual rises or rises every two, three, four or five years. The legislation will have a major impact on the public sector, which is why the amendment is well judged.

Mr. Boswell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention.

What is becoming clear, even from my limited researches into the matter, is that we cannot have the final answer, because we do not have the rate. The commission will not be able to estimate the results until it has considered the evidence, and produced its estimate and then its recommendation. However, matters will change over time. They will change with the course of the economy, with the interaction between the various effects that I have mentioned, and as a result of tax changes.

For example, if the Chancellor introduced a somewhat different regime for child care in his forthcoming Budget, it would have an immediate repercussive effect if it cost much more than it was thought to. Conversely, any concession might be worth much less than was claimed, because the whole cost of child care would be influenced by whatever rate was chosen.

The new clause says that this should be run by the House and by the electors, annually, as part of the Budget process. The "Financial Statement and Budget Report" has been refined over the years. It is a useful working document, explaining much statistical information about the conduct of the economy. The Government influence their figures directly. It is, as it were, an internal loop, where Government decisions about the national minimum wage, albeit based on advice, feed directly into some of their costs, which then have to be catered for and met.

We think that it is entirely appropriate that the calculations that Whitehall will carry out for itself internally as part of the discussion on the rate to be chosen, should be made explicit and public, so that we can all understand, both this year and in coming years, what is going on and what the Government have done for themselves and their finances.

Mr. Collins: New clause 14 has particular importance in the light of an important story relating to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his responsibilities, which is to appear on the front page of The Guardian this morning, which will inform a no doubt startled world that the Chancellor has been in the habit of sending four-page glossy leaflets to senior Labour party figures throughout the country, and which quotes a friend of the Chancellor as saying that of course he does not expect the Prime Minister to resign, but thinks that, at some point, he may decide to step down in his favour.

That is why new clause 14 is so important. It would help to focus the Chancellor's attention on the role that he is supposed to be discharging: propagating not his career at the expense of his erstwhile Cabinet chum the Prime Minister, but the future of the British economy and, in particular, employment prospects in that economy. New clause 14 will serve an important purpose in not just focusing his attention on those things, but requiring the whole Government machine to assess each year the Bill's implications.

We all know how important the Treasury is to the running of central Government. It is the focus, the hub and the humming machine at the centre of the British Administration, and it is important that it should be able to have the locus, whether it be through the annual public expenditure round or the Budget process, as required in new clause 14, to assess every 12 months the impact of the national minimum wage. There are several ways in which the national minimum wage can impact substantially on Budget assessments.

Mr. Hammond: Does my hon. Friend agree that, in view of speculation that the annual spending round may be consigned to history, it would be infinitely preferable for the assessment to be done by means of the Budget report, as proposed in new clause 14?

Mr. Collins: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend, who has made a helpful point. Indeed, I was intending to deal with the impact of some of the stories in the Sunday newspapers, which underline the importance of new clause 14.

Clearly the newspapers were heavily briefed by people high up in the Treasury and close to the Chancellor. One imagines that Mr. Charlie Whelan was once again on his mobile phone in the Red Lion. The relevance of this to new clause 14 is that the stories said that the Chancellor was likely to announce in his Budget not only the abolition of the public spending round, but that there would be below-inflation increases in public expenditure across all Departments for the entirety of this Parliament.

The point about new clause 14 is that, in the light of that commitment, the Chancellor would have to assess how he could possibly reconcile the commitment to a national minimum wage—with pressure from the Low Pay Commission for it to be uprated year in, year out—with a policy announcement to keep to below-inflation increases in public expenditure in every Department.

[Mr. Collins]

There are only two ways in which the Chancellor could do that. The first is to decide to keep the minimum wage up, but public expenditure as a whole down by sacking people in the public sector. Many of the people we are used to being advertised in Labour party propaganda as the principal beneficiaries of the Bill—cleaners in hospitals and other people doing important and valuable, but low-paid, work in the public sector—would find the immediate effect of the Bill to be the loss of their jobs.

Mr. Lansley: Does my hon. Friend agree that, without new clause 14, there is a danger that the Treasury would simply treat additional sums of money spent in the health service to meet compliance costs associated with the national minimum wage as additional spending on health services? It would be much to the advantage of the health service and those affected by it to be able to isolate the costs of meeting the national minimum wage from the genuine increases in resources available to provide additional treatments for patients.

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point, and all the more excellent because it was to be my very next point.

As I said, there are two ways in which the Chancellor could try to reconcile the two differing elements. The second is, as my hon. Friend suggested, that the same number of staff are paid at the level of the minimum wage, but the Chancellor merely takes out of service provision funds that would otherwise have been available for that purpose. New clause 14 is important, because, if that is what the Chancellor intends to do, he should be required to say so, on the record, in his Budget statement.

Mr. Hammond: Has it occurred to my hon. Friend that there may be a third route? The Secretary of State for Health may be encouraged to follow the Secretary of State for Defence in seeking an opt-out from the Bill for the national health service.

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend's ingenuity has exceeded mine. I admit that that route had not occurred to me. Of course, he is quite right. Given the importance that both sides of the House attach to staff in the NHS—as we do to staff in the armed forces—there is some logic and force in his point.

New clause 14 would require all Departments—not just the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because, as he assembles the material for the Budget statement, he is acting on behalf of the Government collectively, and he collects information from all Departments—to focus on the serious impact of the minimum wage on their public spending plans.

Mr. Bercow: Does my hon. Friend agree that, if the Chancellor chooses to allow an increase—perhaps an annual increase—in the minimum wage, and then sacks people in the public sector in order to meet his other objective of containing overall public expenditure, he will not even succeed in that latter objective, for the simple reason that the increase in unemployment and the loss of tax revenue will mean that he overshoots his public expenditure and public borrowing targets anyway? He will have failed on all fronts.

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend puts that point extremely well, as I would expect of him. The minimum wage is a naturally self-defeating system. It has an inbuilt vicious circle, and can act only to increase poverty and reduce job prospects. That is why new clause 14 is so important.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer should be required in the Budget statement to link the implications and impact of the national minimum wage to what the Government have said is at the centre of their economic strategy: the welfare-into-work idea. The minimum wage is a work-into-welfare engine, in some circumstances making it a criminal offence for an employer to give someone a job. That is a quite extraordinary proposition to be made by a Government who are committed to shifting people from welfare into work.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I am following, I hope, my hon. Friend's argument very closely. It seems that the Government are saying that they have a wonderful strategy, and will get people back into work if they can only implement those economic drivers, whereas the Bill's financial memorandum states that they really do not have a clue about the Bill's effects. Even if Ministers knew what the minimum wage rate will be, they do not know how it will affect the economy. Are the Government resisting new clause 14 because they do not have a clue about its consequences, or because, if it were included in the Bill, the truth will be out, especially among Labour Back Benchers?

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend has put his finger on another interesting argument in favour of new clause 14. The Government's resistance to new clause 14, which we anticipate, may be based precisely on the new clause's annual requirement for clarification.

Many of our debates, yesterday and today, on the Bill have been based on the assumption that the Government are being opaque on the minimum wage only temporarily, and that, at some point in the future, they will clarify their views on it. At some point, they will have to set its introductory level. However, in successive months—as the debate continues on setting and uprating its level for the following 12-month period—Ministers may demonstrate a similar opacity and lack of clarity.

Perhaps Ministers resist the idea of an annual requirement to report on the minimum wage's impact and implications because that would require them to make up their minds at least once a year, whereas Ministers may well wish to keep Labour Back Benchers, public service unions and many other affected groups in darkness about the Government's intentions for as long as possible.

One might advance a deeply cynical thought—even at this late hour—by saying that the Government might wish to leave the minimum wage at a relatively low level for most of this Parliament, thereby assuring their friends in the Confederation of British Industry that they really are a new Labour Government, but then—perhaps shortly before the next general election—dramatically announce that new statistics have come to their attention that lead them to uprate the national minimum wage.

The hoped-for consequence would be that the Government would attract the votes of low-paid workers, not realising that many of those low-paid workers would lose their jobs if that policy were implemented. Nevertheless, by announcing such a policy a few weeks or months before a general election, they would hope to get the kudos for it, without having to suffer its economic consequences.

Mr. Leigh: Is not my hon. Friend doing an injustice to the Government? Surely new clause 14 is so obviously right that the Government will be bound to accept it. Although he is a young man, he will recall that the fate of previous Governments—such as the Heath and Wilson Governments—turned almost entirely on wages, and inflation on those wages. Wage levels obviously have a huge impact on the economy, as will the national minimum wage. It is therefore so obvious that the Government will have annually to review the minimum wage that they must accept the new clause, must they not?

Mr. Collins: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend. He may be right that I am being unfair to the Government—as I know that he never is. I try not to be unfair to them, and I shall take on board his admonition.

In raising the spectre of the Wilson Governments, my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) reminds me of an important point that is relevant to new clause 14. Although we have heard a great deal about the commitment to the minimum wage of the so-called modern, pro-business new Labour party, what did the old Labour party of Mr. Harold Wilson think of it when it was in charge of producing Budgets and Budget reports such as that described in new clause 14? It produced a White Paper—30 years ago, when Mrs. Barbara Castle was Secretary of State—that specifically ruled out a minimum wage, on the ground that it would have damaging consequences for employment and for the public finances. That might be another reason why Labour Members are a little reluctant to accept new clause 14. It would require them to examine the issue again and again.

The document to which I have referred was published back in 1967. Then, as now, the Labour party described itself as the natural party of government. Perhaps, once it had been in office for three years, it might find a rather large amount of information that would cause it to reassess its views. Its members are not in favour of new clause 14, because they fear that, the more facts they have, the more they will get in the way of their argument. They do not like facts getting in the way of their argument: they would much rather operate on the basis of prejudice, dogma and all the other elements that we have observed in the debate so far.

New clause 14 has so many advantages that, like my hon. Friend, I am surprised that the Government have not already indicated their willingness to accept it. Let us assume for a moment, however, that they will continue to oppose it.

We must consider what message the Government will send to public service unions that might have an interest, each year, in knowing the exact impact of the minimum wage on the public sector pay bill. What message are they sending to their great friend Mr. Rodney Bickerstaffe of Unison? Mr. Rodney Bickerstaffe of Unison is known for having forthright views about what the level of the minimum wage should be, and what it should be for his employees. We all know that what it would be for his employees would have a direct and important effect on the levels of public spending, and on the implications for the Budget assessment that the Chancellor would have to make each year.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My hon. Friend mentioned Mr. Rodney Bickerstaffe. I know that we are not allowed to refer to anyone who is in one of the Galleries, but my hon. Friend may have observed, as I did, that the spirit of Rodney Bickerstaffe was with us today. He was so disappointed by what he heard from Ministers that he left, because he knew that nothing would come from them.

Mr. Collins: I was not aware of that spiritual presence. Perhaps there will be further hauntings in times to come.

There may be another reason for the Government's resistance to new clause 14. We know that diplomatic relations between the Government and Mr. Rodney Bickerstaffe are in a slightly tricky state at the moment. Mr. Rodney Bickerstaffe, as leader of the largest trade union in the country, has warned against membership of the European single currency, and has pointed out that it would be damaging for his members.

We can imagine that the Treasury might resist new clause 14 on the basis that, at present, it does not want to do any favours to Mr. Rodney Bickerstaffe, who has dared to speak what is the unspoken and the unspeakable under the current Government, by pointing out that inclusion in a European single currency in the foreseeable future would be demonstrably against the interests of a large number of British people—not least the low-paid people represented by Mr. Bickerstaffe and his trade union.

Mr. Bercow: May I put an alternative proposition to my hon. Friend? May I suggest that, by rejecting our proposal, the Government will gladden the hearts of Mr. Rodney Bickerstaffe and others? If they are not prepared to provide an assessment of the impact of the national minimum wage on the totality of the economy, the incentive for Bickerstaffe and others of his ilk to seek continually to bid up wages in an irresponsible fashion will be that much greater than it would have been if such a discipline had been included in the Bill.

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend directs my attention to an important factor—although, as he and I may share a platform with Mr. Bickerstaffe before too long, perhaps we should not refer to "others of his ilk" in quite the way my hon. Friend did.

The important point raised by my hon. Friend enables me to turn to the next part of my argument in support of new clause 14. I refer to the impact on the national health service. In requiring the Chancellor of the Exchequer to report to the House each year on the impact on public service expenditure of the national minimum wage, the new clause would enable us, in our Budget debate, to give proper consideration to the impact on the NHS.

We hear a great deal from Ministers—and, indeed, from the Prime Minister, on the odd occasion when he favours the House with his presence—about the figure of £1.5 billion, which is the additional amount that the Government have supposedly put into the health service. We all know that that is a phoney figure, but none the less we know that, whatever the figure is—as my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) said—it will be appreciably eaten up by the introduction of a minimum wage, and could be increasingly eaten up if that minimum wage is steadily increased year in, year out.

What will be the implications for people in charge of NHS trusts who have had to cope with various changes in the way in which health service pay settlements have been reached in recent years? They have struggled with issues such as whether there should be local or national pay bargaining, and are trying to keep their budgets afloat.

Trusts throughout the country have received considerable publicity about whether they can balance their budgets. Under the provisions of new clause 14, they would be looking for guidance from the Chancellor of the Exchequer on a national pay strategy and the Government's central view on public sector pay. Without new clause 14, they may find themselves bereft of that guidance and negotiating with their staff with no clear guidance on how the Government view the implications of the minimum wage for their pay policy, if they have one, or the implications for overall public expenditure.

As we heard earlier, apart from the odd mention that he does not want above-inflation increases in public expenditure in any year from here to eternity, the only message from the Chancellor is an electioneering one—he would rather like to be Prime Minister. He has even dropped the part about the Prime Minister being president. That is not an argument for opposing new clause 14.

As the debate has continued, the Government have been extraordinarily reluctant to accept even the most modest amendments—including those that would give them more power than they had under the Bill and new clause 14, which would merely require them to report to the House, in which they currently have a huge parliamentary majority. Why are they afraid of reporting the implications of their policy to a parliamentary assembly that they control? Could it possibly be that, if new clause 14 were in place, they would be somewhat afraid of the reaction of their own parliamentary party to the full implications of the minimum wage and its knock-on implications for sacking people in the health service?

New clause 14 would require the Government to do no more than assess the implications of a policy that they tell us is flawless. If they are right about the absence of any imperfections in their policy, they should welcome the chance at least once a year to report to the House on its implications. If they do not, we must assume that, slowly but surely, they are beginning to think that perhaps Barbara Castle was right, and that a Labour Government should not support such legislation.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk): I am grateful to be called to speak on new clause 14, which I regard as absolutely crucial to the Bill. At the start of his speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) referred to the importance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. As I speak in the wee small hours of the morning, making certain that the national minimum wage will not go quietly into the night, we should consider that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not be in bed. He will be working hard on all aspects of Government policy.

I am a little concerned about the phraseology of the new clause, which the Minister might consider amending slightly, if it is acceptable to her. It refers to "The Chancellor of the Exchequer, acting in consultation with the Secretary of State".

The phrase "acting in consultation" is far too woolly. It does not define properly the responsibilities involved or the issue of leadership between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State. I would prefer a phrase such as "The Chancellor of the Exchequer shall desire, request and direct the Secretary of State". My hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale made it quite clear that the Treasury was the central Department in Whitehall. Indeed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer undoubtedly regards himself as the first Minister of State under the president—or rather, the Prime Minister. I should like that point firmed up.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My hon. Friend is understating the relative importance of Ministers in this Government. The importance of Ministers must relate to some extent to the amount of money spent on refurbishing their flats. As we all know—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order.

Mr. Simpson: I take on board my hon. Friend's comment. We must ensure that the Chancellor, who is the senior member of the Cabinet apart from the Prime Minister, can extract the relevant information from the Department of Trade and Industry. Many hon. Members present have considerable experience of working in the Government. They know only too well that, time and again, Departments do not hand over the relevant information.

My second point concerns which Treasury Minister should be responsible for working with the Department of Trade and Industry to obtain the necessary information about the national minimum wage. I assume that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who works 24 hours a day, would not want to do that. I am not even certain that it would be the responsibility of the Chief Secretary. Either the Minister of State or the Paymaster General, who have considerable experience in business worldwide, might look after the issue. However, my preference is for the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. She has a proven track record and could gain the information required for an assessment of the national minimum wage.

Mr. Hammond: Has it occurred to my hon. Friend that there is a Minister who serves in both the Department of Trade and Industry and the Treasury who could provide an apposite conduit for such a conversation between the two Departments—the Minister for Trade and Competitiveness in Europe? As the impact of the minimum wage on our public sector finances will directly affect our competitiveness in Europe, might it not be for him to effect such liaison between Departments?

Mr. Simpson: My hon. Friend has opened up a fascinating area of debate. With deference to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I do not want to be drawn into it. I am almost overwhelmed by the possibilities. Perhaps it is a task for the Minister without Portfolio. If ever there was a misnamed Minister, it is the Minister without Portfolio. He seems to have too many portfolios.

Mr. Bercow: I have no desire to tempt my hon. Friend to misbehave at 2.21 in the morning. He is asking important questions about which Minister should take responsibility for the report. Does my hon. Friend think that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury might be the most appropriate person, because of the immense experience, financial acumen and taxation expertise that she brings to bear in the performance of her duties—a fact on which I am sure that most hon. Members have remarked at some time?

Mr. Simpson: I have already said that the hon. Lady is my preference for the job. I know that some of my hon. Friends want to speak in the debate so I shall try to keep my comments to under an hour. We need to establish that the issue will be an important Treasury responsibility. The Chancellor will have general oversight, but my preference would be for the Financial Secretary to be given the task. It is not enough for the Treasury to act in consultation. The Secretary of State should be desired, requested and directed to provide the information.

Another point that perturbs me on the new clause—I am sure that the Minister will be able to reply to this—is the administrative and bureaucratic nature of acquiring such information. Conservative Members believe in minimal government; we do not believe in creating ever more government. Unless we are careful, we may open up a job creation scheme in the Department of Trade and Industry, with ever more civil servants collating the information.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale made clear, it is crucial that an assessment of the cost of the national minimum wage is provided so that ordinary members of the public—let alone Members of Parliament—can see, year in, year out, the consequences of it.

The new clause does not go far enough. Many of us think that there should be not only an assessment of the cost of the national minimum wage to the Government in respect of employment costs in the public sector, but an assessment in respect of employment costs in the private sector. The Bill will bear down on many of our constituents.

The new clause is admirable; I really hope that the Government accept it. My own preference would be a much more direct requirement on the Secretary of State to provide information. I would also like an assessment of the impact on employment costs in the private as well as the public sector. The new clause is crucial, and I hope that the Minister will accept it in the spirit in which it is offered.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): This new clause must surely be one of the most reasonable to be tabled in debates on this or any other Bill recently discussed. It does not even ask the Government to do anything that they are not otherwise proposing to do. All that it does is impose on the Government a duty to tell Parliament the result of their policy and how it is affecting the public sector. It is perfectly reasonable to ask the Government to do that, and hard to imagine what possible objection they could have to carrying out such a simple duty.

What has happened to open government? Have not we heard in recent weeks and months that the new Labour Government are an open Government, a people's Government, an accountable Government? However, as soon as they are asked to do something in the spirit of open government—simply to provide information—they refuse to do so. It is hard to understand why.

Let us examine the effect of the new clause. The one thing in it to which I take exception is the phrase

"the cost of the national minimum wage to Her Majesty's Government".

We all know that Her Majesty's Government do not bear the cost of anything. The taxpayer bears the cost. The taxpayer pays income tax, council tax and all the other taxes which the Government are trying to hide. The people are starting to have to pay such taxes because they voted for a new Labour Government.

Mr. Keith Simpson: And an offshore tax.

Mrs. Laing: Indeed—even more so in the past week.

I am concerned most with those who pay income tax and council tax. It is clear that the Government's objection to the new clause must be on the ground that they want to give the impression that no one has to pay for the minimum wage and that the policy is one of motherhood and apple pie—one that can be only good and not bad, and can bring only benefits and no disbenefits. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] That is simply not true.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend is making an extremely powerful speech. Does she agree that the way in which Labour Members cheered with enthusiasm when she made that last point is proof, if there was any consistency in what passes for their brains, that they ought to be prepared to countenance—indeed, advocate—the publication of an assessment? If the effect of the Bill will be all benefit and no cost, of what exactly, in a published assessment, are they afraid?

Mrs. Laing: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend. As usual, he is absolutely right. What is it that the Government want to hide?

Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood): Answer the question.

Mrs. Laing: Labour Members are only too happy to make a lot of noise from a sedentary position, but for the past hour or two, it has been noticeable that no Labour Back Bencher has got up to speak on this matter. Is that because they do not care? They are certainly not asleep at 2.29 in the morning. Why are they sitting here, saying nothing? They are making a lot of noise, but no one wants to intervene to answer my questions.

It would not be in order, would it, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for me to answer questions asked from a sedentary position? I assume, therefore, that Labour Members are afraid of new clause 14. [Interruption.] There is more noise from Labour Members. I can only assume that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) said, they are afraid of the information that would be published and set before the House if the new clause was accepted.

Labour Members are afraid because, as I was saying before my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham wisely made a different point, they want the people to believe that the minimum wage is a policy for which no one must pay or that, if anyone must pay, it is the fat cats, as the Minister of State said earlier.

The Government want the people to believe that the fat cats are the only people in the United Kingdom who will ever have to pay for anything. There will be precious few fat cats left when the Government have imposed all their hidden taxes on everyone and anyone they can think of.

Mr. Keith Simpson: There will be some offshore fat cats left.

Mrs. Laing: As my hon. Friend says, there will be some offshore fat cats left.

Mr. Collins: Does my hon. Friend consider that there is significance in the fact that, in recent months, the fat cat of fat cats, Mr. Ecclestone, was welcomed at 10 Downing street, whereas Humphrey was too thin a cat to stay?

Mrs. Laing: Indeed. My hon. Friend tugs at the heartstrings with the thought of poor Humphrey, that most lovable of unfat cats of the—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should be grateful if the hon. Lady would return to the new clause.

Mrs. Laing: I beg your pardon, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I will return immediately to the new clause.

I am anxious about the effect that the Bill will have on my constituents who, in their capacity as council tax payers, already face a huge increase, compared with recent years, in the council tax burden that they will have to bear. A very large amount of that council tax will help to pay public sector pay bills.

Mr. Swayne: I have been unable to get especially excited about new clause 14, but I wonder whether my hon. Friend would help me. Will she explain how the acceptance of new clause 14 will reduce her constituents' council tax bills?

Mrs. Laing: I appreciate my hon. Friend's question. The new clause would not reduce council tax bills, but it would explain to council tax payers why their council tax has risen so much as a direct result of the decisions of the new Government, who said that they would not impose new taxes. We have yet more hidden taxes, as I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) would agree.

If the Bill is not to raise council and income taxes even further to meet the public sector wage bill, the books will have to be balanced by cuts in the public sector bill. My constituents do not want less money to be spent on schools—[Interruption.] I do not understand why Labour Members find that amusing. My constituents do not want less money to be spent on schools and hospitals.

This morning, I visited a hospital just outside my constituency, which is used by my constituents, to witness the Secretary of State for Health opening a special care baby unit funded by charitable donations. People are concerned to put money into hospital care, not to see money taken out of it.

The Government are afraid that, if the new clause becomes part of the Bill, they will have to come clean with the people of Britain and tell them where their money, as taxpayers and council tax payers, is going. That is why Labour Members do not even want to participate in the debate on the new clause, which is disgraceful.

Mr. Hammond: I cannot and will not attempt to match the eloquence of my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing). I have one or two more prosaic points to make. The proposal in new clause 14 is important and as the debate has progressed I have become more convinced that it should stand part of the Bill.

Essentially, we should be looking at the effect of the national minimum wage on public sector employment costs. There is a considerable body of relatively low-paid employees in that sector and there is no need for this legislation for that problem—if it is perceived as such—as they are Government employees in one or other of the Government's manifestations. If the Government were so concerned about the problem of low pay and low-paid jobs, they could have made a start on 2 May 1997 by tackling the problem directly, without legislation, in those areas for which they, as the employer or ultimate paymaster, have direct responsibility.

I am moved to wonder whether the Government, despite their rhetoric about the wholly beneficial effects of the Bill, already understand the serious implications for the public finances, which have not been quantified meaningfully in the annexes to their submission to the Low Pay Commission. As my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) said, there has been no attempt to measure the impact of the restoration of differentials in presenting the expected cost to the public purse of the national minimum wage.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I wonder whether the spirit of new clause 14 would be met if the Government and the Chancellor stated how they deal with the low-paid—in other words, if they made a sweep of the public sector, through local councils and all the people who work for them through contractors, and worked out how much they would have to pay and put the money aside, which would prevent the need for additional money through the minimum wage.

Mr. Hammond: I thank my hon. Friend for that point. The important issue is that, without knowing the extent to which differential restoration will occur, it is difficult for the Government or anyone else accurately to predict the cost of the national minimum wage to the public purse or to any individual or company in the private sector.

That is why it is so important to have a mechanism for reviewing the national minimum wage and putting it into focus after the event.

Mr. Bercow: Is my hon. Friend aware that, on page 21 of the Government's submission to the Low Pay Commission, it is stated that the national minimum wage "may increase pressures on the public sector pay bill in some departments"?

Does he agree that the use of the word "may" in that context is patently absurd? It is only a matter of time before the Government finally use the more accurate word "will".

Mr. Hammond: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. I suspect that the Government, if challenged on that point, would retreat behind their customary mask of saying that the Low Pay Commission has not yet recommended a rate and that it is impossible—as, indeed, it is—to estimate the impact of the national minimum wage on the public or private sector without knowing the rate at which it will be set.

I come back to the absence of any estimates of the impact of differential restoration in the Government's evidence to the Low Pay Commission. I submit that the public sector has a relatively rigid pay structure, which is perhaps unsurprising given the development over many years of a remuneration structure that is less flexible than is nowadays generally to be found in private sector companies—it is perhaps more akin to the structures that would have obtained in large private sector companies 20 or 30 years ago. That is not a criticism; it is perhaps inevitable that the extra requirements for accountability in the public sector will encourage more rigid and bureaucratic structures than can develop in private sector organisations.

Does the Minister think that the impact of differential restoration in the public sector may be more serious than in the economy as a whole? In other words, will there not be a disproportionately adverse effect on public sector finances, because of more rigidly locked rates of pay? Is it not also the case that at, or just above, the level at which the national minimum wage is widely expected to be introduced, there is a large cluster of pay rates in important public sector organisations, such as the national health service? That means that the impact of a national minimum wage that is set at a level just below the wages that a large number of employees earn will have a marked upward effect in terms of differential restoration.

Mr. Boswell: Does my hon. Friend agree that, in the public sector alone, setting the rate at £4 rather than £3.75, which seems innocuous, would in fact double the cost to the taxpayer?

Mr. Hammond: As I said, I think that it is difficult for anyone to estimate with any certainty the cost of any pay rate, because of the imponderable of differential restoration, although I am quite prepared to follow my hon. Friend's guidance that the cost would be of that order. The issue will be critical to the public sector.

The fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is reported to be considering long-term settlements below the level of inflation for spending Departments puts the matter into a particular context.

The minimum wage will increase cost pressures on spending Departments in a climate in which public spending—if the Chancellor's spin is borne out—is likely to be seriously constrained. I wonder whether the suggested report might give a breakdown of the cost of the minimum wage by Department, as the impact will not be uniform across Departments.

Some Departments have a higher proportion of labour costs in their total expenditure, and some have a far larger clustering of lower-paid workers who are more likely to be affected by the minimum wage.

2.45 am

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend will forgive me if I am unduly cynical, but would not it be an advantage if the report were to treat not April 1999 but April 1998 as its starting point? Otherwise, we may mysteriously find that Departments of their own volition settle pay at £3.60 an hour or above and subsequently say that they were planning to pay those rates through collective bargaining, regardless of the minimum wage.

Mr. Hammond: Indeed. How does one establish the base line against which to measure the cost?

Mr. Ian Bruce: I am a bit worried that my hon. Friend, in listening to the spin in the press, has missed the statements constantly made by the Minister of State, who tonight asked whether £1, £1.20, £1.40 or £1.60 an hour was too low, but did not mention the £1.80 at which minimum rates start in the agriculture sector. [Interruption.] The Minister of State's resistance to the new clause may stem from the fact that Ministers have decided to go that low and to abandon any idea of increasing minimum rates in the public sector.

Mr. Hammond: That is an interesting idea, but I listened to the Minister of State intently in Committee and I do not expect him to feel comfortable with any such low rates. [Interruption.] I accept that the decision will not ultimately be his, and that he may be leant on from much higher places—Hartlepool, perhaps.

Mr. Bercow: I suggest that my hon. Friend, although not a member of the Treasury team, might be a suitable future author of the assessment of the impact of the national minimum wage, not only because of his exceptional economic expertise, but because at 2.48 am he still looks extremely relaxed and refreshed. Nobody could accuse him of being tired and emotional, as other hon. Members clearly are.

Mr. Hammond: I assure my hon. Friend that I have had no dutiable refreshment.

The central point of the new clause concerns the impact that the national minimum wage will have on different Government Departments and the crucial question for the British people of whether those Departments will be compensated for the cost of meeting the national minimum wage. People are right to be concerned about that and their concern has been emphasised by the recent leaks that have suggested that, in the longer term, we face a public spending regime that envisages increases at or below the level of inflation. That would imply significant real cuts in spending for Departments such as the Department of Health, a significant part of whose budget is swallowed up by labour costs, including those of many lower-paid workers who will be caught by the Bill.

[Mr. Hammond]

It is important that we remember that the Bill will not only affect those who are paid at a low rate. It may affect professional people, working in the health service or the education system, who work long hours for a salary that appears to be above any level for the national minimum wage. Because the national minimum wage will be defined in terms of earnings per hour, it is possible that people earning middle-ranking salaries could be caught by the Bill. That is not necessarily a bad thing, if those people are working very long hours.

Mr. Swayne: Is that not precisely why the Government exempted the armed forces from the Bill?

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend is right. We put that argument in Committee and the Government were minded to accept it. The Minister has repeatedly made the point that he accepted the exclusion of the armed forces because they have a pay review body. Is he thinking of excluding nurses and teachers because they have pay review bodies? I suspect not, but that would be one way to deal with the impact of the Bill on public sector finances.

Mrs. May: I am pleased to see that the Minister of State has returned to his place for part of this debate. From his comments on earlier new clauses, it was clear that the Government see the national minimum wage as a dogmatic policy that they will introduce regardless of the implications. New clause 14 is relevant to that point because it would ensure that the Government set out—not just to the House but to the public—the implications of a national minimum wage for public sector expenditure.

The paucity of figures for and proper analysis of the impact of the national minimum wage is telling. Whenever the subject has been raised in questions to Ministers, they have fallen back on the existence of the Low Pay Commission and the fact that they do not know the level of the national minimum wage. A Government determined to introduce a national minimum wage should have considered the cost implications for the economy, especially for public sector expenditure, for a selection of benchmark figures. We have no evidence to suggest that the Government have done that. They do not seem to care about the implications of their policy, because they will implement it as a point of dogma.

Mr. Letwin: Will my hon. Friend accept that the situation may be even worse than she describes? Page 23 of the Government's submission to the Low Pay Commission gives the estimates to which my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) referred and it states that the effect of the minimum wage would be greater if the differentials were restored above the minimum. However, it gives no estimate of the cost. Does not that suggest that the Treasury has concealed estimates that it must have calculated?

Mrs. May: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing that out. That was a key point of the argument advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond). Differentials are crucial to the minimum wage's impact. The Government have failed to address that and constantly try to walk away from it. The Treasury has not been willing to estimate the impact of differentials, presumably because it is concerned about the effect on public sector expenditure, and recognises that the figures would not be palatable to the House or the public if they were made generally available. That was also clear from the Government's evidence to the Low Pay Commission.

Several hon. Members spoke about the impact of the national minimum wage on the national health service but another aspect is mentioned in the Government's evidence: their policy for welfare reform. The evidence states:

"The potential impact of a National Minimum Wage on Social Security finances could in this context be very important."

That was mentioned in passing by my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), who talked about the cost of residential care.

I refer hon. Members to the front page of the March edition of Disability Now, which has an article headed:

"Minimum wage will hit us hard, warn homes".

It states:

"The national minimum wage could lead to job losses in care homes and day centres, the National Council for Voluntary Organisations (NCVO) has warned.

Voluntary groups gave evidence to the Low Pay Commission in January which highlighted the problems facing funders and providers of community care . . . A rate above £3.40 an hour could impact on disabled people in residential accommodation and those employing carers in their own homes".

I want to concentrate on that latter point.

New clause 14 is excellent because it requires the Government to identify the public expenditure cost in respect of public sector employment costs, but there are hidden knock-on effects that should be brought to general attention. I want to focus on the knock-on effect on disabled people who employ carers by using their disability living allowance to improve their quality of life through, for example, being able to get up and go out to work in the mornings. People are concerned about what will happen because of the comprehensive spending review, welfare reform and the operation of the benefit integrity project. Disabled people are worried about the future of their benefits because the Government refuse to guarantee that there will not be significant cuts.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is straying rather far. Would she please return to new clause 14?

Mrs. May: I was just about to. The cost of employing a carer could affect the quality of life of people with disabilities. It is such figures that need to be identified by the Government in considering the implications of introducing the national minimum wage. That is why new clause 14 is so important. It will require the Government to produce proper estimates of the implications of introducing a national minimum wage and set out clearly the implications for public sector expenditure.

While new clause 14 is general, the Government should produce figures that differentiate between Departments, explain the impact of reinstating differentials and identify the knock-on effects, especially in respect of social security and benefits, on the cost of employing people in the public sector to help people with disabilities. We have not had enough information from the Government. It is essential that they own up to the implications of their policies and make them clear to the House and to the general public.

Mr. Syms: I have waited since 3.30 pm yesterday to make my speech on new clause 14, because it is important. The Government have been honest and honourable in their proposals for a minimum wage. They have made it perfectly clear that that is what they want, but I want them to be honest and honourable about its cost to the public sector.

New clause 14 would make a substantial contribution to the debate. When the rate is set, whatever it may be, I am perfectly sure that many will say it is too low and that many others will say it is too high and cannot be afforded. That debate, which will continue over the next few years—certainly beyond the next general election—ought to be informed by figures produced by the Treasury. If the Treasury does not produce figures, others have a tendency to make them up. The proposal in new clause 14 to set out the cost to the public sector in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" will lead to a better and more informed debate on this subject, which is important to many families throughout the country.

3 am

The key point is that the minimum wage should be seen not on its own, but within the totality of the economic management of the nation. It is appropriate that the measure should be taken on Budget day and seen in the context of what the nation can afford in relation to all sorts of other areas. It is also important that, when the Government make submissions to the Low Pay Commission, the cost to the public sector is seen explicitly in the FSBR so that we know what information is being given.

I do not wish to detain the House by going on too much longer, because I know that many of us are anxious for the Adjournment debate—[Laughter.] We are trying to make progress as rapidly as possible and, had the Bill been better drafted, our progress might have been more rapid.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend said rightly that it is important to set the cost of the minimum wage to the public sector in employment terms in the context of the FSBR. In that respect, does he share my concern that one of the implications of the national minimum wage reflected in the next FSBR may be that, in order to offset the impact on employers' costs, the Chancellor may seek to reduce national insurance contributions by the lower-paid and to compensate for that by increasing national insurance contributions by higher-paid employees? That would directly put—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is far too long for an intervention.

Mr. Syms: My hon. Friend has made a good point, which reinforces the need for new clause 14.

Gillian Merron (Lincoln): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I read in the Register of Members' Interests that the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) has a number of family businesses, remunerated directorships and registrable shareholdings. Are those interests that he should have declared, given that they may influence his contribution to the debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a matter for the hon. Member concerned, not me.

Mr. Syms: My interests are all fully declared, which is why the hon. Lady can read them. This is my first contribution to the debate.

New clause 14 would ensure that the Government made a full statement in the FSBR of the cost to the public sector. That is a clear and sensible proposal. I hope that the Government will take it on board, because that would be a sensible way of ensuring informed and transparent debate in future.

Gillian Merron: Further to my point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I appreciate your point that declarations of interest are not a matter for you, but the hon. Member for Poole has not yet declared his interests and I feel it appropriate to the debate that he should do so. Given his directorships and shareholdings and his status as an employer, it is clear to me that he will have a view on how much he pays in wages—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already dealt with that point. Hon. Members are well aware of the rules of the House: it is for them to declare any interests that may be relevant to the debate.

Mr. Syms: I am glad that the hon. Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) takes an interest in my affairs.

Mr. Hammond: The new clause relates to the public finances. Like me, my hon. Friend is a taxpayer, so perhaps we should both declare an interest.

Mr. Syms: My hon. Friend makes a good point.

New clause 14 is an important proposal that would allow a more informed debate. I commend it to the House.

Mrs. Roche: We have had a fascinating hour and a half. I listened with great attention to the speeches made by Conservative Members, but it was difficult to establish what they had to do with the new clause.

As hon. Members will know, the "Financial Statement and Budget Report", as its name suggests, is primarily concerned with measures announced in the Budget. The minimum wage is not a Budget measure. The appropriate place to cover the potential costs to the Exchequer of non-Budget measures is the financial memorandum that accompanies the Bill. That is what we have done. We have also covered similar ground in the regulatory appraisal that we published with the Bill, as is quite proper.

Mr. Hammond: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Roche: No. The hon. Gentleman knows from debates on the Floor of the House and from our detailed discussions in Committee that I give way extensively, but we have discussed the new clause for an hour and a half, and while it has amused Conservative Members, it has added nothing to the debate. It would not be right to detain the House any further.

The financial memorandum makes clear that Parliament will be given further details of the effects on the public sector when the relevant regulations are introduced in the light of the Low Pay Commission's recommendations. One of the matters that the commission has been asked to consider when formulating its recommendations is the cost to the Exchequer. That may include any impact on employment costs in the public sector. The commission is due to make its recommendations by the end of May, and the Government will respond shortly after.

Any employment costs of the minimum wage to the public sector will vary across different parts of the sector and will depend on the level at which it is set. A regular assessment as required by new clause 14 would not make sense, because such costs would be identifiable only at the introduction of or following an uprating of the national minimum wage. It would be inappropriate and unnecessary to include such costings in this or future FSBRs. If the new clause is pressed to a Division, I ask the House to oppose it.

Question put and negatived.

Clause 2

DETERMINATION OF HOURLY RATE OF REMUNERATION

Mr. Lansley: I beg to move amendment No. 43, in page 2, line 22, at end insert—

'except that payment by an employer of pension contributions to a recognised pension fund on behalf of an employee shall be treated as part of a person's remuneration for the purposes of this Act.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 44, in page 2, line 22, at end insert—

'except that expenditure made by a employer in respect of training that is wholly or partly attributable to a person shall not be treated as part of that person's remuneration for the purposes of this Act.'.

Mr. Lansley: As hon. Members will be aware from their close scrutiny of the Bill, clause 2 enables the Secretary of State to make regulations governing matters that will include, under subsection (4), provision with respect to what is to be treated as remuneration for the purposes of the national minimum wage.

In Committee, we several times tested the Government's intention on what would constitute remuneration for these purposes, and found a surprising lack of specificity. The furthest that Ministers would go was to offer us what was described as an illustrative list of the components of remuneration, which would no more than explain to a good human resources manager what would constitute a list of pay and benefits. One or two specific issues were not covered in detail by amendments, and the debate and subsequent consideration clearly show the desirability, on grounds that I hope to explain, of putting in the Bill the specific treatment of two aspects of remuneration.

I shall speak briefly to each of the amendments, because, although they are rightly linked because they relate to the same clause, they are different in their treatment of specific aspects of remuneration. [Interruption.]

Mr. Keith Simpson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for hon. Members who are going to or coming from bed to make such a noise while my hon. Friend is speaking?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Such matters are entirely for the Chair.

Mr. Lansley: As I was saying, I hope to speak to each of the amendments. They deal with discrete subjects, but both relate to the same clause and specify direct treatments for aspects of remuneration.

Amendment No. 43 relates to pensions. Hon. Members will observe that it seeks to provide that, when an employer makes pension contributions on behalf of an employee into a recognised pension fund, they should be included in that person's remuneration for the purposes of the legislation.

It may be for the benefit of the House to reflect on some of the considerations in the Confederation of British Industry's evidence to the Low Pay Commission. The CBI rightly pointed to the importance of pension contributions as an aspect of remuneration.

The CBI says, for example, that pension contributions are often worth more than 10 per cent. of pay, and that both employers and, indeed, the Government regard such contributions by employers as playing an important part in the establishment in the longer term of a United Kingdom pensions framework and self-sufficiency in pensions.

I know that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would not expect me to comment at length on the desirability of self-provision through occupational pension schemes. For the purposes of this debate, it would be reasonable to treat that as self-evident and as a point that is agreed by hon. Members on both sides of the House. The intention of policy should be to maximise the extent to which employees undertake pension contributions that are designed to secure an adequate income in retirement, so that they do not fall back on the Exchequer or the benefit system for a reasonable income after retirement. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Many private conversations are going on in the Chamber. Would hon. Members please listen to the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley)?

3.15 am

Mr. Lansley: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was comforted by the fact that, at that moment, at least the Minister of State was listening to me, even if other Labour Members were not. I recognise that, if it matters, the Minister should hear me, rather than other Members, who will do his bidding in this matter.

If we take it as read that the desire of policy is to reinforce rather than to undermine occupational pension provision, what is evident from the CBI evidence—rather than quoting it, I shall render simply my analysis of it—is that there is a significant potential disincentive if pension contributions are paid outside remuneration for the purposes of the national minimum wage and if the wage is set at anything above a relatively low level. Clearly, all those concerns are predicated on a discussion of a particular rate, and the CBI's evidence is predicated on the difficulty that would arise if the rate were set "at a high level", as it expresses it.

If the rate were set high, and if, as a consequence, employers were placed under severe cost pressures and needed to consolidate what would otherwise be benefits in kind outside basic pay into basic pay to comply with the national minimum wage rate, employers would not, to the extent that we would wish, be willing to contribute to occupational pension schemes in addition to paying the basic wage rate.

That presents us with a serious problem. If we do not know at this point whether pension contributions will be included in or excluded from the national minimum wage, we cannot assure ourselves as a House as to the overall compliance of that policy with broader policies to secure greater self-sufficiency in occupational pension schemes.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My hon. Friend has an advantage over many of us in the Chamber, in that he sat on the Standing Committee. When it got to the regulations, did the Government give any indication as to exactly what they were going to include? Have we had any draft regulations yet that would help the House?

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend illustrates part of the difficulty that lies behind tabling an amendment of this sort. Although the Government illustrated for the benefit of the Committee—indeed, the Minister was kind enough to give us a note—the components of remuneration, and although they presented the same note to the Low Pay Commission, pensions were listed in a paragraph at the end simply as one of the items that might be included as a benefit in kind. I am sure that the Minister would not suggest that, in presenting such a note, he intended to say that all benefits in kind had to be included.

For example, tips were instanced as a component of remuneration, but the Minister has not vouchsafed his view whether gratuities and tips should or should not be included, and the circumstances under which they should or should not be included. Therefore, we know only—my hon. Friend makes a good point—that pension contributions on behalf of an employee form a benefit in kind that may be treated as part of that person's remunerative package.

Mr. Hammond: Watching the Minister's face during my hon. Friend's remarks prompts me to put on the record the fact that, in Committee, the Minister made his personal view on tips very clear. What is not clear is what the Low Pay Commission will recommend.

Mr. Lansley: I defer to my hon. Friend, who in Committee tested the Government and the Minister pretty much to destruction on the subject of tips and gratuities. However, we are not discussing that now.

I want to bring my remarks on amendment No. 43 to a conclusion—[HON. MEMBERS: "Shame."] I am surprised; I had thought that the points I was making were self-evident. For some reason, Labour Members seem to think that they are not. Perhaps they will rise and explain why they do not think that my points are self-evident—I think they are.

If the desire is to support occupational pension schemes, we must include in the Bill the provision that employers' contributions should be included in remuneration. Only by that route will we avoid the risk that employers will be under a perverse disincentive to cut pension contributions in order to meet their obligations under the national minimum wage.

Amendment No. 44 relates to training, but its intention is not to determine whether there is a national minimum wage training rate. That is something on which we await advice from the Low Pay Commission and regulations from the Government, using the powers in clause 4 to amend clause 3 by regulation.

We want to follow through the question whether there is to be a training rate, and what the implications would be for training costs incurred by employers. Is there to be a training rate? If the answer is yes, that suggests that that rate is lower than the uniform single national minimum wage rate. If, in addition to a lower rate for trainees, training costs incurred by an employer are also taken into account as part of a trainee's remuneration, the net effect overall will be further to depress the rate of pay for that trainee under national minimum wage legislation.

Unless the Minister or Labour Members suggest otherwise, that would appear to go a long way towards providing a specific disincentive to someone to take up a training post, as opposed to one which has no training but which might attract the full hourly rate for the national minimum wage.

If, however, there is not to be a training rate, what will be the consequences? Paragraph 66 of the Government's evidence to the Low Pay Commission—which I recommend to hon. Members who have not had a chance to look at it—states clearly their view that, even if they were able satisfactorily to define trainees for the Bill's purposes, there would be a risk that having a lower training rate would act as a disincentive to people, particularly young people, to enter a training post rather than a non-training post.

If there is no training rate, the logic of the Government's argument flows through into training costs. Likewise, if training costs are fully taken into account in the remuneration payable to a trainee—and we all know that training costs for relatively young and unskilled people who have a skills backlog to make up can be high in proportion to the cost of employment—that will have precisely the same impact, which is to reduce the amount that is available within the headroom of the national minimum wage to be paid as remuneration directly to that employee. That will put us right back to precisely the point that the Government, rightly or wrongly, suggest is the reason why they may not want a separate training rate.

I make the assumption—although I realise that it is not one that the Minister will confirm today—that the Government do not want a training rate. That is why they have gone to the trouble in paragraph 66 to provide so explicit a steer to the Low Pay Commission—that, instead of going to the trouble of trying to define trainees or running the risk of creating a perverse disincentive against establishing training posts, the Low Pay Commission should treat the age criterion as a proxy for training, and apply a lower rate to all those under 26.

[Mr. Lansley]

If that is the path down which the Low Pay Commission goes, and if the Government accept the commission's advice, including training costs in the national minimum wage will provide the precise disincentive to which the Government object. It would be entirely logical within the structure of the Government's own arguments—as presented to the Low Pay Commission and as will be implemented in the legislation—to exclude training costs attributable to a person from the calculation of a national minimum wage.

If for any reason I am wrong in my assumption—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I hear the sounds of Labour Members, who think that it is extremely unlikely that I am wrong; I am grateful for their support in the matter.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I wonder whether my hon. Friend has thought about—[Interruption.] I can hardly hear myself speak; I hope that my hon. Friend can hear me. A type of remuneration that could well be coming in the near future is an offer by employers to give employees a specific amount to help them pay back the very large student fees that they will have to pay. Many of them may be low-paid trainees who are just on the minimum wage, part of which may consist of training costs. I wonder whether my hon. Friend has put his mind to that specific situation—which could apply also to people attending technical colleges, who may have to pay for part of their course while they are employed?

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I had not specifically dealt with that point—which reminds me that, with the imposition of tuition fees and the proposed changes to maintenance grants, there has already been a significant reduction in the number of mature students applying to enter higher education. The reductions show, as one would expect, that Conservative Members understand only too well—rather better than Labour Members sometimes do—the incentive and disincentive effects of costs and charges. We may already be seeing the disincentive effects of imposing additional costs in higher education.

In tabling amendment No. 44, I hope to exclude the risk—to which the Government themselves attribute some importance—that those who are contemplating taking up a post with associated significant training costs for their employer will be discouraged from doing so because they will have to live with the consequence of a much lower wage than they would receive if they were to take a different job without training and the long-term benefits of acquiring skills, but which would deliver to them in the short term the single national minimum wage rate.

Mrs. May: Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be entirely consistent with the Government's policy of lifelong learning and expectation that people will continue throughout their lives to train and retrain in different skills if Ministers were to accept his amendment No. 44?

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I entirely endorse her point—which I hope will further encourage Ministers to accept amendment No. 44. The amendment is not remotely destructive, as the Minister has suggested—it is designed to be employee-friendly, and to address the Government's own explicit reservations, as expressed in their evidence to the Low Pay Commission. In a sense, it is designed to reflect not the concerns advanced by Conservative Members—substantially in Committee—but some of those presented to the Committee by the Government, the logic of whose position has not been carried through.

The Government—understandably—have resisted many amendments, saying that they must wait for the outcome of consideration by the Low Pay Commission before making regulations. That is perfectly all right. I am trying to make it clear to Ministers that we do not need to wait for that outcome—that there is a rationale for excluding training costs from remuneration where they are attributable to a person, whether or not there is a training rate in regard to the national minimum wage. The logic applies in both cases, which is unusual.

The argument about pensions is separate. It would greatly enhance the security and comfort of industry if it were made clear now that there is no danger of the broader policy objectives in relation to promoting self-sufficiency in retirement being undermined. I am thinking particularly of low-paid and vulnerable persons who would otherwise be without occupational pension schemes in retirement, and would therefore depend solely on the whim of future Governments regarding the benefits system.

The Government have said that they want to free people from that, through stakeholder pensions and the like. If we can help the low-paid not to rely wholly on benefits when they retire, and create a structure that is not potentially inimical to the provision of occupational pensions for low-paid employees, that too will be an advantage.

On that basis, I commend the amendments.

3.30 am

Mr. Ian Bruce: I am in two minds about amendment No. 43, which was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley). Hon. Members will have noted that I have not countersigned it, although many amendments have been tabled by us jointly—by a South Cambridgeshire-South Dorset axis.

Let me first observe what the hon. Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) mistakenly understands to be the rules of the House, and declare an interest. The issue affects me personally, and has nothing to do with what the hon. Lady was rather foolishly engaged to do on behalf of Whips and Ministers. It is the Stepford tendency. I do not accuse Labour women so much; it is generally the men who do things without understanding the rules.

I am currently a director of a company, which pays only a small pension on my behalf. I do not take a salary, and I think that is important. I also advise the Telecommunications Managers Association. As I am going to describe something that happened to some of its directors, I thought that I should make that specific declaration.

I feel that I should draw attention to a problem with my hon. Friend's amendment, because the Minister will decide on regulations, or regulations will be decided on later. I refer to whether we want a pension contribution to signal that someone is receiving an income—whether a provision in the Bill saying that a pension is part of income can trigger a requirement for someone to do something that Ministers may not have intended.

I am simply saying that many people—particularly directors, but I am not going to repeat the arguments—do not receive a salary from a limited company, but some form of pension contributions are being made on their behalf. I shall not stray too far from amendment No. 43, which refers specifically to pensions, but clearly any other benefit in kind could trigger a situation in which someone becomes an employee according to the provision. I simply flag that up.

I wanted to tell the House about the Telecommunications Managers Association, which has a number of volunteer directors. Although they have portfolios, they work totally voluntarily. When acting on behalf of the TMA, they may be publicly liable. Therefore, quite rightly, the TMA decided to take out public liability insurance for them. The Inland Revenue then decided that they should be treated as employees of the company. It is a relevant issue, and I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, know why I am raising it.

Any benefit in kind covered by amendment No. 43 might trigger something that the Minister does not want to trigger in respect of people who are not employed in the normal way. The Minister of State was trying to insist that someone was not an employee because they did not have a contract of service and were working voluntarily; however, they could still be caught by the regulations and by amendment No. 43.

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) is to be commended for introducing the amendments. They are an example of the focused approach that he and my other hon. Friends have applied consistently in Committee and on Report. The amendments do not represent a blanket solution. Having thought about the issues, my hon. Friend is proposing two different solutions—an inclusive one for pensions and an exclusive one for training. I hope that the Government will not sling the charge that we are trying to include everything in order to depress the real value of the national minimum wage that they intend to introduce.

On the pensions side, I agree with my hon. Friend that pensions are, and should be treated as, deferred pay. As he has said, they are a major cost element in the total remuneration package—one which is even greater thanks to the Government's imposition of an unwelcome pensions tax which has considerably increased employers' costs.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Before my hon. Friend leaves that point, I am sure that he knows that the European Court has already ruled that pensions are part of pay. That was the problem we had about men getting a lesser pension benefit than women. It was why the Barber judgment resulted in our having to change the retirement age for women.

Mr. Boswell: Precisely; although whether it would carry across into the context of the minimum wage is a separate issue which Ministers will no doubt be considering.

On the training side, again I agree with the proposals of my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire. I have a rather personal reservation about what might be called the quantum approach to training—the number of hours of entitlement—as I do about counselling. I am not sure whether personal activities should be treated in such a mechanistic way. In any case, there is a real difficulty conceptually in imparting a market value to training. Should it be by reference to the cost of provision and how should that be determined? Should it be at the margin or the average cost or by a commercial counterpart bidding for the service? Would it be necessary for an internal operation to have to work at arm's length in order to establish a transparent cost of training?

I very much agree with my hon. Friend that it would generally be desirable to encourage training by disregarding it for the purposes of the national minimum wage. It is an extremely important activity for the individual worker, in terms of the acquisition of basic skills that he was implying was part of the costs—that is a subject dear to my heart—progressing through national vocational qualifications and others right up to management grades. It is important at all levels of attainment. At the same time—here I add a slight note of reservation—it is important not to structure training in such a way as to create a disincentive to the company to carry it out. In one sense, excluding it from the national minimum wage remuneration package might be said to do that. However, I answer that readily by saying that the training should represent real value to the employer as well as to the employee. It should increase productivity; therefore, it is entirely sensible to draw the balance of distinction as my hon. Friend has done.

Mrs. Roche: I shall deal with the amendments in turn. My reasons for not supporting them are the same in each case, but there are differences between them.

The aim of amendment No. 43 is to ensure that the Bill states that an employer's contributions to pension funds on behalf of the employee will count towards remuneration for national minimum wage purposes. That would reduce the cash value of the minimum wage. No decision has yet been taken on the components of the rate.

The amendment would prejudge the Low Pay Commission's recommendations. The Government's evidence to the commission included a table showing some of the components of pay, which has been sent to all members of the Committee. I know that they found it helpful. That illustrates how complex the issue can be. I make no bones about that. That is why we have asked an independent consultative body to examine the issue and come up with recommendations.

There has been recognition this evening by hon. Members on both sides of the excellent job that the Low Pay Commission is doing. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) was kind enough to praise its work earlier. Hon. Members on both sides also said in Committee that the Low Pay Commission had taken evidence from a full range of employers and employees throughout the country.

Clause 2 will provide the necessary flexibility to reflect whatever recommendations are made.

Mr. Lansley: In relation to evidence to the Low Pay Commission and precedent, does the hon. Lady accept that the Agricultural Wages Board has examined pension contributions? It proposes that employers' pension contributions for employees should be included in remuneration and treated as part payment of the minimum wage.

Mrs. Roche: Tempting though it may be, those are matters for the Low Pay Commission. I do not want to prejudge its conclusions, as the amendments would. Being overly prescriptive would undermine the twin-track process.

The same objections apply to amendment No. 44, which deals with that part of an employer's expenditure that is attributable to training. The amendment would have interesting effects, but the objection to it is the same, regardless of whether such expenditure counted as part of workers' remuneration: the amendment would prejudge the recommendations of the Low Pay Commission.

I said repeatedly in Committee that clause 2 is an enabling clause—it is not prescriptive. The issue is one for the Low Pay Commission. Both amendments would seriously inhibit the flexibility of clause 2. If the amendments are put to a vote, I urge my hon. Friends to oppose them.

Mr. Lansley: I am disappointed that the Minister gave the reply that she had planned before I had moved the amendments. I hoped that I had so constructed my arguments that she might bend and allow at least the amendment on training. I understand that the amendment on pensions would deny the Low Pay Commission the flexibility to come to a different—albeit wrong—conclusion. I thought that I had shown that, whichever way the Low Pay Commission went, the Bill would have provided a reasonable solution.

I am disappointed with the Minister's response. When the time comes, I hope that Ministers and the Low Pay Commission will respond in the regulations to be brought before the House. In view of that, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 3

EXCLUSION OF, AND MODIFICATIONS FOR, CERTAIN CLASSES OF PERSON

Amendment made: No. 21, in page 3, line 9, at end insert—

'(4) If any description of persons who have attained the age of 26 is added by regulations under section 4 below to the descriptions of person to whom this section applies, no provision shall be made under subsection (2) above which treats persons of that description differently in relation to different ages over 26.'.—[Mr. Betts.]

Clause 4

POWER TO ADD TO THE PERSONS TO WHOM SECTION 3 APPLIES

Amendments made: No. 22, in page 3, line 11, leave out 'further' and insert

'descriptions of persons who have attained the age of 26 to the'.

No. 23, in page 3, line 17, after 'ages' insert 'over 26'.—[Mr. Betts.]

Clause 5

THE FIRST REGULATIONS: REFERRAL TO THE LOW PAY COMMISSION

3.45 am

Mr. Boswell: I beg to move amendment No. 55, in page 3, line 20, after 'regulations', insert

'(or where it seems appropriate to him any subsequent regulations)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 1, in page 3, line 32, leave out 'and'.

No. 2, in page 3, line 36, at end insert

'; and

(f) the extent to which the single hourly rate which the Commission recommends should be prescribed under section 1(3) above will have different economic effects in different areas of the country.'.

No. 75, in page 3, line 36, at end insert—

'(2A) The Secretary of State shall issue to the Low Pay Commission at the time of making the reference referred to in subsection (1) above a statement of objectives indicating to the Low Pay Commission any effects which the Secretary of State wishes to achieve and any effects which he wishes to avoid as a result of regulations to be made under section 1(3) or (4) or 2 above and the Low Pay Commission shall take such objective of the Secretary of State into account in making its report as prescribed by subsection (3) below.'.

No. 57, in page 3, line 39, after 'Prime Minister', insert

'the Chancellor of the Exchequer.'.

No. 58, in page 3, line 40, at end insert

'and the Commission may make such recommendations ancillary to their main recommendations as may seem to them to be appropriate.'.

No. 49, in page 3, line 40, at end insert—

'(3A) The Secretary of State shall lay before both Houses of Parliament a report made under subsection (3) as soon as possible after it has been made.'.

No. 78, in page 4, line 4, at end insert—

'(ca) to prescribe under section 1(3) above a single hourly rate which exceeds the average wage paid to the lowest-paid decile of workers (whether or not the Commission so recommends), or'.

No. 59, in page 4, line 9, after 'State' insert

'promptly and not less than one month in advance of the laying of such regulations'.

No. 60, in page 4, line 14, at end insert

', subject to the laying of a report before each House of Parliament containing a statement of the reasons for the decision in respect of matters contained in these regulations'.

No. 61, in clause 6, page 4, line 15, leave out 'at any time'.

No. 62, in clause 7, page 5, line 25, after '(a)', insert

'within one month of its receipt.'

Mr. Boswell: I judge from your tone, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you have correctly spotted that this is something of a rag-bag collection of amendments, all of which are key to the operation of the Low Pay Commission. I make no apology for such a collection, not least because some of the amendments should properly have been debated in Committee. Owing to the breakneck pace of our consideration, and despite the fact that the amendments had been tabled, they were not able to be debated because we caught up with ourselves. However, like a bad penny, they come back and will be discussed. I shall briefly summarise the amendments tabled in the names of official Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen, without adding any particular spin to them. I could leave my remarks at that—not least because I suspect that the House wishes to make progress.

Amendment No. 55 provides that it will not simply be in making the first regulations under sections 1 or 2 of the Act that the Secretary of State shall refer matters specified to the Low Pay Commission for its consideration. Any subsequent regulations would be included. That is a sensible provision. I hope that the Low Pay Commission will be consulted and have important things to do.

Of course, I understand that strategic recommendations must be made at the beginning, but they may need revisiting from time to time. The Low Pay Commission should not feel inhibited from doing that. I suspect that Ministers will say that, under subsequent clauses, such as clause 6, it is open for the Secretary of State to refer any subsequent matters to the Low Pay Commission. It would be interesting if the Low Pay Commission's recommendations were overturned by the Secretary of State. She would have to give reasons to the House for that decision.

Amendment No. 57 would add the Chancellor of the Exchequer to those luminaries, the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State, to whom the Commission must deliver its recommendations. That is, in a sense, a rewrite of new clause 14—which I shall not re-debate—about the role of the Chancellor in economic management and the central importance of all that to the impact on the economy.

In amendment No. 58, we provide that the Low Pay Commission may make ancillary recommendations as may seem appropriate to it. That is simply to prevent the commission from feeling that it cannot go any further than its very limited terms of reference in order to say anything useful about anything else. It may well have something useful to say.

The Under-Secretary was kind enough to say that I had said that the Low Pay Commission was doing a good job. That was a slight embellishment on what I said—although it is certainly going about its work with a will and it should not be prevented from saying anything interesting that it might have to say.

Amendment No. 49 and amendment Nos. 59 to 62 are about dilatoriness. We do not want the Secretary of State to sit on a report when she has it; we do not want her to be slow to bring forward her recommendations to Parliament. We need a reasonable time to consider them.

Amendment No. 61 is slightly different. It relates to clause 6(1), which provides:

"The Secretary of State may at any time refer to the Low Pay Commission such matters relating to this Act as the Secretary of State thinks fit."

The amendment deletes the words "at any time". It is a probing amendment, because we want to know the Government's intentions toward the Low Pay Commission; so far, we have failed to discover them. We should very much like to know how the Government want to use the Low Pay Commission in future. It would be helpful if the Minister of State placed that on the record. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): Three pounds fifty an hour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Boswell: I resume, when calm is restored, by moving on to amendment No. 78, which is qualitatively different from the preceding amendments. It provides that if the Secretary of State comes up with a rate that exceeds the average wage paid to the lowest-paid decile of workers—whether or not the Low Pay Commission had so recommended—she must lay a report before each House of Parliament, containing a statement of the reasons for the decision.

I return to the importance of rates, and the important implications of any escalation in the rate of the national minimum wage for wage costs generally. It is not a simple matter. The figures escalate alarmingly as the national minimum wage increases, as we have shown in relation to the public sector. I shall refresh hon. Members' memories, using the House of Commons research paper for convenience.

At £3 an hour, 7 per cent.—I round the figures—of the working population would be affected; at £3.50, 13½ per cent; and at £4, 20 per cent. There is a sharp escalation from a quite small impact—which, as the CBI has suggested, may be more or less manageable in the economy—at the £3 rate, depending on what happens to differentials, to a very major impact indeed, with or without differentials, at £4.

The implication of amendment No. 78 is that the Secretary of State should be obliged to give reasons for any significant impact of the national minimum wage so far as it is in excess of the bottom decile of earnings. If the Minister of State is sincere in his wish to help poverty wages, he must target his activities, and it seems a reasonable target, within the parameters of what the Minister of State and the Government wish to do, to concentrate on those in the bottom 10 per cent. of earnings.

I apologise for the wide-ranging nature of the amendments. I believe that they raise important points, which deserve a brief Government response, and I commend them to the House.

Mr. Chidgey: I hope that I shall not detain the House long. I shall speak especially to amendments Nos. 1 and 2. They provide for the Secretary of State to refer to the Low Pay Commission for consideration the extent to which a single hourly rate of the national minimum wage may have different economic effects in different parts of the country.

The amendments arise from robust and lengthy debate in Committee and on Second Reading, and reflect the fact that the Government have long argued that, for equity—as they see it—of the national minimum wage, there should be a single rate throughout the United Kingdom. Obviously, the Government intend to lift all those who are on poverty wages out of poverty wages, wherever they arise. Most of us would share and support that sentiment.

[Mr. Chidgey]

The Government also argue that the number of people on poverty wages does not vary much from region to region. If I remember correctly, the Minister gave us the figures earlier—it is about 55,000 in the south-east and about the same in the north-east.

I do not wish to replay the debate in Committee, but the proportion of those on poverty wages varies in different parts of the country. The difference between the proportion of the low-paid working in the south-east and in other parts of the country is particularly significant. That is supported by much evidence from, for example, the new earnings survey, the Low Pay Commission and the Trades Union Congress, and I do not think that it could be questioned or disagreed with. The ratio is substantial. As a proportion, it is about three times as many on poverty wages of less than £3.50 an hour in the north-east as in the south-east. Those facts and statistics are pretty robust.

We have debated at great length the cases for and against regional variations in the national minimum wage. The Government have made clear their position, which is well understood. However, it is important to examine the issue without setting up hypothetical cases that could be knocked down to support the argument, which was a tendency earlier in the passage of the Bill.

I want to address the Government's mind to the fact that there are those concerns—there are changes and variations. If, as we are told and as will no doubt happen if the Bill becomes an Act, there is to be a single national minimum wage rate, determining its economic impact on different parts of the country is a key factor. Because of the nature of the work of small businesses and how they operate, they have a preponderance of the low-waged within their work force. We may argue at length about whether that is a good or a bad thing, but it is a fact and the House would be doing the nation a disservice if it ignored the fact.

That is why I want to press the matter a little further and try to get a response from the Government, who are in danger of setting the Low Pay Commission on the horns of a dilemma. They have decided on a national rate, but if it is to lift the lowest-paid out of poverty in the south-east, it must be significantly higher than the lowest wages paid in other regions. On the other hand, the rate set helps those in the lower-waged parts of the country—

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: Liberal fudge.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, but it would be helpful if the hon. Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) would conform to the rules of order of this House and allow the debate to continue in the orderly manner that has been its characteristic so far.

Mr. Chidgey: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was pointing out the difficulties that may arise through setting a national rate because of the impact on different economies in different parts of the country.

The Government have made firm statements about setting great store in supporting a new social partnership in terms of industrial relations and our economy—surely something about which few of us would argue. It is to be a partnership between business, employers and Government—all stakeholders in a stakeholder society. My concern is to ensure that that partnership lasts, grows and develops. If that is to happen, we have to take account of the justifiable concerns of small businesses in less prosperous areas.

As the Minister will probably realise, small businesses are concerned about balancing increased labour costs with investment in staff training and increased productivity and against the comfort of knowing that cowboy firms will no longer be able to undercut their competitors by paying poverty wages. Those are the issues at stake.

To achieve and maintain that balance, to reassure small businesses throughout the country and to strengthen the social partnership, it is essential for the Low Pay Commission to tackle the problem of the different economic impacts in different areas of the country as a result of the introduction of a single national minimum wage. As we know, the Low Pay Commission is an independent body. The Government cannot pre-empt its judgment, instruct it to come to certain conclusions or preordain the results of its deliberations. However, to reassure and comfort those who feel threatened or uneasy about the impact of the national minimum wage in their region, the Government can instruct the Low Pay Commission what it may and may not consider.

I do not expect the Government to make any admission tonight of the different impacts, but I should like them to reassure the House that the Low Pay Commission will include in its deliberations a report on the different economic impacts that will occur in different areas. The Government say that the Bill is enabling legislation, and that the detail will emerge from the report of the Low Pay Commission to form the basis of secondary legislation. As we know, the devil is always in the detail. The House needs the details from the commission's report to scrutinise effectively that secondary legislation. I look forward to the Minister's response and, I hope, some reassurance on this issue.

Mr. Hammond: As hon. Members may have noticed, when we come to the end of this group of amendments, we shall be halfway through the selection paper. It will be appropriate to accelerate the pace of debate, so I shall attempt to be brief in my remarks. I shall look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say in reply.

4 am

I shall speak briefly to my amendment No. 75, which would require the Secretary of State, when making a reference to the Low Pay Commission, to give it guidance on the "objectives . . . which the Secretary of State wishes to achieve".

The Bill requires the Low Pay Commission to take into account the impact of the minimum wage on the United Kingdom economy as a whole and on competitiveness. It avoids the issue that many hon. Members believe to be the most important—the minimum wage's sectoral or regional impact. That issue should be addressed.

There will inevitably be a trade-off between jobs and other objectives behind the minimum wage. The Low Pay Commission should not have to make essentially political judgments and decisions. It is perfectly legitimate to ask it to report on the appropriate level of the minimum wage within parameters that Ministers have set, but unless the minimum wage is set at any but the very lowest level, it will cost jobs. In considering their wider objectives, the Government may have contemplated what cost to jobs they would find acceptable. The amendment would require the Government explicitly to spell out their aims and the relative weight that they give to their different objectives.

I do not want to be unduly controversial, but I take it as read that the Government would rather that the introduction of the national minimum wage had the lowest possible cost to jobs. It was suggested in the financial memorandum that if the national minimum wage was set at a sensible rate, it might have no impact on employment. Both the chairman of the Low Pay Commission and no less a person than the Deputy Prime Minister have publicly stated that that is not the case and that there will, of course, be a cost to jobs. I tabled the amendment to ensure that the Government explain how many jobs they are prepared to see lost and the other objectives that they want to achieve.

To illustrate the point, I set out my prescription for the statement of objectives that the Government would be obliged, if the amendment were accepted, to give to the Low Pay Commission.

One objective might be that the minimum wage should be set at a level that would not have a significant negative effect on jobs. The Secretary of State could also ask the commission to minimise the impact on the most vulnerable regions and sectors, as opposed to the economy as a whole. A single rate, across regions and sectors with different employment characteristics, will clearly affect some more badly than others.

Mr. Letwin: My hon. Friend has listed what he thinks the Government should try to avoid. What would he expect them to include as positive objectives?

Mr. Hammond: I would expect them to list poverty reduction as one of the principal objectives, but there is plenty of evidence to suggest that the introduction of a minimum wage will not have a great impact on poverty, because in-work poverty is a relatively small component of total poverty. I do not suggest that any erosion of poverty is not warmly to be welcomed.

The Government's statement of objectives might include some reference to disproportionate cost, and a cost-benefit analysis. The evidence suggests that the impact on poverty might be quite small. Most commentators have accepted that there will be an impact on jobs. The statement suggested in amendment No. 75 should give the commission an idea of what trade-off between job losses and the reduction of in-work poverty the Government would regard as acceptable.

The commission could then go about its work in a technocratic way, with the political parameters already defined. It could make recommendations that it believed would give effect to the objectives set by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Ian McCartney: Good morning, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not believe that anyone has wished you good morning since you came in to chair our proceedings.

The hon. Members for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) and for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) should know that the subjects of the amendments have been covered extensively in many hours of debate in Committee, including two all-night sittings. That is not to say that we should not discuss them here. I shall deal with each amendment in turn, but without extensive debate, given our previous discussions.

The amendments fall mainly into the category of unnecessary, although not harmful. The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge said two things that should not go unchallenged. First, there is no evidence that a sensibly set minimum wage will cost jobs. Secondly, no survey among employers during the passage of the Bill has been anything but positive.

The Income Data Services survey shows that employers are already moving to increase wages in advance of a national minimum wage, especially for their lowest-paid employees. Already, and even before the introduction of the national minimum wage, employers are beginning to move towards the Government's strategy of preventing and eradicating low-paid employment.

Mr. Hammond rose—

Mr. McCartney: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, because he was such a help to me in Committee.

Mr. Hammond: I accept the Minister's point, but does he agree that the issue is not whether the national minimum wage will reduce low pay but whether it will reduce poverty? Evidence suggests that low wages are not typically paid to heads of households and that the reduction of poverty by the national minimum wage will be relatively limited.

Mr. McCartney: It will do both. The hon. Gentleman's point reveals the heart of the Conservatives' sometimes sexist language. They think it is fine if a husband is well paid, but they think that a wife, by virtue of marriage, should remain badly paid. That is not acceptable. We want to eradicate poverty and to create fairness in the workplace.

Mr. Boswell rose—

Mr. McCartney: I would be grateful if the hon. Gentleman will give me a chance to say something about the amendments before I allow him to intervene.

Amendment No. 55 would require the Secretary of State to consult the Low Pay Commission after the initial setting of the minimum wage and before making any further regulations—for example, to uprate the minimum wage—but only

"where it seems appropriate to him".

That is neither fish nor fowl and is certainly unnecessary. Clause 6(1) already allows the Secretary of State to refer matters to the commission at any time. The Bill does not need another provision saying effectively the same thing.

Amendment No. 61 would delete the words "at any time" in relation to the Secretary of State's power to make further referrals to the Low Pay Commission. That is contrary to the proposals in new clause 8, also tabled by the hon. Member for Daventry. It is also unnecessary, because the deletion would make no difference to the meaning of the provision except perhaps to make it less clear.

Amendments Nos. 1 and 2 would add to the matters that the Low Pay Commission must consider. They would make the commission take into account the different economic effects of the minimum wage in different regions. I can assure the hon. Member for Eastleigh that the amendments are unnecessary. The remit of the Low Pay Commission already covers that issue. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade sent a letter to Professor George Bain, chairman of the commission, on 23 September 1997, which stated:

"the Low Pay Commission should have regard to the wider economic and social implications; the likely effect on the level of employment and inflation; the impact on the competitiveness of business, particularly the small firms sector; and the potential impact on the costs to industry and the exchequer."

It is clear that any consideration of the wider economic implications would include the differing circumstances around the country and that is exactly what the Low Pay Commission has done.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh, in his short contribution to the debate, made an important point and I do not disagree with it, but I shall approach it from another angle. It is right to say that the percentage of the work force that suffers from low pay differs between the regions—significantly in some cases. However, that percentage is irrelevant to the individuals who suffer from low pay. That percentage does not pay their bills or put money in their children's pocket. It does not pay the rent or the electricity and gas bills, and it does not enable them to put money aside for pensions, holidays, Christmas or all the other things that many families take for granted.

After 18 years of Tory government, the level and intensity of low pay is almost identical in each region—north, south, east and west. For example, in the south-west, 87,000 people earn less than £2.50 an hour and more than 55,000 families receive family credit. In London, the figures are the same—87,000 people earn less than £2.50 an hour and more than 55,000 families receive family credit. In Yorkshire and Humberside, 89,000 earn less than £2.50, with more than 85,000 families receiving family credit. It is the same across the country, in region after region.

Mr. Chidgey: Does the Minister accept that the amendment was not intended to dispute those figures? It dealt with whether a single national minimum wage would have different impacts on different regional economies. I agree about the effects of poverty on individuals and about the number of people in poverty.

Mr. McCartney: The hon. Gentleman, in most of what he said on Second Reading, in Committee and now, has supported the concept and principle of the minimum wage, unlike official Opposition Members who have mostly tabled proposals that attack the heart of the Bill. Except for one amendment in Committee, he has rightly chosen not to do that. He believes in the principle of a minimum wage. I accept that his strength of feeling on the matter is no less than mine.

4.15 am

Hon. Members know that the commission has gone far and wide in its pursuit of evidence. It has visited a number of regions in England as well as in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. It has been as thorough a piece of consultation as I can imagine, and has been warmly welcomed by business, employee organisations, trade unions and low pay organisations. Across the country, it has been appreciated that the commission has carried out its work thoroughly.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh need not worry, although I suspect that I may be not be able to stop him. Veterans of the Committee know that this is not the first time that we have heard those points from him. If he is still not convinced that the Low Pay Commission is paying full regard to regional differences, I have further good news for him. The Government's evidence to the commission deals with variation between regions. Paragraph 22 states:

"The Commission have been asked to recommend a single national rate. However, this rate will need to apply in a range of different local circumstances."

The evidence goes on to provide a wealth of data analysing pay in different geographical areas. Nowhere does it attempt to gloss over variations in the cost of living, labour market and industrial composition of various regions. Those are important matters that need to be considered by the commission, and it will do so.

I emphasise again what some hon. Members have heard me say before: low pay exists in all regions. There is poverty pay everywhere in the country and it will take a national minimum wage to end it. I hope that what I have said will mean that the hon. Member for Eastleigh will not press his amendments. If not, I must urge the House to vote against them.

I apologise to the hon. Member for Daventry, whom I invited to intervene earlier.

Mr. Boswell: I am grateful to the Minister for his courtesy in remembering. In a sense, the occasion has passed. As he accused Conservative Members of being in a degree sexist, will he confirm that he will oppose any proposals to rescind the major social advance created by the Conservative Government of independent taxation for husbands and wives?

Mr. McCartney: I may have an accent similar to that of the Chancellor but I am not my right hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman will have to wait. It was a previous Labour Government who introduced equal pay legislation in the teeth of opposition from Conservative Members. I remember the arguments from when I was a small lad. I am still a small lad, but slightly older.

That reminds me that I recently went to a function to talk about social partnership. Just before I went on stage, a helpful gentlemen told me that the podium was large and that they had got me a box to stand on. I thought that it was a joke until I got out there. The good news was that there was a box; the bad news was that it had wheels.

Conservative Members used to argue that equal pay would lead to hundreds of thousands of job losses among women. Not only was that not true; more women are in the labour market than ever before. That trend will continue with the Labour Government's proposals for assisting with pre-school and after-school facilities that will allow many women who are carers to take opportunities in the labour market that did not exist under the Conservative Government.

Amendment No. 75 focuses on the remit of the Low Pay Commission. It would require the Secretary of State to set objectives for the outcome he or she wished to achieve as a result of the minimum wage, which the commission would have to take into account. The commission would also have to take into account any objectives the Secretary of State did not wish to achieve.

Given those dictatorial requirements, I wonder why the Secretary of State would want to refer matters to the commission in the first place. The amendment would, in effect, dictate to the commission what its report and recommendations should say. It would undermine the commission's independence and be entirely counter-productive. I have said many times how much I value the commission as a source of advice to the Government. There would be no better way of impeding the commission and its works than by putting it in the straitjacket proposed by the amendment. The amendment falls into the "harmful" category and I ask the House to reject it.

Amendment No. 57 would require the commission to report to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as well as to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State. We have already covered this issue in Committee. The Bill reflects the dual reporting arrangements established for the school teachers pay review body. That does not imply that only the Prime Minister and one Secretary of State will be involved. The amendment falls into the "unnecessary but slightly irksome" category, because it is plain to me that the commission's report will be considered collectively, as part of the good administrative practice of the Government. The Government will put a collective effort into presenting evidence to the commission; no doubt it will come to a collective view on what emerges. There is no need for an amendment that seeks to single out individual members of the Cabinet in this respect.

Amendment No. 58 falls into the "slightly obscure" category, even after the explanation offered by the hon. Member for Daventry. It seems to suggest that the commission could downgrade its recommendations on the key factors referred to it by the Secretary of State—for example, the rate for the minimum wage—by comparison with other recommendations. It is, of course, open to the commission to set out its recommendations as it wishes, so the amendment is unnecessary. In addition, it remains open to the Secretary of State to determine the outcome. Amendments Nos. 49, 59, 60 and 62 have to do with various reporting requirements and they are all unnecessarily overprescriptive.

I invite the hon. Member for Daventry to indicate whether he wishes to press the amendments to a vote. If he does, I shall ask Labour Members to resist them. I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will be reassured by the answers I have given in respect of the issues raised by the hon. Members for Eastleigh, for Daventry and for Runnymede and Weybridge.

Mr. Boswell: This has been an interesting debate that has ranged across many different issues. I do not entirely accept what the Minister has said, especially in respect of amendment No. 58. I should be tempted to take the mind of the House on the amendments. Given the width and breadth of the group, some of my colleagues might feel more strongly than I do. To borrow a phrase, perhaps we should just see how it goes.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 9

DUTY OF EMPLOYERS TO KEEP RECORDS

Mr. Chidgey: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 7, line 28, at end insert—

'(2) Regulations made under this section shall require employers to keep records in respect of—

(a) full–time workers;

(b) part–time workers;

(c) home workers;

(d) agency workers; and

(e) such other classes of worker as may be prescribed and may impose different requirements in respect of different classes of worker.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 63, in clause 29, page 20, line 2, after 'so', insert 'without good reason'.

No. 64, in page 20, line 11, after 'particular', insert

'or knowingly fails to disclose any record or information which he knows to be relevant to the case'.

No. 65, in page 20, line 18, at end insert—

'(5A) A person should not be prosecuted under this section unless the officer investigating the case is satisfied that all reasonable steps have been taken to satisfy the interests of the worker or workers concerned through the civil proceedings set out elsewhere in this Act.'

No. 4, in clause 33, page 22, line 14, after 'section', insert 'and section 9(2) above'.

Mr. Chidgey: The amendments would require employers to keep records of full-time workers, part-time workers, home workers and agency workers. Their fundamental thrust concerns the plight of people who want to be home workers for reasons of economic necessity and who fall foul of what can only be described as criminal schemes to fleece them of what little cash they have.

Last week, with the help of my staff, I uncovered a scam. It is a simple affair. People respond to an advertisement in the free papers that are available in all parts of the country. It offers an opportunity to work at home and to earn substantial amounts of money. When they send their post-paid return envelope, back comes a load of literature telling them how they can earn £1.50 to £2 per envelope. It must be a magic envelope. The company thanks them for their inquiry and tells them that they have been specially selected because it needs people in their area to do this work from home. It explains that they will have a chance of financial freedom and an opportunity to make as much money as they want.

Such companies are anxious to engage only serious people. To ensure that people are serious, they are asked to pay a small registration fee of £10, £15 or £20. I am advised by the National Group on Home Working that people part with their money and receive useless stuff that they are told to assemble into a kit and to send back to the firm concerned. They do so, only to find that they have failed to meet the quality standards that the firm says they must meet, although it does not define them. People do not get paid £2 or even £1.50 an envelope, and they do not get their registration fee back.

That is just one example of criminal behaviour under the guise of providing work for home workers. My staff pursued the case and went to the address on the information that was sent to them. The fancy address referred to a suite in London but it turned out to be one of several letterboxes on the wall of a little post office or corner shop in London. When the proprietor saw my staff trying to find what on earth was going on, he said, "We have had many people trying to get their £15 back."

4.30 am

The amendment illustrates the need for keeping records for home workers so that we can try to check on people who make dubious or criminal offers of employment—which turn out to be non-employment—to home workers who are already desperately short of money. I have given just one example of what is going on. The Minister will be aware of a code of practice that has been put together by the Advertising Standards Association. The Minister will be interested in the comments and recommendations of the National Group on Home Working. My amendment provides an opportunity to raise this issue and to warn people of the risk of being criminally parted from their money by those selling bogus home working schemes.

Mr. Forth: What is the process of registration? The hon. Gentleman speaks about it as if it is the answer to all the problems that he has outlined but I am not clear on whom the responsibility for registration will fall and how it will work. Can he give us more details?

Mr. Chidgey: I should be delighted to do that. If the right hon. Gentleman refers to the Bill he will see the necessity for employers to keep records. National minimum wage officers will make sure that employers maintain such records. [Interruption.] Perhaps I may be allowed to explain the matter. The right hon. Gentleman surely understands the need to ensure that employers who deal mainly or totally with home workers keep records for them that are as full as those that are kept for full-time employees working in company premises.

Mr. Hammond: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is also essential for home workers to keep records because the employer will not be privy to everything that goes on in the homes of those people and how many hours are spent on a given task?

Mr. Chidgey: I do not disagree with the hon. Gentleman. If he is aware of the recommendations offered by the National Group on Home Working, he will know that it is eager for home workers to keep such records and to join the group so that they have additional protection.

I think that I have clearly explained the reason for the amendment and I hope that the Minister will be able to provide some comfort and perhaps provide information on how the Government are addressing a serious issue that could affect many thousands of the poorest people in society.

Mr. Boswell: I do not intend to follow the line of the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey), but that does not mean that I am out of sympathy with what he said. The amendments in my name and that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) are somewhat different, but they are of a piece because they reflect the concern of many hon. Members to get the legislation right and to ensure a fair income. As the Minister knows, perhaps more concern was expressed about what is now clause 29 on legal offences than on almost any other part of the Bill. That is proper, because criminal offences are serious matters and prosecutions should not be lightly undertaken. They certainly have a major impact, particularly if an employer is guilty of a technical offence.

I know that the Minister will tell me that the intention is that prosecutions should be reserved not for technical offences, but for serious failures to comply with the legislation. We have no time for proceedings against technical offences either, but it is important that we do not stumble into something by accident.

Amendment No. 63 requires that a person should be required to keep or to preserve any record and that, if he fails to do so "without good reason", that would be an offence. We added the words "without good reason" because we were concerned that people might inadvertently have records destroyed through no fault of their own. For example, I mentioned in Committee the possibility of the millennium bug, a fire or even a malicious employee destroying records. Those are all potential scenarios. I think that the Minister has covered this in a different group of amendments by providing for a due diligence defence, but I should be grateful if she would comment on the matter.

Amendment No. 64 relates to a different point, which goes back to the exchanges between my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) and the hon. Member for Eastleigh. It relates to people who may have information that they know bears on the case, but which they are not disclosing. I do not know whether the aims can be effectively achieved but, again, I should appreciate a response from the Minister.

If people are asked for material about a particular case and disclose some material that may or may not have been requested, but knowingly fail to disclose something else that they clearly know is relevant to the case—for example, if a home worker has kept home-working records that give a different story from the one that he or she claims—that should, in principle, be an offence. It is not an easy one to prove. There is an important point of balance here between the liberty of the individual, whose business and reputation may be at risk, and the aim of the provision.

I broadly describe amendment No. 65 as a last-resort amendment. We ask that the prosecution should not be proceeded with unless it is absolutely the last resort in that civil remedies have failed. That is entirely consistent with paragraph 44 of the regulatory appraisal that the Department has produced, which says:

"We would not expect the enforcement agency to pursue criminal prosecutions except as a last resort after other enforcement mechanisms had failed, since the main purpose is to ensure compliance rather than exact punishment. But there needs to be a penalty for any who continue to flout the law."

I have no difficulty with that paragraph. Indeed, we have tried to put it into legislative form in our amendments.

Mr. Collins: I should like to confine my remarks to amendments Nos. 3 and 63. I shall take the second of those first.

It is important to bear in mind the fact that the records of many employers are, through no fault of their own, destroyed, as my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) has said. A few months ago, a farmer constituent came to me in considerable distress because his family farmhouse had been burnt down and all his agricultural records had been destroyed. With the destruction of his records, he was unable to qualify for important Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food grants that he would otherwise have received. Therefore, because of that fire, he lost a material amount of income.

Without amendment No. 63, there would be a further risk. Farmers or other employers whose records were destroyed through no fault of their own—in the case of my constituent, the fire destroyed his home as well as his records of work—could find themselves liable to criminal proceedings for not having kept records. It was their intention to keep those records, but they were destroyed through fire, an act of God or another form of natural or man-made disaster. Amendment No. 63 is important for that reason.

Amendment No. 3, tabled by Liberal Democrat Members, is important for an entirely different reason. It is the point at which their mask slips. It has often been their contention that Liberal Democrats are the moderating influence on the Government; that they help to pull the Government towards the centre on some issues; and that in particular, unlike the Government, they have a long-standing tradition of support for enterprise, entrepreneurship and successful businesses. However, amendment No. 3 would take the provisions of an exceedingly bureaucratic, interventionist and top-down Bill and make them even more onerous on employers by specifying in great detail the way in which records, which are already required under the Bill, have to be kept and set out in different categories. For that reason, the House should reject amendment No. 3.

Mr. Bercow: I concur with my hon. Friend's sentiments. Does he agree that it would be marginally less bad if the Government had specified in the Bill the different regulations that would apply to different categories of worker? In fact, the pain would be much worse under the Liberal Democrat proposal because the regulations, which will contain various differences in respect of different categories of workers, will materialise months or possibly years hence. So we have not only the tedium of the differences, but the pain of waiting to discover what the differences are.

Mr. Collins: Indeed, there is considerable pain and absolutely no gain for an employer, which shows how the Liberal Democrats are now a party of the left—the hard left—which has abandoned any pretence of being a pro-business party, or even an enterprising party. That is why amendment No. 3 should be rejected.

Mr. Hammond: I want to make a few brief comments about amendment No. 64.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it be in order to add 5p to the rate of the national minimum wage for every hour that this nonsense goes on?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Hammond: More frightening would be to take 5p off the rate of the national minimum wage for every hour during the night that the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) has not been in the Chamber listening to the debate.

Amendment No. 64 would create an offence of withholding information that is available and required in a relevant case. I want to take the Minister back to the question of asymmetry. There is no requirement in the Bill on workers—and I am referring specifically to home workers—to keep records. That point was raised earlier and I thought that I saw the Minister nodding to suggest that she recognised that there was a need for such a requirement. However, she did not deal with that in her speech, so I would like her to touch on it when she replies to this debate.

Does the Minister agree that for an employer even to know whether he has met his legal obligation to pay the minimum hourly rate for each hour worked in the case of a home worker, the home worker must keep records? It would be both consistent and symmetrical if the Bill contained an obligation for that home worker to keep records, in the same way that there is an obligation on the employer to keep records.

Mrs. Laing: I am concerned about the additional bureaucratic burdens which the requirement to keep complicated records will place on businesses, and especially small businesses. It would be interesting to know whether the Government have carried out, or intend to carry out, a compliance cost assessment, especially in relation to small businesses.

It is a serious matter to place a burden on employers, especially small employers, that can lead to criminal penalties, not just civil duties. A duty may be perfectly reasonable for a large company that has a large personnel department, legal advisers, accountants and so on, whereas a small business does not have those advantages and often has difficulty coping with bureaucratic requirements. Many small businesses in my constituency are struggling to keep afloat while satisfying the bureaucratic demands of the Inland Revenue and others to fill in forms. It is likely to be the final straw for such businesses if extra bureaucratic requirements are placed on them without the Government having considered a compliance cost assessment and the consequences, which are also consequences for the employment of the very people whom the Government say they want to protect.

4.45 am

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet): I should like to speak primarily to amendment No. 65, although I should like first to comment on amendment No. 3. The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey), although suggesting the wrong solution, has highlighted a very real problem. Probably every hon. Member has represented constituents who occasionally have been fleeced by fraudulent—that is the only word for them—home-working organisations, or so-called organisations, which ultimately turn out to be, as the hon. Member for Eastleigh has so graphically described it, a fly-by-night letter box drop somewhere in north London. Someone runs off with a lot of money belonging to some of the very poorest people in the country.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh has, therefore, identified an absolutely genuine need. However, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) that amendment No. 3 is a top-down solution. There must be a way under the straightforward fraud provisions of the criminal law in which we can bring to book such so-called companies. However, it is a matter not only of bringing them to book, but of then preventing them from springing up under another name, 30 seconds after they have gone into liquidation, with someone else's money.

With due respect to the hon. Member for Eastleigh—who has clearly put much effort into his amendment and who raises a real concern—I do not think that his amendment is the way forward. I shall, therefore, be unable to support it, although I have great sympathy for his cause.

I speak now to amendment No. 65. For 15 years, I have represented the constituency that has had the highest unemployment level in the south-east. It gives me no satisfaction to say that, although that unemployment rate is—or was—falling dramatically because of the previous Government's economic policies. Much of our new employment has been created not by very large companies moving into the constituency—they have not—but by small companies which are often one or two-man businesses. Those people occasionally grow sufficiently to be able to take on, very often, a young person—the type of person at whom the new deal is supposed to be directed.

The entire Bill represents a very considerable disincentive to those small businesses to take on new employees. Not only are small businesses now thinking that they will not take on new employees, but—in some instances, in family firms in which a husband and wife have taken on someone—they are determining whether they can lay off people by working longer hours themselves. They know that their business will not be able to sustain any meaningful minimum wage level.

If one imposes on that disincentive an entirely new structure and the threat of criminality for failing to comply with some pettifogging bureaucracy, there will be an even greater disincentive to small businesses to take on the new employees whom I, as their Member of Parliament, want them to be able to employ. I agree entirely with my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) that any measure enforced through the criminal law should be a measure of last, not first resort.

All hon. Members have had experience of two types of people: of rogue employers, for whom I have absolutely no sympathy; and of disgruntled employees—who will make any complaint whatsoever against someone who, in good faith, has taken them on and tried to employ them well. Such employees have simply not come up to scratch by satisfying the requirements of the job. After they are fired, they go away and make one complaint after another, of one type or another. I believe that, if such a person can now go straight to criminal law before having exhausted the civil remedies that are already available, employment in my constituency, and every constituency represented by every Member of Parliament, can only fall. Small businesses simply cannot bear such a burden, and to suggest that they can does no service to future employment in this country.

Mrs. Roche: The amendments are mainly to do with the requirement to keep records, and with related offences.

Before dealing with the amendments specifically, let me explain the context of the Government's approach to enforcement. We devised the provisions broadly on the basis of a number of key principles. The first was effectiveness. Like all hon. Members, we want to ensure that those who flout the law are punished, and that any wrong that has been done is put right. Let me repeat what I have said a number of times in the House and in Committee: we are talking about a very small number of employers. Of course most employers obey the law and will want to comply with the Bill, and I cannot imagine that the Opposition will want to oppose the principle.

Secondly, we have built in flexibility. A number of enforcement routes are provided—enforcement by the individual or by the enforcement officer, enforcement by civil or by criminal proceedings, enforcement through industrial tribunals and enforcement through the courts. We have also allowed for the possibility of conciliation in cases of underpayment, and for such cases to be resolved without a tribunal. That approach avoids heavy-handedness and, I hope, will allow cases to be resolved swiftly and efficiently.

Finally, we have said that we want to consult on regulations under the Bill, including any regulations relating to enforcement—on record keeping, for instance. The feedback that we are getting from business, both large and small, suggests that our approach is broadly welcomed by the business community.

Reference has been made to our approach to small business. I entirely agree that small business is vital to the country's welfare, and I take a close interest in the issue. I think we can say that, in their short life, the current Administration have done a great deal for small business—so much, indeed, that, according to a recent survey, we are now in the political lead in the small business community. Small businesses admire not only our approach to the economy, but every other legislative aim that we have.

Amendment No. 3 is linked with amendment No. 4, which is purely consequential. I understand what the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) was saying, and sympathise with his case, which was echoed by the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale). Amendment No. 3, however, is rather prescriptive: it seeks to prescribe the type of records that employers will be required to keep by making sure that records are kept for all workers in all categories. I have every sympathy with the thought behind the amendment.

Of course records should be kept for all types of workers, not just those conforming to the so-called standard pattern of full-time or nine-to-five work. We all know that the workplace is extremely varied, and is becoming even more complex. That is why, although sympathising with the hon. Gentleman's motives, we will ask the House to reject the amendment—if I do not manage to persuade the hon. Gentleman to withdraw it.

Mr. Chidgey: I follow the points that the Minister is making. My speech emphasised my particular concern about the abuse of people attempting to get home work. I would be grateful if she would address that specific point, as well as the main context and thrust of the amendments.

Mrs. Roche: Yes. We are interested to hear the point that the hon. Gentleman raised. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minster of State would like to discuss the matter with him and that it would be a useful discussion. We deliberately did not make clause 9 prescriptive—rather, it provides the power for the Secretary of State to make the required regulations regarding record keeping. We shall not know exactly what records will be needed until the Government decide the detail of how to implement the national minimum wage in the light of the Low Pay Commission report. As I have said, we want to consult the business community about regulations, particularly on record keeping. It is quite right that the hon. Gentleman wants to make representations and we shall listen carefully.

The regulations will set out the type of records that employers will be required to keep and how long records must be kept. They will also provide differently for different circumstances and descriptions of worker. We chose that direction for very good reasons—to provide time to consider what records should be kept and to give flexibility. We want to avoid imposing unnecessary burdens on business.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Has the Minister considered whether there will be any de minimis requirements? For example, some people employ a cleaner for two or three hours a week. It is a low-pay sector that may concern the Government. Will there be a simple form of record keeping for the single householder who has taken someone on in that way?

Mrs. Roche: Of course we shall ensure that we do not impose unnecessary burdens on business. That is precisely why we chose the route we did and why consultation is important. Indeed, businesses in the hon. Gentleman's constituency may want to participate in that consultation. As I have said already, business has welcomed our approach.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) mentioned home workers and I understand the point that he made. In many, if not all cases, under the employment contract or understanding with the home worker, the employer requires the home worker to keep records.

The Government have already explained that they will be consulting business on all the draft regulations. The recommendations of the Low Pay Commission will also be important, especially regarding the calculation of a worker's hourly rate for minimum wage purposes and the length of the reference period. All those factors will play an important part in determining the exact nature of the records that employers must keep. We believe in consultation and that is why the views of the business community have a key role before specific regulations are decided.

Clause 9, in conjunction with clause 49 which allows for regulations to make different provision for different cases, provides such flexibility. The amendment, on the other hand, is too prescriptive and ought to be rejected.

Amendments Nos. 63 to 65 relate to offences in relation to record keeping and more generally. I said in Committee and again in the House that clause 29, which covers offences, closely follows earlier legislation. As I said in Committee, the Government are not breaking new ground and we are content with the way in which the clause is framed.

Amendment No. 63 would affect subsection (2) of clause 29—the offences clause—which deals with the failure to keep or preserve any record in accordance with the regulations made under clause 9. The amendment would weaken the clause by adding the words, "without good reason". That would allow an employer to rely on having a good reason for failing to comply.

As I said in Committee, we do not expect substantial numbers of criminal prosecutions. However, when there are prosecutions, it will be necessary to prosecute effectively. The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) recognised that. To have good law, enforcement provisions must be as effective as possible. The amendment would change the nature of the offence, making successful prosecution more difficult, because it would be necessary to show that there was no good reason for the breach.

The amendment would also be inconsistent with earlier legislative treatment of the failure to keep records, which did not allow good reason as a ground for failure to comply. Again, I am referring to section 19(4) of the Wages Act 1986. I made a great deal of reference to that Act in Committee. It does not take a genius to remember that it was enacted under a previous Conservative Administration. I did not notice any great outcry about the criminal sanctions in it.

The provisions in clause 46(4) already provide an employer with a defence in terms of his duty to keep records. If he can prove that he exercised all due diligence and took all reasonable precautions to ensure that he and any person under his control complied with the provisions of the Bill and any regulations made under it, he has a defence against a charge under clause 29(2).

Amendment No. 64 appears to go in the opposite direction from amendment No. 63, making the clause harsher. That would be a great problem for enforcement. It appears to strengthen the clause by adding a provision explicitly covering a person who knowingly fails to disclose any record or information that he knows to be relevant. It would, however, go beyond the equivalent provision in the Wages Act 1986—section 21(1)—on which clause 29(4) is modelled. The Conservatives enacted and supported those measures when in government. We have modelled our provisions on the same legislation, but the Conservatives still object that we are breaking new ground on such offences. Nothing could be further from the truth. The amendment is unnecessary and I ask the House to reject it.

Amendment No. 65 would require the officer investigating a case to be satisfied that all reasonable steps had been taken, by civil proceedings, to satisfy the interests of the worker or workers before proceedings were commenced for any of the offences in clause 29. Under our proposals, criminal proceedings would be a last resort. However, failure to pay the minimum wage is not the only criminal offence. It makes no sense to insist on going through civil procedures for some of the other offences.

We have demonstrated a flexible approach. There are criminal sanctions, but they are a last resort. I ask the House to reject the amendments if they are pursued.

Mr. Chidgey: I have listened to the Minister's arguments; I am very pleased that she has taken seriously the points that I raised and that I will have an opportunity to discuss them with her. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 11

POWERS OF OFFICERS

Mrs. Roche: I beg to move amendment No. 13, in page 8, line 41, at end insert

'(as in force when the award is made)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 14 to 19.

Mrs. Roche: The amendments remove a number of possible ambiguities from the clauses dealing with enforcement and the right to appeal. I shall deal with the most straightforward first. Amendments Nos. 13 and 17 ensure that it is absolutely clear which national minimum wage rate is to be used for calculating the amount of the penalty. Amendment No. 13, which amends clause 11, refers to the award for failure to allow access to records. Amendment No. 17, which amends clause 19, refers to the financial penalty for non-compliance with an enforcement notice.

In both cases, we want to make it clear that the relevant national minimum wage rate is the rate in force when the award is made. That avoids any difficulties that could arise if the national minimum wage rate were changed while a complaint was being pursued. It is a small, technical change, but one which we believe is necessary to avoid ambiguity.

Amendment No. 14 deals with enforcement notices relating to groups of workers. It ensures that enforcement notices can be framed so that they apply to a whole group of workers by description.

Amendments Nos. 15 and 18 and the consequential amendments address an issue that was raised in Committee. We had an important debate on whether the enforcement officer's opinion or objective facts should be considered when establishing grounds for a successful appeal in clauses 17 and 20. As currently drafted, there is a possibility, however small, that the clauses could be interpreted as equating the enforcement officer's opinion—we had extensive debate on this—that there were grounds for serving the notice with the factual state of affairs. That is, of course, not the Government's intention.

I clearly pointed out in Committee that an officer, like any public servant, will act reasonably by definition. The officer's opinion must therefore be based on fact. The hon. Members for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) and—if my memory serves me right—for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) will be particularly pleased to note that the amendments remove any possibility of doubt on that score. It is the facts which count. I hope that this is a good example of the Government listening to the debate in Committee.

Amendment No. 15 also clarifies the position in relation to an appeal against a notice involving more than one worker. Paragraph (a) deals with a situation where a notice is wholly wrong, and paragraph (b) deals with a situation where a notice rightly relates to some workers, but wrongly relates to others. In conjunction with subsection (8), as amended, that allows a tribunal to rectify such a notice by eliminating all references to the wrongly included workers.

The group of amendments is very much in the nature of good housekeeping. They are in order to remove any possible ambiguity, however small. They are a very good illustration of how, as my hon. Friend the Minister of State says, the Government are determined to get the Bill right. I commend them to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 15

NON-COMPLIANCE: WORKER ENTITLED TO ADDITIONAL REMUNERATION

Mr. Bercow: I beg to move amendment No. 41, in page 11, line 18, at end insert—

'plus two per cent above the prevailing Bank of England base rate.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 68, in page 11, line 21, at end add—

'(4) The entitlement to additional remuneration referred to in subsection (1) above shall be limited to an amount as described in subsection (2) above which relates to a period of 12 months immediately preceding the service of a notice under section 17 of this Act or the initiation of civil proceedings for breach of contract in respect of the alleged underpayment.'.

Mr. Bercow: The purpose of clause 15, which the amendment tabled in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) is designed to amend, is to secure additional remuneration for employees who are deprived of the payment to which they are entitled.

As far as I am aware, none of my hon. Friends has any objection to clause 15. I certainly have no objection to it in so far as it is designed to improve the remuneration of workers. My problem with clause 15, as the Minister of State will recall from our discussions in Committee six weeks ago, is that I do not feel that it adequately secures that objective.

There is no inconsistency in opposing the principle of the minimum wage and believing that, when that national minimum wage is on the statute book, people should receive it, and that, if they do not receive it, they should secure recompense as a result. I do not want there to be a law on the statute book that is, wilfully or otherwise, disregarded by a minority of employers, for which disregard employees are unable to secure redress.

The Government have said until now, in clause 15, that employees should be entitled to the difference between the payment that they did receive and the payment that they should have received in any given pay reference period. It is not accurate in any real sense to describe that differential payment as additional remuneration for the employee. I am not quibbling with the Minister about his good intent, but I genuinely believe that it does not constitute additional remuneration.

The difference between what the employee did receive and what he should have received cannot in any reasonable sense be considered to be additional remuneration. It is simply the remuneration under the terms of the Bill, soon to be the Act, to which the employee is entitled. That is not additional remuneration. Additional remuneration would be something over and above that difference, and something that reflected the period of non-payment that the employee had suffered.

I raised that point in Committee, as the Minister of State will recall, on 27 January 1998 at columns 493 to 496. Fittingly, it is exactly six weeks since that debate took place. On that occasion, I think supported by a number of my hon. Friends, I argued for the payment of compensation for, or interest on, unpaid wages to employees. In response to the points that I made, the Minister of State graciously observed—I am sure that he will not object to me quoting:

"The hon. Member for Buckingham raised an interesting point that is worthy of consideration".

He then said:

"I shall consider the matter, and I shall ensure that a copy of Hansard containing this morning's debate goes to the Low Pay Commission. Okay?"—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 27 January 1998; c. 496.]

I readily accepted that response as being sincere and as offering some hope that, in one form or another, the spirit of my observations might be taken on board by the Government.

I have not given up hope that the spirit of my observations will be taken on board by the Government. I am not here to cavil but to inquire, to make the arguments and to listen with interest and respect to the Minister's response. The spirit, and possibly the detail, of amendment No. 41 should be able to unite hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber. I invite hon. Members who will disagree violently with me and with my right hon. and hon. Friends on other aspects of the Bill, to consider the issue on its merits, and to ask themselves whether the argument for the payment of interest on an unpaid wage is valid in principle, and therefore whether they might consider giving effect to it in practice.

The arguments are compelling. The first argument is that the employee is entitled to a wage. If an employer does not pay that wage, either accidentally or deliberately, that employer is depriving an employee of an entitlement—an entitlement which the Labour party is determined to embody in law. So wilfully to ignore the fact of non-payment and not to do anything about it would be out of kilter with the Government's thinking and principles on the subject. That is the first argument—a moral one.

The second argument is lesser, but nevertheless, I hope, a valid consideration. It is a practical point and it is that an employee who is not paid the national minimum wage to which he or she is entitled might as a consequence of that period of non-payment suffer real financial hardship or disadvantage. For the period for which he or she is not paid the national minimum wage, the employee might suffer serious cash flow problems. It is unlikely that any cash flow problems that the employer is suffering are in any way comparable to that disadvantage. So, a practical disadvantage is being suffered, quite apart from the moral argument in support of the employee being paid fully at the outset rather than later.

The third argument in support of the principle of the amendment is that the Government accept—and are right to do so—the principle that an employer who does not adhere to his obligations under the terms of the Bill when it is enacted could be subject to penalty. I shall be subject to your strictures, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I stray to any degree from the terms of the amendment and I do not do so. I am referring to clause 19, to illustrate the validity of my argument in support of amendment No. 41.

As the Minister of State will know—I imagine that he knows the Bill backwards by now and has eaten it over the breakfast table on several occasions—clause 19 provides for the service of a penalty notice in circumstances in which an enforcement notice has been ignored or in which an employer has failed to comply with such a notice. If I remember rightly, under clause 19(3) provision is made for that penalty to be charged at twice the hourly rate of the national minimum wage for each day that the employer does not comply with the requirements of the legislation.

I think that the Minister will recollect that I did not complain about that provision. If anything, I made favourable reference to it. It did not seem unreasonable. If there is to be an enforcement procedure and a penalty notice, the penalty has to sting and to stick, otherwise it has no purpose or deterrent effect. If the Government accept the principle of service of penalty and of the entitlement to extract the penalty from a non-compliant employer, why do they not accept—I hope that they will—that that principle should apply in this context too?

My anxiety is this. In the context of clause 19, the penalty extracted from the non-compliant, rogue employer is a penalty that will go to the Secretary of State—it will swell the coffers of the Treasury. That may be appropriate, but surely when an employee suffers disadvantage because an employer does not honour his legal right to the national minimum wage, it is appropriate that the employee should have the right to claim compensation or interest on the unpaid sum.

I have made the modest suggestion that the additional payment that the employee should receive in those circumstances should be a rate of interest on the unpaid sum two percentage points above the then prevailing Bank of England base rate. If memory serves me correctly, that would currently be a percentage rate of 9.25 per cent. For the practical elucidation of the argument for right hon. and hon. Members, what that means can be simply stated. If the employee is owed unpaid wages of £100 when that non-payment is discovered and the employer is required by this legislation to honour the debt, given the inconvenience and suffering that the employee has suffered in the interim, instead of being £100 it will be £109.25. That seems perfectly reasonable.

Moreover, I would go so far as to argue that there should, in this context, be no distinction between a deliberate and an accidental non-payment. Not all my hon. Friends will agree, but I argue that because, whether or not the failing is deliberate or accidental does not affect the disadvantage that the employee has suffered, and, regardless of whose fault it is, it is almost certainly not the employee's fault.

If the employee has suffered the detriment of non-payment and has not enjoyed his or her entitlement under the Bill, he or she should receive not only the payment that was due, but compensation. That is fair and financially helpful to the employee. I suggest that it would act as a deterrent to that tiny minority of employers—I stress that it is a tiny minority—who fail, either wilfully or through neglect, to honour their obligations.

My suggestion is reasonable. When an employee is deprived of his wages, that is analogous to a commercial debt. If Labour Members believe, as I know that many do, in a statutory right of interest on commercial debts—I venture no particular view on the merits of that argument—it should follow that they favour the payment of interest or compensation on the debt that I have described. If not, they will be arguing that a debt that is owed by one company to another merits the payment of interest, whereas the debt that is owed by an employer to an employee does not. I am sure that Labour Members will recognise that that issue is worthy of consideration.

I rest the case. I am not fanatical about whether the particular terms of the amendment are followed, but I passionately believe that, if the right exists in law, it should be honoured and be seen to be honoured. I suggest that the Bill would be fairer, more just and better received if the Minister sympathetically considered the amendment that my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry and I tabled.

Mr. Ian McCartney: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the Dispatch Box. I well remember the first time that I spoke at the Dispatch Box and I know that it can be nerve-racking, although, to be fair, he did not show any nerves in making his proposition. I hope that he will represent his party at the Dispatch Box on many future occasions—it seems to have improved his temper, although my temper seems to have become worse since I started to speak from the Front Bench.

The amendments concern workers' rights to recover an underpayment, but they have little else in common. Amendment No. 41 is well intentioned, and I welcome it in that spirit. It would give the worker the right not only to any additional remuneration over the relevant period—which is defined as the difference between what was paid and the national minimum wage—but to the interest on that amount. That seems to be a reasonable proposition—as the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) pointed out, when the general concept was put to me in Committee, I agreed that it was worthy of further consideration.

The idea has a number of problems, however. The worker's entitlement to recover an underpayment is not a new feature of employment law. The Bill uses existing remedies. First, the worker can make a claim in an industrial tribunal under the existing provisions on unauthorised deductions from wages in the Employment Rights Act 1996.

Secondly, when an employee's employment ends, he can claim for past underpayments of the national minimum wage in an industrial tribunal under the provisions of the Industrial Tribunals Act 1996, which enable tribunals to hear ordinary breach of contract claims. Thirdly, he can bring a claim for breach of contract in the ordinary civil courts.

The recovery of underpayments of the national minimum wage simply follows those accepted precedents. If a worker makes a claim to an industrial tribunal, he is entitled to the outstanding sum owed, but not to any interest, but if he makes a claim in the ordinary civil courts, he will be entitled to interest.

That is undeniably an inconsistency, but it is not easy to resolve. In general, no interest going back to the date of the wrong done is claimable in an industrial tribunal, even when the award represents a debt owed to the worker; but to entitle workers to interest only in respect of national minimum wage claims would produce a different set of inconsistencies. Workers recovering other underpayments in breach of contract in industrial tribunals would not be entitled to interest, and those recovering an underpayment, partly in breach of the national minimum wage provisions and partly not, would be able to obtain interest only on the proportion that was in breach of the provisions.

I am sympathetic to the amendment, but it raises complicated problems. With great reluctance, I have concluded that it is not feasible at this stage to entitle workers who claim in industrial tribunals to interest on national minimum wage claims alone. I therefore ask the House to reject the amendment if it is not withdrawn.

For most workers on very low wages, the vital thing is to get the cash that they are owed as soon as possible. Interest is likely to be very much a secondary consideration. Industrial tribunals may not offer interest, but they offer an approachable and speedy procedure. The idea behind the amendment is reasonable, but I am convinced that getting the money to the worker as soon as possible is the most important consideration.

Amendment No. 68 is a different kettle of fish. It would restrict the period over which a worker is entitled to claim back any underpayment. Under the Bill, if a worker suspects that he is being paid less than his minimum wage entitlement, he can start civil proceedings to reclaim his money through an industrial tribunal or a civil court, or an officer may serve a notice on his behalf.

In an industrial tribunal's proceedings on unauthorised deductions from wages, there are no limits on how far back claims may reach, provided that the claim itself is timely—that is, it is made within three months of the last of a series of underpayments. In county court proceedings for breach of contract, the claim can go back a maximum of six years before the proceedings were brought.

Amendment No. 68 would change all that. A worker who had been paid below the minimum wage would be able to claim money back only for the year before the proceedings were started. Any underpayment from before that would not be recoverable. That would apply regardless of whether the proceedings were brought in a tribunal or in the ordinary courts.

Amendment No. 41 is fair-minded, but there can be little to recommend amendment No. 68, which is simply unjust. Why should an employer who gets away with underpayment for years and years have to pay back only what he owes the worker for the last year? Is that a reward for the employer who can keep things quiet for as long as possible before finally being brought to justice?

For different reasons, I urge the House to reject both the amendments.

Mr. Bercow: I am extremely grateful to the Minister for his kind remarks, which are warmly appreciated. I am also grateful for the spirit in which he responded to my specific remarks in support of amendment No. 41. I acknowledge the practical difficulties, but I still believe that there is a powerful argument in principle for the incorporation of the amendment or something similar. If that is not possible on this occasion, I hope that we may revisit the subject in the future.

I am conscious of the hour and of the other important business that remains to be transacted, so I shall not detain the House. I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 17

POWER OF OFFICER TO ISSUE ENFORCEMENT NOTICE

Amendments made: No. 14, in page 12, line 12, at end insert

'(and, where it does so, may be so framed as to relate to workers specified in the notice or to workers of a description so specified)'.

No. 15, in page 12, line 17, leave out subsection (6) and insert—

'(6) On an appeal under subsection (4) above, the employment tribunal shall dismiss the appeal unless it is established—

(a) that, in the case of the worker or workers to whom the enforcement notice relates, the facts are such that an officer who was aware of them would have had no reason to serve any enforcement notice on the appellant; or

(b) where the enforcement notice relates to two or more workers, that the facts are such that an officer who was aware of them would have had no reason to include some of the workers in any enforcement notice served on the appellant; or

(c) where the enforcement notice imposes a requirement under subsection (2) above in relation to a worker,—

(i) that no sum was due to the worker under section 15 above; or

(ii) that the amount specified in the notice as the sum due to the worker under that section is incorrect; and in this subsection any reference to a worker includes a reference to a person whom the enforcement notice purports to treat as a worker.'.

No. 16, in page 12, line 27, after '(b)' insert 'or (c)'.—[Mr. Ian McCartney.]

Clause 19

FINANCIAL PENALTY FOR NON-COMPLIANCE

Amendment made: No. 17, in page 13, line 18, after 'wage' insert

'(as in force at the date of the penalty notice)'.—[Mr. Ian McCartney.]

Clause 20

APPEALS AGAINST PENALTY NOTICES

Amendments made: No. 18, in page 14, line 7, leave out subsection (3) and insert—

'(3) On an appeal under subsection (1) above, the employment tribunal shall dismiss the appeal unless it is shown—

(a) that, in the case of each of the allegations of failure to comply with the enforcement notice, the facts are such that an officer who was aware of them would have had no reason to serve any penalty notice on the appellant; or

(b) that the penalty notice is incorrect in some of the particulars which affect the amount of the financial penalty; or

(c) that the calculation of the amount of the financial penalty is incorrect; and for the purposes of any appeal relating to a penalty notice, the enforcement notice in question shall (subject to rescission or rectification on any appeal brought under section 17 above) be taken to be correct.'.

No. 19, in page 14, line 15, after '(b)' insert 'or (c)'.—[Mr. Ian McCartney.]

Clause 21

THE RIGHT NOT TO SUFFER DETRIMENT

Mr. Ian McCartney: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 14, line 37, at end insert

'or

(c) the worker qualifies, or will qualify, for the national minimum wage or for a particular rate of national minimum wage.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 6 to 8, 24, 25, 9, 10, 26, 11, 35 and 12.

5.30 am

Mr. McCartney: The substantial amendments in this group are Government amendments Nos. 6 to 12 and 35, which ensure that it will not be possible for an employer to dismiss an employee who is not yet eligible for the national minimum wage but is soon to become so because of their age. That is the general purpose, but before I go any further I must make one point clear from the outset—no decision has yet been taken on whether there will be any exemptions or different rates using the powers in clauses 3 and 4.

The Low Pay Commission has been asked to consider the matter. It will be report in May on whether, and if so how, the powers in the Bill should be used. I say that now to spare Conservative Members' leaping to their feet to claim that the amendments presuppose any decisions on that. They do not. They are just in case, and I shall explain why they are so important. If—and I stress if—different rates are set for some young workers, below the rate of the full national minimum wage, some unscrupulous employers might consider sacking the young workers the day before they reach their entitlement to the full rate, or to a higher rate. I do not wish to imply that that would happen frequently—I am fully aware that the vast majority of employers are responsible and behave ethically—but we know from bitter experience that some employers will resort to such tactics, and the amendments would stop them.

The amendments have two further, related, effects. They cover a situation in which a worker might suffer because he has already reached an entitlement to the national minimum wage, or an entitlement to a higher rate, as well as when he is about to do so. They also provide protection for a worker if there is a general uprating or change to the rates which could lead to an employer taking action against a worker.

The amendments are all related and work in the following way. Government amendments Nos. 5 and 6 relate to clause 21. They extend the protection of all workers from detrimental action to include those who are not at present eligible for the national minimum wage, but who will become eligible in the future. Without the amendments, there would be nothing to stop an employer taking action against a worker, such as terminating the contract of a worker who is not an employee on the ground that the worker is soon to be eligible for a higher minimum rate.

Government amendments Nos. 7 and 8 make the equivalent changes to clause 23, and Government amendments Nos. 9 and 10 make the equivalent changes to clause 24 for Northern Ireland. Those clauses protect employees from unfair dismissal. Hon. Members will appreciate that workers who are not employees do not have the relevant contractual arrangement and cannot therefore be dismissed—they will use the protection from detriment in clause 21. The amendments extend the scope of the clauses, making a dismissal unfair if the reason for it is that the employee would become entitled to the full national minimum wage or to a higher rate.

Government amendments Nos. 11 and 12 apply the protection to agricultural workers under the agricultural wages regime. They amend the Agricultural Wages Act 1948, the Agricultural Wages (Scotland) Act 1949, and the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1977. The amendments extend the meaning, in the Employment Rights Act 1996, of any reference to a person qualifying for the national minimum wage so that it includes reference to a person who has become, or will become, entitled to a minimum rate under the agricultural legislation mentioned. That is done by adding to the enforcement provisions in that legislation.

I ask the House to support the amendments, which add an extra element of protection and improve the Bill as a result.

Mr. Ian Bruce: When the national minimum wage is introduced, some workers will be paid less than the rate at which it is set. Will an employer be liable to prosecution if he claims that he can afford to pay fewer workers and, before the introduction of the national minimum wage, downsizes his company?

Mr. McCartney: I have made the response to that point clear. It would be unfair dismissal to sack someone for claiming the right to the national minimum wage. A worker should also not suffer dismissal or other detriment for claiming that another worker is entitled to the national minimum wage. It would be unfair and a detriment for an employer to take action against his employees on the ground that they were seeking a right under the Bill. That has always been the position. We are moving the amendments to ensure that another detriment does not happen if the Low Pay Commission recommends and the Government accept different rates for younger workers. We want to ensure that when people reach entitlement to the minimum wage they are not sacked solely for claiming it.

As with all rights relating to unfair dismissal and to detriment, the courts will determine whether the worker has a case in the light of evidence presented to it from both sides. If a worker is dismissed for good reason, the employer has nothing to fear. To challenge the principle of protecting workers from dismissal on these grounds is to challenge the principle of the national minimum wage. We are back to the age-old and long-discredited argument that a minimum wage leads to huge lay-offs. That was the point made by the hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce); Conservative Members have constantly claimed that a minimum wage will cost jobs.

We argue, and all the evidence suggests, that a minimum wage set at a sensible level taking account of economic circumstances will not lead to that scenario. We believe in a national minimum wage. Set at a sensible level, it will not cause difficult problems.

Mr. Hammond: What is a sensible level?

Mr. McCartney: The hon. Gentleman asks what is a sensible level. Is not the objective that we set the Low Pay Commission to make recommendations on such matters?

Mr. Hammond: Is a sensible level, as suggested by the financial memorandum to the Bill, one that will not affect at all the level of employment in the economy? If so, why did the Secretary of State not specifically give the Low Pay Commission the task of setting a level that would not affect employment at all?

Mr. McCartney: The commission was given a wide reference, including taking account of economic circumstances. It is made up of individuals with close investment in all sections of the labour market and with skills and knowledge of it. It has taken considerable evidence across the United Kingdom to come to its conclusions. Having been given that wide remit, it will produce recommendations on the rate and related matters. The hon. Gentleman will have to wait a few more weeks for them to be placed before the Government and the nation.

There can be no justification for dismissing workers only because they have become entitled to the minimum wage. That would be extremely short-sighted and wrong. The worker must be protected from such action.

Amendments Nos. 24 to 26 are tidying-up amendments. They do not change the Bill's intended meaning or effect. Amendment No. 24 relates to subsection (3) in the new section 104A that clause 23(1) inserts into the Employment Rights Act 1996, making the dismissal of an employee for asserting rights under the National Minimum Wage Bill automatically unfair in Great Britain.

The amended text makes it clear that the right to which section 104A applies is "any right conferred by or by virtue of any provision of the National Minimum Wage Act 1998."

The addition of the formulation "by virtue of" reflects the Bill's extension to agricultural workers in Great Britain of automatic protection against unfair dismissal for asserting rights that those workers do not have directly under the Bill but which are given to them by virtue of the Bill.

Amendment No. 26 makes the same tidying-up change in relation to automatic protection against unfair dismissal for asserting rights conferred on agricultural workers in Northern Ireland by virtue of the Bill.

Amendment No. 25 is consequential on the Employment Rights (Dispute Resolution) Bill. As those who attended the many hours in Standing Committee D know, a great many Government amendments were tabled to bring the National Minimum Wage Bill into line with changes being made to the industrial tribunal system, soon to be known as the employment tribunal system, through that Bill. It is a Lords private Member's Bill with cross-party support. The amendments have not therefore been contentious.

Unfortunately, a further change is needed as a consequence of the Employment Rights (Dispute Resolution) Bill but we did not spot it in time to table it in Committee, for which I apologise. It relates to clause 23, which deals with protection from unfair dismissal. Subsection (5) inserted a new subsection into the Employment Rights Act 1996 ensuring that the right not to be dismissed for enforcing a right under the National Minimum Wage Bill will be one of those rights that applies regardless of whether a statutory dismissal procedures agreement applies to the employee. However, clause 12 of the Employment Rights (Dispute Resolution) Bill will make clause 23(5) of this Bill unnecessary because it amends the relevant section of the 1996 Act so that there will no longer be statutory exclusions for the dismissal procedures agreement and therefore no need to specify that national minimum wage rights are outside those exclusions. The situation will depend on whether the dismissal procedures agreement itself excludes dismissals of a particular description.

I hope that I have been able to set out in some detail, albeit without spending too much time on them, the reasons for the amendments. I also hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will recognise the need to ensure that, where unscrupulous action is taken, the Bill protects employees claiming the right to the national minimum wage.

Mr. Boswell: First, I thank the Minister for his lucid and concise explanation of this large and complex group of amendments. I shall not trade numbers with him, because it is important that the Bill be got right; nor would I wish to signal from these Benches any departure from the principle of good employment that he has set out. I can understand where he is getting to—indeed, I am slightly surprised that he did not get there before—in requiring through the substantive amendments that employers should not sack people in contemplation of their qualifying for the national minimum wage.

The difficulty is that the Bill must operate in the real world, where not all employers are as scrupulous as the Minister and I would like and where many, whether scrupulous or not, will be facing undoubted economic pressure. I make no predictions about whether there will be a separate rate for young persons, but it should be noted that employers may be tempted to find ways to cut the costs of their labour force and may not wish to employ workers at the full rate—at whatever age that happens to cut in. If employers are in difficulties, their recourse may well be not to employ such persons at all if there is any realistic risk of their eventually qualifying for the full rate. That is but another subset of the concerns that we have expressed extensively about the danger that, whatever rate is set, we may see a higher level of unemployment than might otherwise have happened. However, as the Minister has rightly said, that is a function of the rate that is likely to be chosen.

I have one specific issue on which I should like to probe the Minister. It concerns employees below a qualifying age who may eventually reach a qualifying age for the national minimum wage—I do not anticipate whether there is to be a youth rate—and whose contracts of employment are for a fixed term. As I understand employment law on unfair dismissal, if an employee is employed for a fixed term and that employment is not renewed at the end of the fixed term, that would not normally give rise to a claim for unfair dismissal unless there had been a specific agreement between employer and employee during the contract or, more typically, at the beginning of the contract, that that particular term should be disapplied. Will the Minister confirm, either now or later, whether fixed-term contracts that are keyed to an expiry date just before the qualifying date for the national minimum wage and accompanied by an agreement between employer and employee not to apply the unfair dismissal procedures would be allowed? That is a small point, but an important one in terms of the tidiness of the Bill.

Mr. McCartney: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the way in which he has responded. The issue he raises is technical, albeit one worth making. A range of issues surround what constitutes a contract, short term or otherwise. The arrangement in the Bill is an attempt to ensure that, where there is consistency of employment, that consistency is not disturbed solely on the ground of an employee reaching an entitlement to a national minimum wage. However, in the same spirit as the hon. Gentleman raises the matter, I undertake to write to him with a detailed legal explanation of the point he raises.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 26

REVERSAL OF BURDEN OF PROOF

5.45 am

Mr. Lansley: I beg to move amendment No. 45, in page 19, line 1, leave out 'any question arises' and insert

'an officer acting for the purposes of this Act makes a declaration, acting on the basis of his enquiries'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 46, in page 19, line 17, after 'amount', insert

'to the extent that this is asserted in a declaration made by an officer acting for the purposes of this Act'.

No. 47, in page 19, line 23, leave out

'unless the contrary is established' and insert

'if and to the extent that a declaration is made to this effect by an officer acting for the purposes of this Act'.

Mr. Lansley: I suspect that I have been invited to move the amendment in order to see what impact it has on my temper. In Committee, some of the Government's proposals on the reversal of the burden of proof tested Conservative Members' tempers considerably. We are not attempting to re-run that debate. The clause relates to civil and not criminal proceedings. There is, none the less, a well-established principle of the burden of proof falling on the plaintiff and of relative even-handedness in civil proceedings. To move away from that is undesirable.

The clause deals not only with proceedings brought under this legislation but with any civil proceedings in which it is asserted that the national minimum wage has not been paid or that someone qualifies for the national minimum wage.

Why have the Government gone down that path? They were quite clear in the notes on clauses, which said

"that those remunerated at a rate below the national minimum wage can more easily succeed in claims."

There we have it. The Government have abandoned the principle of even-handedness in civil proceedings for efficiency reasons rather than for reasons of justice. The purpose of the amendments is to marry efficiency with justice.

The three amendments correspond to the three limbs of clause 26. Subsection (1) concerns the question whether a person qualifies for the national minimum wage; subsection (2) deals with deductions from wages; and subsection (3) deals with claims for additional remuneration, being the difference between the amount required to be paid in line with the national minimum wage and the amount that it is asserted was actually paid.

The structure of each subsection is the same. A presumption is made that the person qualifies, or that a deduction was made at below the minimum wage rate, or that a person was inadequately remunerated. That presumption stands unless the contrary position is established.

In Committee, the Minister was at pains to say that most employers will keep records, and will therefore have no difficulty in establishing whether the national minimum wage has been paid. I accept that. Similarly, in the great majority of cases, the question whether a person qualifies for the minimum wage, which is a legal issue, will be subject to arguments, and a prior presumption will not necessarily be the most significant factor.

However, in each case there will be difficult exceptions, and it is exceptions that make hard cases. Records may be lost, the nature of a contract may be disputed by the parties, and the value of benefits provided to an employee or a worker may be disputed. In those cases, why should there be a presumption in favour of the plaintiff rather than the defendant? In Committee, the Opposition tabled amendments designed to remove the reversal of the burden of proof and to restore neutrality. We may have won the argument, but we lost the vote.

The Minister was adamant that the information at issue in such disputes is in the hands of the employer, and that the employer must meet the tests. The Minister's intention was to level the playing field between employer and employee. He asserts that the worker requires the benefit of the presumption to achieve that. The amendments take account of that debate, and they demonstrate that we can achieve the objective more justly and equitably.

The worker is not on his own, impotent against a rogue employer, because he has the benefit of the enforcement mechanism that was set out in earlier clauses. The officer who is appointed by the Secretary of State can acquire by law all the employer's records. The amendments are designed to confine the exercise of the controversial presumption to being pursuant to the decision of that officer. That has the benefit of removing the difficulty of vexatious litigation by discontented employees who seek to exploit accidental or inadvertent lack of records or who use the scope of dispute over eligibility or levels of remuneration for their own purposes. The amendments would also serve to prevent the presumption of guilt by an employer from being transported into civil proceedings outside the purposes of the legislation, and would have the further benefit of enabling the officer in question to assist the court in arriving at a presumption about the extent of the additional remuneration that was payable. That is not otherwise defined in clause 26.

In its further views on the Bill on Report, the CBI expresses its reservations in principle about the reversal of the burden of proof. It echoes my point about the relative simplicity of arriving at some decisions. However, the CBI argues that, where arguments are less clear, its members are resolutely opposed to the reversal of the burden of proof.

Although the amendments do not restore the neutrality that the principles of natural justice might otherwise demand, they substantially circumscribe the circumstances in which the burden of proof is reversed. Reversal would apply only where a duly appointed officer had conducted inquiries, and it would be subject to challenge on the basis of the reasonableness of such a conclusion. The Minister made it clear that the officer acting on behalf of the Secretary of State would be subject to such a test of reasonableness, and there is benefit in that. The scope of the presumption against an employer would be limited and properly accountable. One hopes that the presumption against the employer would not be used arbitrarily.

The amendments have been tabled in good faith in an attempt to respond to the debate in Committee. We respect the principle of even-handedness in civil proceedings and the amendments give to the employee every opportunity, through the use of an officer appointed by the Secretary of State, to have the presumption that the Minister seeks used in their favour but in accountable circumstances. I hope that my hon. Friends will support the amendments and that the Minister will accept them.

Mr. Ian McCartney: It is a pleasure to welcome the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) to the Opposition Front Bench. He said he thought it had to do with his temper, but I beg to differ. Those of us who took part in the record Committee sitting remember that the hon. Gentleman went missing for some hours. A week later we found out from his local press that he had gone for an early bath. Perhaps the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) has kept him here tonight by putting him on the Front Bench. I had a bet with a close colleague that the hon. Gentleman would be on the Opposition Front Bench by the end of this Session. I shall share the winnings with him, although I cannot yet say whether the sum is equivalent to the national minimum wage. I wish the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) well in future debates.

I again remind the House how clause 26 works. It reverses the burden of proof in three important situations. It is important to state the principle involved. The Government fought long and hard on this issue, as the overwhelming majority of people who will benefit from the minimum wage are in a weak position in terms of the employer-employee relationship. The overwhelming majority of them do not have information at their disposal as to whether a payment was received or whether it was appropriate. It was therefore crucial that we introduced proposals to ensure that employees in those circumstances were able with certainty to claim the minimum wage when it does apply.

First, clause 26 says that, if there is a question over whether an individual qualifies for the national minimum wage—whether he is a worker, as defined by the Bill—the presumption is that he does qualify. It will be for the alleged employer to prove that he does not. Again, that is particularly important because, for years, attempts have been made, through, for example, bogus self-employment, to prevent vulnerable employees from claiming their personal rights in the workplace.

Secondly, the clause says that, when a worker complains to an industrial tribunal for the recovery of a clause 15 underpayment, the tribunal will assume that the worker was indeed paid below the minimum wage, unless the employer can prove otherwise. It will be for the employer to prove that he did pay his worker the national minimum wage.

Again, that is important because all the information that is necessary to determine whether the employer did in fact pay appropriate wages lies with the employer. He maintains records. He has responsibility for records, national insurance contributions, the pay-as-you-earn scheme and all the other information that is needed to determine whether an appropriate wage has been paid. Good record keeping and maintenance are an absolute defence against any unfair allegation that a minimum wage was not paid when it was. That is not an onerous task.

Thirdly, clause 26 says that, if a worker goes to a civil court to claim back a clause 15 underpayment in a contract claim, it will again be for the employer to prove that he paid his worker the national minimum wage. It will be presumed that the worker was paid below the minimum unless it can be proved otherwise. Again, that is in place for the reasons that I gave earlier. Clause 26 does not reverse the burden of proof as to the amount of the underpayment. It will still be for the worker to establish that.

The three amendments relate to each of the circumstances where clause 26 reverses the usual burden of proof. In each case, they would mean that the burden of proof is reversed only if an enforcement officer is involved and makes a declaration relating to the worker's case. That would obviously undermine the whole purpose of clause 26. We have already made it clear that the reversal of the burden of proof is fundamental. It applies regardless of whether an enforcement officer is involved. It is there to protect the worker and we view it as one of the foundation stones for effective enforcement.

The clause relieves the individual from having to prove that he is entitled to the national minimum wage and that he has received less than that wage. If the employer wishes to assert that a person is not a worker, or that he is being paid the national minimum wage, it will be for the employer to prove it. The provision is deliberately designed to give the worker the benefit of any doubt as to the right of entitlement. It should remove grey areas behind which unscrupulous employers might otherwise hide, and make it more difficult for them to find loopholes through which to climb.

[Mr. Ian McCartney]

This is a deliberately strong measure and we will not allow it to be diluted. I urge the House to reject the amendments, if the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire forces them to a vote.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to the Minister for his kind remarks and I am pleased if, in some small way, I have contributed to his net remuneration for performance on the Bill; the hours that he has put in on it must be reducing his hourly rate by the day. He may need the proceeds of his bet to take the rate up to the national minimum wage rate.

That said, I am disappointed by the way in which the Minister has responded to the debate. We have sought in the amendments to go a considerable way towards accepting the Government's argument in Committee, but to leave a modicum of protection for employers against arbitrary use of the power on behalf of an employee. I did not find in the Minister's speech any convincing explanation of why the officer acting on behalf of the Secretary of State cannot provide all the protection that is required for employees against the sort of employer the Minister has described.

It is the Opposition's desire to examine in detail the amendments tabled on Report, so I will not delay our proceedings by pressing this amendment to a vote. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 29

OFFENCES

Amendment made: No. 27, in page 20, line 18, at end insert—

'(5A) Where the commission by any person of an offence under subsection (1) or (2) above is due to the act or default of some other person, that other person is also guilty of the offence.

(5B) A person may be charged with and convicted of an offence by virtue of subsection (5A) above whether or not proceedings are taken against any other person.

ARMED FORCES

6 am

Mr. Boswell: I beg to move amendment No. 66, in page 22, line 39, at end insert—

'(3) The Secretary of State shall take all reasonable steps to ensure parity of treatment between those persons serving as members of the naval, military and air forces of the Crown and their civilian equivalents, and shall lay before both Houses of Parliament a report explaining the reasons for any disparity of treatment with such civilians.'.

The Opposition have long argued that the armed forces should be exempt from the provisions in the Bill because it is extremely important to safeguard their operational efficiency and morale. We were pleased when the Government did an about turn from their original intention and fell in behind us by agreeing to exempt the armed forces from any national minimum wage.

I am bound to say that the Government, in circumstances of some embarrassment to them—which I will not dilate on now—did not give a clear explanation for their decision. We drew our own conclusion, which was that the Minister had been outgunned by other members of the Government—but we do not want to rub that in. He said that the Armed Forces Pay Review Body might provide a satisfactory proxy to take account of the interests of armed forces personnel in respect of the national minimum wage, and it is certainly the best sort of proxy that the Government are likely to achieve. It is in that spirit that we tabled this amendment.

The amendment states:

"The Secretary of State shall take all reasonable steps to ensure parity of treatment between those persons serving as members of the . . . forces of the Crown and their civilian equivalents".

Hon. Members who served in Committee will remember that when we discussed this matter, I made two related but slightly separate points. One related to the normal peacetime position, when clearly it should be possible, through the pay review mechanism, to achieve a degree of parity; and the second to the special conditions of wartime, when that parity might not be applicable. Civilians could be serving alongside service personnel, with one group being able to qualify for the national minimum wage—however many hours it was defined that they were working operationally—but the other, the service personnel, not qualifying for that.

The underlying motive for the Government's difficulties relates, for example, to the hours of a working private who is paid about £28 a day, but that is stretched over a 20-hour day on exercises. That results in a very low hourly rate. Of course, that is not what he is always paid, but it shows the sort of problem that would arise if the Bill applied to the armed forces.

We accept that the Armed Forces Pay Review Body is probably the best proxy now that the Government are exempting the armed forces from the Bill. We want to enforce that through the amendment, which states:

"The Secretary of State shall take all reasonable steps to ensure parity".

Our reason for using that formulation—or even raising the matter at all—is, as much as anything else, as the Minister knows, that it is a propensity of Governments—as this Government have done and, as I admit, the previous Government did when there was not a national minimum wage—to phase in awards from the various pay review bodies, and particularly, in this case, from the Armed Forces Pay Review Body.

I want to use the line of argument followed by my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) about delayed payment of entitlements under the national minimum wage. If an award is phased, the sum is not paid in full and, in any case, there is a loss that is not recovered. Therefore, if the Government decide, as they have this year, to defer until later in the year part of the increase—in round terms, roughly one half; the increase varies between ranks—for service personnel of whatever rank, parity will be lost because of the Government's interference in the process, regardless of whether it had been achieved by the pay review body.

I acknowledge—as I acknowledge the interests of the previous Government in the matter—that there may well be interests of Government that require suspension of exact parity. Those circumstances bring me to the second part of our amendment, which would provide that, in cases in which parity was not adequately or fully secured, the Secretary of State

"shall lay before both Houses of Parliament a report explaining the reasons for any disparity of treatment with such civilians."

That seems to be an entirely reasonable provision. We are not saying that the Secretary of State cannot suspend parity, but that, if Ministers choose to do so, they must come to the House to justify their choice. They should be able to do so, and—if it is appropriate—to convince the House that it should be so.

We are, therefore, interested in fairness for service personnel—as I am sure that the Minister is. We want to establish a mechanism that is as fair as can possibly be achieved. We want also to provide some operational flexibility for the Secretary of State in implementing the parity commitment. We have framed and moved amendment No. 66 in that spirit.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): Clause 35 seems to blow a hole in the Government's case, as Ministers have acknowledged in it that they are not prepared to give parity to their own employees. Crown employees are to be given the benefit—I use the word carefully—of the measure, whereas those who serve in the forces are to be denied that "benefit". It is rather extraordinary that the Government are not prepared to accept amendment No. 66.

I am not quite sure of the latest pay figures for the armed forces, but the most recent ones that I have been able to secure show that an army private, on class 4, will be paid about £25 a day. Even if we assume that privates have an eight-hour day, their hourly pay would fall below the minimum wage—which is why the Minister has been prevailed on by his colleagues in the Ministry of Defence to accede to their requirement that the Bill should not apply to the armed forces. However, anyone who thinks that a squaddy does an eight-hour day needs his head examined, because our forces work many more hours than that. I suspect that, throughout the pay scale of junior service personnel, quite a few people would be caught by the measure. I therefore ask the Minister—who is not an unreasonable chap, although he sometimes rants a bit—to explain how senior officers will explain to soldiers why they will be paid less than those who may be doing a possibly analogous job, but who are civil servants or civilian Crown employees and not part of the armed forces.

The clause also exemplifies the differences in how the different services are organised. The Royal Navy has watches. The Royal Air Force tends to work a shift system, but the Army does not. That, again, illustrates the differences in treatment of those in the different services.

The amendment strikes me as extremely reasonable. It requires Ministers to "lay before both Houses of Parliament a report explaining the reasons for any disparity of treatment" between service men and their civilian counterparts. I hope that the Minister has a good explanation. If he has not, I shall feel inclined to divide the House. It should be borne in mind that I represent Aldershot, the home of the British Army.

Mr. Ian McCartney: I do not think that any hon. Member of any political persuasion does not represent members of, or families of members of, the armed forces, and those of us with constituencies in industrial and metropolitan areas represent an over-preponderance of families who send their young men and women to serve the country in the armed forces.

The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) did not help the debate by attempting some guerrilla tactics to find out whether I—or the Government—was committed to the personnel of the armed forces. No one in the House has a monopoly on matters relating to the armed forces. There is a long tradition in the House—perhaps throughout the century. In the case of issues relating to national sovereignty, disputes abroad and, indeed, Northern Ireland, there has been a common approach to the needs of our armed forces personnel, and to the way in which we as a nation should deal with them.

I do not intend to take the line that the hon. Member for Aldershot would like me to take. I do not want to engage in schoolboy banter about whether the present Government are less committed to the armed forces. We are patently not, nor would we be. In Committee, it was clear from what I said on behalf of the Government that our proposals—the proposals that we advanced to create the new clause—were based on the unique circumstances of the armed forces, and that we were clear and specific in our own mind that the mechanisms for the Armed Forces Pay Review Body would meet requirements to ensure that the armed forces were dealt with fairly in terms of their pay and conditions.

I stress that the decision to deal with the armed forces in that way was taken only because the pay review body provided a suitable mechanism to ensure that service men and women were not disadvantaged by the exemption. If we had not felt that the arrangements would meet the requirement adequately, we would have dealt with it in a different way. The review body offers a well-established and credible system which has had not only the confidence of successive Governments but, more importantly, that of the armed forces themselves. In formulating its recommendations to the Government, the review body looks carefully at a range of matters, including comparability with similarly weighted civilian jobs in the private sector.

Mr. Letwin: I am genuinely interested in the Minister's answer to my question. If he really considers the pay review body to be a sufficient safeguard, why does the Agricultural Wages Board—which has been mentioned on earlier amendments—not do the same task for agricultural workers?

Mr. McCartney: The Agricultural Wages Board is an entirely different issue. We have co-ordinated the role of the board with the legislation. We said that in Committee, and, at some point in this evening's—or this morning's—debate, my hon. Friend the Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry made it clear that the board would come up for review in 1999. Between now and 1999, it is not only reasonable, but sensible that the national minimum wage should interface with the agricultural wages system.

We have ensured, first, that as the Agricultural Wages Board payment is higher than the national minimum wage, if appropriate, agricultural workers will be paid the Agricultural Wages Board rate and secondly, that agricultural workers receiving less than the minimum wage will be brought up to the level of the minimum wage so that there will be no discrepancy affecting agricultural workers. They will be paid either the Agricultural Wages Board rate or at least the national minimum wage. Therefore, the point raised by the hon. Gentleman is spurious.

The Government have made it clear that any movement in civilian pay levels as a result of the introduction of the national minimum wage will be reflected in the Armed Forces Pay Review Body recommendations and feed through to service pay.

6.15 am

The review body is aware of the need to give special consideration to the circumstances of particular groups. Its 1998 review recommended higher increases for the lowest-paid service personnel. It is also open to the Government, in their economic and other evidence, to draw to the review body's attention particular factors, such as the need to take into account the relationship between the national minimum wage and service pay.

There is already a parliamentary reporting system. The review body's observations and recommendations are already published in a report, and copies are placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

The Government have every confidence in the ability of the Armed Forces Pay Review Body to take full account of the need to ensure that service pay does not fall below the national minimum wage when making its recommendations. If Opposition Members do not share that confidence, they should say so or withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: If the Minister is confident that the Armed Forces Pay Review Body will ensure that no service man receives pay below the national minimum wage, what is the point in having an exemption for the armed services in the Bill?

Mr. McCartney: I know that it is early in the morning, but we made it absolutely clear—and the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) agrees—that we considered it a more appropriate method of ensuring proper remuneration for our armed forces personnel. I thought that there was now a common approach on the matter across the Floor of the House. Let me repeat to the hon. Member for Aldershot that no one can claim, individually or collectively, to be the sole arbiter of pay and remuneration in the armed forces. The Government are committed to our armed forces and to providing fairness in pay and other remuneration, and we shall keep to those commitments. That is why, if the Opposition press the amendment, I recommend that the House rejects it.

I have attempted to be fair in the way in which I have dealt with the amendments; I have addressed them in the spirit in which they were moved. We had a more rumbustious debate in Committee, but this evening we have approached the issue differently. We have had the battle upstairs and the battleground has now been cleared. The smoke has now left the battlefield, we all know where we are going and the sooner that we can move forward, the better.

Mr. Boswell: My reservation about the matter is that the Minister of State carefully avoided the fact that, although there was an Armed Forces Pay Review Body, by which he set great store—as I do—the Government have not implemented its recommendations in full and immediately. Any suggestion of parity was avoided, therefore, and that is what the amendment was about.

I was concerned by the tone of some of what the Minister said in response to the helpful speech and intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), who represents the home of the British Army and might have received somewhat more gracious treatment from him.

I am a modest man, not prone to wrath, but, in the context of the amendment, the House may wish to consider whether it now proceeds to a call of reveille.

Amendment negatived.

Schedule 1

THE LOW PAY COMMISSION

Mr. Boswell: I beg to move amendment No. 69, in page 34, line 27, at end insert—

'Disqualification by Scottish Parliament and National Assembly for Wales

6. A member of the Commission is disqualified from being—

(a) a member of the Scottish Parliament, or

I am a little disappointed—indeed, I am mortified—that, despite the efforts of some of my hon. Friends to wake up the House a few moments ago, no Ministers from the Scottish Office or the Welsh Office are present for a debate about important business that bears on Scotland and Wales. I am relatively inexperienced in the consideration of difficult constitutional matters. My sole qualifications are that I have a Scottish name and a Welsh wife. I am distressed at having to do without the assistance of Ministers from those Departments.

The amendment is consensual, so the Ministers need not have stayed away. Membership of bodies financed and serviced by the Crown may give rise to disqualification. Someone who joins a quango financed by the Government or takes up a job as a salaried civil servant is disqualified from membership of this House. That also applies to membership of the Northern Ireland assembly, which is a dead letter at the moment. Those two cases are provided for in schedule 1, but there is no such disqualification for the Scottish Parliament or the National Assembly for Wales.

I have made inquiries about that. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) is a constitutional specialist who keeps an eye on such proceedings, on which I was temporarily unsighted. He shared my view that the issue should be sorted out in the Bill.

I then sought correspondence with the Minister's Department. We had a useful exchange; he replied promptly in order to inform consideration on Report. He replied to the effect that there was no such automatic disqualification, but that it could be extended under the provisions of the Scotland Bill and the Government of Wales Bill in due course by Order in Council. I am sure that that is the Government's intention.

We, as ever, are anxious to help the Government on their way, and the amendment would simply provide at this point, cleanly and neatly in this Bill, a disqualification from the Scottish Parliament and the National Assembly for Wales of persons who are—or happen to be at the time—members of the Low Pay Commission. It is no more and no less than that, and I hope that, at this late stage, the Government, who have shown such relative reluctance to consider and adopt our amendments, might break their duck.

Mr. Ian McCartney: I am afraid that I cannot help the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell)—not even at this early hour. Amendment No. 69 attempts to make much ado about nothing. I have written to the hon. Gentleman about the matter, which he raised in Committee. I thank him for writing to me because it gave me an opportunity to confirm what I said.

The amendment proposes that the Bill should specify now that members of the Low Pay Commission should be disqualified from being Members of the Scottish Parliament or Members of the National Assembly for Wales. My reaction to this is: all in good time; there is no need to rush our fences.

Schedule 1 does not treat members of the Low Pay Commission any differently from members of other statutory bodies. All such members are disqualified from the Westminster Parliament by being listed in part II of schedule 1 to the House of Commons Disqualification Act 1975. The list covers dozens of bodies. It starts with members of the Advisory Committee on Hazardous Substances, and includes the council of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service, and members of the Health and Safety Executive, the Equal Opportunities Commission, the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, and many others. The process is entirely normal.

There is also a short list of disqualified persons in paragraphs (a) to (e) of section 1(1) of the Disqualification Act, which disqualifies judges, civil servants, members of the armed forces, members of police forces and members of foreign legislatures from being Members of this House. That short list is in the Scotland Bill and the Government of Wales Bill.

Decisions about the long list of disqualified persons for the Scottish Parliament and the National Assembly for Wales do not need to be taken now, although they will, of course, need to be taken later. That could be done in a number of ways. First, a decision will need to be taken, by means of orders made by the House and the other place, on disqualification prior to the first elections to those bodies. That will, no doubt, involve debate on the position of members of various statutory bodies, including the Low Pay Commission.

If the decision on the long list were not taken at Westminster prior to elections for the Scottish Parliament, that body, once elected, could make the decision itself by means of order-making powers under the Scotland Bill. In Wales, the position is different: the order-making power is retained by the Secretary of State. Whatever the situation, it will clearly make sense to have due regard to the long list of those already disqualified from Westminster.

The terms of appointment of members of the Low Pay Commission will be determined by the Secretary of State. It would be open to the Secretary of State to draft those terms of appointment in a way that excluded Members of any Parliament or assembly, regardless of whether they were automatically excluded by those bodies themselves.

Frankly, I regard all this as hypothetical and rather arcane. The important point is that we are committed to the independence and effectiveness of the Low Pay Commission. Despite the high regard that I have for hon. Members, I do not see their talents as being suited to the non-partisan and neutral approach that the commission needs to take in order to preserve its credibility.

My response to the amendment is that the matter will all be sorted out in good time. It does not make sense to pre-empt the process by amending the Bill in the way proposed. I have every confidence that sensible people will come to sensible conclusions on disqualification from the Scottish Parliament and the National Assembly for Wales, both for members of the Low Pay Commission and for members of all other statutory bodies concerned. I therefore ask the House to reject the amendment if Opposition Members persist in putting it to a vote.

Mr. Boswell: I found the Minister of State's reply disappointing and deeply implausible. Perhaps he has been working too long on the Bill, but there has been an unanticipated coalescence between the Minister and his officials. Suddenly, the mask of McCartney—he of the curve, which we discussed earlier—slipped, and we heard Sir Humphrey's voice speaking. We had the argument that Rome was not built in a day, and that it would all be sorted out in time—and probably it will be. It could have been sorted out tonight by our amendment, but it was not to be.

Purely as a gesture of good will to the Minister, because he has done his best to respond and has worked very hard in Committee and tonight, I advise my hon. Friends, exceptionally and against my better judgment, not to press the amendment to a Division. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr Betts.]

6.30 am

Mr. Ian McCartney: I know that it is early, but it is late for those of us who have been working on the Bill since 3.30 pm yesterday—and, indeed, for those of us who have been working on it for 20 years. It has been a long time coming. It was in February 1912—86 years ago—that the then leader of the Labour party moved on the Floor of the House an amendment to the Loyal Address to the then King's Speech, calling for the introduction of a national minimum wage. It is astonishing that it has taken 86 years for us to reach this stage, but, having got here, we intend to press on with the Bill.

The Bill is a straightforward and direct attack on the scandal of low pay. We shall introduce it and establish a principle of universality, clarity and simplicity. It will be truly a national minimum wage, just in time for the 21st century. This is a priority policy, on which Labour Members are proud to have won the general election. It is right, fair, just and sensible.

I thank all hon. Members who have spoken in support of the Bill on Report, on Second Reading, and during the magnificent effort in Committee. The time is right—indeed, overdue—for a minimum wage to be introduced, on both social and business grounds. Together with tax and benefit reform, it can promote work incentives and form part of a strategy to make work pay. It will ensure greater decency and fairness in the workplace and tackle the problems of in-work poverty.

Employees deserve good terms and conditions, and protection from exploitation. This measure reflects our determination to be a force for progress and social justice.

The Government are dedicated to fairness and decent minimum standards at work for all workers, and decent minimum standards include the right to a fair day's pay for a fair day's work. We have seen the results of the policies followed in the United Kingdom during the past 18 years by the Conservatives: the largest gap between rich and poor since the days of gas lamps and the Hansom cab. Conservative policies have led to a situation where a security guard can be expected to work between 85 and 100 hours a week, at an hourly rate of £1.80, and provide his or her own dog and van.

Nearly 1 million workers in Great Britain are currently paid less than £2.50 an hour. That is the Conservatives' legacy, and they should be ashamed of it.

That is why we established, in 90 days of the Labour Government, a Low Pay Commission made up of employers, employee representatives and specialists in the field, to make recommendations for a statutory rate for the minimum wage and on other issues. The Low Pay Commission will soon complete its work and make its proposals. As soon as it has done so, the Government will act and respond quickly, to ensure that we go forward and fully implement the minimum wage as soon as possible.

Throughout debates on the Bill in the House and in Committee, we have heard the familiar old parrot cry of the Conservatives: "Low pay or no pay." That is their strategy. They have argued that job losses will follow the introduction of a minimum wage, despite the fact that there is absolutely no evidence that a minimum wage, sensibly set to take into account economic circumstances, will lead to job losses. They have lost the argument in the country and in the House. We will move forward with some speed with the introduction of a national minimum wage.

The Conservatives have also lost the argument within business. Increasingly, business in Britain sees the economic case for the national minimum wage. Businesses are sick and tired of being undercut by cowboy employers paying £1.20 or £1.30 an hour, not competing on goods and services, but simply driving wages lower and lower. Britons cannot survive in a low-pay economy. We cannot compete overseas with Vietnam on the basis of 20 cents an hour. Our country deserves better—it deserves investing in our work force and in their employability and training and the commitment to minimum standards and the production of goods and services that are world beaters. One cannot do that if one simply wants to drive down wages to the lowest common denominator.

For those reasons, businesses increasingly see the business case for the national minimum wage. That is why business abandoned the Conservatives in Committee—not one business in Britain has been prepared to put its head above the parapet and support Conservative Members, because businesses do not want to be associated any more with the concept of poverty pay. Only those Conservative business people who are native to the Conservative party have stopped by the line of, "Low pay or no pay." We will not accept that from anyone, particularly from big backers of the Conservative party who earn millions of pounds a year in the City, while condemning millions of people in Britain to such low pay. It is rank hypocrisy and the Bill has revealed the hypocrisy of Conservative Members.

Conservative Members can no longer simply state that the Confederation of British Industry and other employer organisations do not want to participate in the early implementation of the minimum wage. The CBI and others want fair implementation of the legislation. Increasingly, employers are co-operating with the Government and the Low Pay Commission to ensure that that is the case.

The Tories are left abandoned, and rightly so. They cannot get out of the time warp they are in; for nearly 20 years they thought that Britain's success relied simply on driving down the pay and conditions of its work force, when it was crying out for investment in its work force, not damaging it and destroying it. They left us with a legacy of low pay, and of unemployment, which was twice the level that it was when the previous Labour Government left office. That is the legacy of the Tory's failed economic policies.

In closing, I want to consider what Alan Fisher and Bernard Dix of the National Union of Public Employees appreciated more than 20 years ago. In their book, "Low Pay and How to End It", they said:

"the first step in the construction of a policy to eliminate low pay must be the acceptance of the people that there is a level of wages below which nobody should be expected to work. This is an act of political commitment which has been dodged in most of the earlier discussion on low pay but which is essential if the problems of the low paid worker are to become a matter demanding an immediate practical solution rather than remaining the subject of detached academic curiosity. With public acceptance of this principle we can begin to fill out the arguments and some of the problems which confront us in the implementation of the principle in the full knowledge that we are committed to action rather than never-ending discussions."

The three crucial factors that those eminent trade unionists identified were public acceptance, political commitment and a practical solution. We now have public acceptance of the principle as shown by the result of the general election. The Bill and the setting up of the Low Pay Commission are the confirmation of our political commitment and our arrival at a practical solution. Now is the time to end the academic discussion and transform the dream into a reality. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Redwood: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) for the great leadership that he has shown in Committee and tonight to try to get proper examination of this problematic legislation and to my hon. Friends the Members for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) and for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), who made their first appearance at the Dispatch Box and spoke extremely eloquently on the amendments that they moved. I also pay tribute to all my hon. Friends who spent much time in Committee and who, during tonight's brief debates, have tried to make some sense of this rag-bag of a Bill, which splits the Labour party—[Laughter.] It splits the Labour party—some Labour Members, in speaking to an amendment tonight, said that they greatly disliked aspects of the Bill.

There have been wars between Ministers. Like most hon. Members, I know that the Minister of State is not at all happy that the armed forces are to be exempted from the Bill. He and his colleagues fought the Ministry of Defence for several weeks, but their resistance crumbled and he now has to defend a proposition that he does not like. That is why he always returns to grand principles and grand statements and reminds us, genuinely, of the campaigning work that he has done on this issue over many years.

It will not wash, however. When we see the final proposals, all the exempted groups and the low level at which the minimum wage will be set compared with what Labour Members wanted, we shall know that the damaged and divided Labour party is not happy about the Bill, and that it is still in trouble trying to find out how this country's economy works.

I shall describe the context of the Bill, which is another thing that the Labour party will not want to hear. Manufacturing industry is now in grave trouble thanks to the economic policies that have been pursued in recent months under the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Labour colleagues. Every day, I receive another letter or telephone call from someone in manufacturing industry, telling me that it is impossible to compete when sterling and interest rates are so high. People tell me that costs are the problem. The last thing that they want is an enforced large wage increase that will have an impact not only on lower pay, but on differentials, which is the likely result of the Bill.

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown): The right hon. Gentleman seems to be terribly concerned about the Bill's effect on manufacturing industry, but, to the best of my knowledge, no serious manufacturing company pays workers at a lower rate than even anywhere near what the minimum wage might offer. What is the relevance of his point? Low wages have no place in serious, modern business, so what is he talking about?

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman obviously knows more than the Minister about the level at which the minimum wage will be set—the Government have been absolutely quiet on that fundamental issue. The hon. Gentleman did not listen to what I was saying. I said that business is worried about the Bill's consequences for differentials. If, by law, the lowest levels of remuneration must be raised, the skilled and the semi-skilled who already receive more will, of course, want proportionate increases.

Even the Cabinet has worked that out. As we read in the papers the other day, Cabinet Ministers are depressed about the possibility that, in comparison with the pay of junior Ministers, their pay will increase rather modestly in percentage terms. Cabinet Ministers are saying that they need the differentials to be preserved—they want the same percentage increase as junior Ministers, even though that would mean that they would receive a much larger pay rise.

One of the big worries of Conservative Members is that the Bill could trigger a wage increase of some magnitude, which, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would be deeply damaging to jobs and economic prospects.

Mr. Chris Pond (Gravesham): Given that the right hon. Gentleman supported the previous Government's decision to abolish the minimum wage system that existed at the time, and given that he has so many reservations about the Bill, will he say categorically whether—at some time in the future, in circumstances which it is difficult for us to imagine, with his party again in government—he would repeal the Bill? May we have a straight answer?

Mr. Redwood: We expect the governing party to do a lot of damage in the next three years, before going to the country. When we get nearer the general election, my right hon. and hon. Friends and I will decide which of the many undesirable measures we intend to repeal. I may well then be able to answer the hon. Gentleman's question. We will examine the whole range of damage that the Government are doing and come to a considered judgment about our first legislative programme, which we will put to the country. We will then win that general election.

Labour Members should pay more attention to what the Chancellor says and does. He recently read the riot act to the British economy and British business. He told everyone that if wages go up at all quickly over the next year or two economic damage will be done, hinting that he might even take retaliatory action by raising taxes or reducing public spending. He said that jobs will be lost if pay increases accelerate.

The Chancellor clearly does not know what to do, because pay increases, especially in the service sector, are accelerating. We have two economies: the manufacturing economy, which is moving into recession, with output falling, and the much bigger service economy, which is extremely buoyant, with wages rising rapidly by the standards of the recent past.

The Bill, emanating from the Department of Trade and Industry, is in complete opposition to the Chancellor's view of what we need to do on wages. It is designed to increase wages by perhaps 20 or 25 per cent. at the lowest end of the spectrum—if we knew the rate of the minimum wage, it would be easier to do the sums—with proportionate increases for the skilled people in good bargaining positions who want to preserve differentials.

The Minister tells us that that will have no impact on unemployment, but the Chancellor tells us that any wage increase will affect unemployment. He is even worried that the relatively small increases of the past year or so could accelerate just a little and cause problems. [Interruption.] Labour Members are now quibbling with the Chancellor. I am expressing not my view, but his; it is a view about which he made many speeches and issued a press statement, because he was so worried about accelerating wages.

The essence of the welfare-to-work programme is to try to subsidise employment—to lower its costs—so as to create more jobs. We wish the programme well, but we believe that the best way of creating jobs is to have a low-tax economy, with less regulation and law, that is more competitive and allows more small businesses to be set up and to create the jobs that are needed.

The Chancellor's scheme of lowering the costs of employment through subsidies is about to be undermined—in a couple of years, when the full impact is felt—by legislation designed to raise industrial costs.

The Minister owes the House a proper explanation of what impact the Bill will have on inflation. He should by now have a clear idea in his own mind—even if he will not share it with the House—of the likely level of the minimum wage. From his many impassioned speeches, it is clear that he wants to increase wages. That is the purpose of the Bill. He understandably wants many people to be better paid, as would I, but the argument between us concerns whether that can be done by legislation and whether the Bill will have worse consequences than he is letting on for those hoping to benefit.

Conservative Members believe that higher pay must be achieved by economic success. Some Labour Members believe that they can achieve it by a stroke of the legislative pen. They are likely to trigger a big increase in differentials and, if we are to believe the Chancellor, unemployment problems.

The Government have also been unwilling to share with the House the true costs of the measure to the taxpayer and the Government accounts. One of their forecasts suggests that the cost will be £200 million on general public sector costs, if the minimum wage were set at £3.75 an hour. That is an underestimate in itself, but we must add the much bigger figures that will tumble through to the public sector wage bill if we assume some increase in differentials. The true cost is likely to be several times the estimate of £200 million.

We need a proper explanation from the Government of what the Bill will do to their public borrowing plans and their tax-raising plans, and how the Chancellor will find the additional money at a time when the Prime Minister is lecturing everybody on how they must not increase spending and must run a tight ship.

The Government must also consider the cost of the higher unemployment that is likely to result from the consequences that I have described. At some point, there will, unfortunately, be a turn for the worse in the favourable trends of unemployment that have resulted from the Conservative economic policies that have been followed since the end of 1992. The Bill could well be one of the factors that tip the balance the other way as it makes its job-destroying progress. To the effects of the Bill must be added the action that the Government will take on trade union reform and on implementing the social chapter, which we have warned is likely to lead to further job losses.

The lack of any indication of the level of the minimum wage—[Interruption.] I am glad that Labour Members are still awake. It is good to see that so many Labour Members have shown enough interest in the Bill to stay with us so far. That is good of them, as we have not had a Division since 10 o'clock. They are obviously fascinated by the debate and they will have heard many fine speeches by Conservative Members.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Given that the Government have been in power since May, could it be that Labour Members were expecting that the Minister, in his speech on Third Reading, would share with us his expectations about the level of the minimum wage? The Minister kept talking about terrible poverty pay, but he would not tell us what he believes that to be.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is right. What does the Minister consider to be poverty pay? He is impassioned about it, but he cannot name a figure or even give us a ball park idea.

Mr. Pond: Would you repeal the Bill?

Mr. Redwood: I do not have to answer that question because I am not recommending a minimum wage. [Interruption.] The Minister is recommending a minimum wage and he should tell us the figure at which it will be set.

In 1992, Labour said that the minimum wage had to be £3.40 an hour. If that figure were updated in relation to national earnings, it would reach £4.60 an hour—a figure well above any of those that have been leaked to the newspapers as the likely level of the minimum wage. Even if we only link the £3.40 figure to inflation, it would have to be nearly £4 an hour to validate the promise made in 1992. If we believe the trade unions and what we read in the newspapers, the level is likely to be £3.60 and, therefore, the Minister's ambition will be thwarted.

The Labour party's ambitions of 1992 will have come horribly unstuck because the Treasury has had a go at them. [Interruption.]

Mr. Bercow: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in addition to the absurdity of Ministers still failing to offer a view about the level of the minimum wage, it is absurd that—10 months into this Government—not one of the Labour Members who are making stupid and boisterous observations from sedentary positions has offered an independent view on the level of the minimum wage? Are not Labour Members just a bunch of tired and emotional wrecks?

Mr. Redwood: My explanation of Labour Members' conduct is that they are under the thumb of the Minister without Portfolio, who has told them not to name a figure for fear of embarrassing the Chancellor and the Government. We have Hamlet without the prince. We are invited to a meal with no food on offer, and we are not even sure how many people will be invited; there are still arguments about who should be covered by the legislation. We think that a retreat is under way on coverage and on the level of the minimum wage. The Chancellor is likely to fight on and demand a minimum wage much lower than many Labour Members would like.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham said, it is extraordinary that in a party that claims that this is a flagship measure in which it believes, not one Labour Member is prepared to name a figure for an acceptable minimum wage. I shall give way to anyone prepared to name a figure. It appears that no Labour Member will.

Mr. Pond: I was hoping to get an answer to my earlier intervention. Would the right hon. Gentleman repeal the legislation, yes or no?

Mr. Redwood: I made it clear what our answer was on that. There is no point in boring the House by going over it again. There is no answer from Labour Members on what would be an acceptable minimum wage. They cannot say that they live in fear of the bosses cutting them off. They know that the Chancellor is worried about a minimum wage that would raise anyone's pay anywhere in the country.

We have a similar problem with scope. We were told by the Minister and by the President of the Board of Trade that everyone would be covered. That was their proud boast when they first came to the House with the matter. We learn now that young people are likely to be left out, that anyone under 26 is deemed to be young for that purpose and that the promise will be broken for them. We learn that the armed forces will be left out, although the Minister was unable to explain why. He could not say why people who take such risks for our country on active service would not get the protection that he sees in this legislation; nor was he able to confirm that they would always be earning above it. [Interruption.] The Minister is kind to offer me his water but I have some of my own. I am sure that he will need his.

We need to see what will happen to young voters. In the run-up to the general election, I remember Labour Members telling people that they would be covered by the legislation. They said, "Vote Labour and we will legislate a pay rise for you." We objected. We doubted whether they would be able to do it and feared that some young people would be issued with a redundancy notice rather than a pay increase. Labour spokesmen reassured the electorate. They did not think that there would be redundancy notices. They were wrong about that. They carried on implying to the electors that every young person would get the full benefit of the minimum wage. Now the Minister looks grumpy, knowing that he cannot deliver. [Interruption.] Now he is trying to cheer up. He knows that he cannot deliver to the young people of Great Britain on that fundamental election promise.

The Minister should also think again about the position of small businesses. They are the main means by which new jobs are generated in Britain. Often, they start off with modest pay and limited hours for the job on offer and gradually build themselves up and can offer something better. He is in danger of destroying the opportunity for small businesses to get started. He is also destroying the opportunity for young people to start off in a modest job on modest pay—more modest than he or I would like—and going on to something better. The best way to get a job is to have a job. The best stepping stone to a better job is to have a not-so-good job. The Minister is in danger of removing some of those important stepping stones from the paths of many people to bigger opportunities and better jobs. Clearly, we are seeing a Government who are still divided over whether unemployment will be a serious problem. The Minister is fighting and losing a rearguard action over the question of the scope and coverage of the legislation.

We have also failed to get much out of the Minister on the question of regional variations. He must know that there are big regional variations around the country in the amount of pay offered to people; he must also know that there are big differences in the costs of living around the regions, depending on housing and transport costs and other important items in the family budget. The Bill proposes to treat everybody the same, wherever they are; it offers no recognition of the fact that different sums are needed to live to the same standard in different parts of the United Kingdom. The costs are simply not the same.

On Second Reading, I asked the President of the Board of Trade to explain to the House whether she thought a factory worker on £4.50 an hour in London was better or worse off than a waitress living outside London on £3 an hour who received free board and lodging. It is arguable that the waitress is getting more than the factory worker in London; it is certainly true that the factory worker faces high housing and other general living costs by virtue of living in the capital city. However, there has been no recognition in Committee or on Report of the regional problem. I have read all the Committee stage Hansards and know that the Minister failed to come up with a scheme for recognising the different costs of living and the fact that different amounts of pay are needed in order to handle those different costs. The Minister should think again about the regional issues his Bill opens up.

Mr. Forth: Following that line of argument, which I completely accept, would my right hon. Friend say that the likely or possible impact on employment levels will vary regionally and that, paradoxically, the regions that will be hardest hit and most adversely affected will be those where pay happens to be lower? Those are probably the sorts of regions that, for as long as any of us can remember, Labour Members have been telling us have been disadvantaged. Will not this legislation further disadvantage those regions that are already struggling?

Mr. Redwood: That is the cruel irony of the Government's position: the regions that need most help in pricing people into jobs are the regions that will suffer most from the legislation, because they will have to accept a national average. In the regions that currently have the worst unemployment and the lowest pay, there will be the biggest problem and we are most likely to see job losses; whereas in the areas that are already overheating, the minimum wage will not present the same sort of problems in terms of unemployment, but it will offer no help to people because so many of them will already receive more than the minimum wage.

In an earlier exchange, I was asked whether there were jobs being offered in my constituency below the likely level of the minimum wage. I was able to confirm that, in my constituency, which has very low unemployment and a successful economy, people are not offering or accepting jobs at less than £4 an hour, because there is no need to. That shows how economic success can deliver higher pay and it shows how the minimum wage will be an irrelevance in the most successful parts of the economy, whereas it will be a hindrance or a disaster in those parts of the country that need the most help.

I was talking about the definition of pay. We have not heard a proper explanation from the Government of how tips, bonuses, share incentives, free accommodation, free meals and other forms of remuneration will be treated. Those are complicated matters and, so that we have a fair system, the Minister should set out—before the Bill is passed—how the calculations are going to be done to ensure comparable treatment between people remunerated in different ways.

I am not sure whether the Minister has thought through the issue of piece rates and what would happen in a factory where most workers were above the minimum wage on a piece rate system, but where a few workers—perhaps trainees or those fairly new to the job—fell below the minimum wage from time to time. Would it be fair for their pay to be made up? Would that not undermine the point of the piece rate system? Is this the Abolition of Piece Rate or Incentive Pay Bill? The Minister has not told us how he would handle that problem.

The Bill reflects another well-known new Labour trait. The Labour party campaigned against quangos and argued that they are not accountable and that matters should be dealt with by elected people. We now discover that a whole area of policy will be delegated to a quango under the Bill. The Low Pay Commission will have a continuing role reviewing the level of the minimum wage. The Minister implies that he does not have a clue about what the minimum wage should be, or how wages should be calculated. That task is being delegated to the quango that the Government have established.

The Minister says that he has devoted his political life to campaigning for better wages by Act of Parliament. It is extraordinary that, when he becomes the Minister and can announce such legislation after all these years, he is mute on the fundamental issue of what constitutes an acceptable level of pay. He is happy for a quango to take away from him the privilege of introducing what he believes is an acceptable level of pay: a measure in which he can take pride.

Mr. Bercow: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the absence from the Third Reading debate of the President of the Board of Trade suggests that, far from earning her wage, which is a great deal more than the national minimum wage is likely to be, she is slumbering in her grace and favour apartment?

Mr. Redwood: It is a great pity that the President of Board of Trade has taken no formal part in these proceedings during the night.

Mrs. Roche: The President of the Board of Trade was present during parts of these proceedings. Unlike others, my right hon. Friend believes that those who have done the work in Standing Committee should get the credit for it on the Floor of the House. That is why she is such a good boss to her Ministers.

Mr. Redwood: I presume that the hon. Lady's comment was meant to be a criticism, but it was wide of the mark. I ensured that my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry received full credit. He issued the press release today, and is available to do the media interviews. I have paid tribute to him during the proceedings. I am proud of my hon. Friend's work, and he should get credit in the press for the conduct of the Committee and the debate during this night. The legislation is important, so I asked him whether I could speak to some amendments, and we agreed that we would both contribute to the Third Reading debate.

The absence of the President of the Board of Trade is all the more intriguing because she knew that I was planning to speak. It is a great pity that, once again, she cannot face the music on a measure that she is supposed to believe in. I notice that she causes merriment among Labour Members: they must be embarrassed by her absence. Her fleeting visit at the beginning of the proceedings did not extend to making any comment or to offering any support, as the Hansard record will show.

The quango that the Government are establishing has too much power, and it takes responsibilities away from Ministers. It is a pity that Ministers have refused all opportunities to explain whether they will overrule the quango. We do not know whether the Minister has in his mind a level of pay that would be too low and would lead him to reject the conclusions of the Low Pay Commission. We do not know whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer may veto the level of pay that the Low Pay Commission recommends, perhaps with the Minister's blessing. Unless we know that, it is difficult to judge how much power the Bill will convey to the quango. I fear that it will have too much power. Ministers should have done the honest thing and worked out in their own minds what they believe is an acceptable level of pay. They have a huge civil service staff to help them, and they could have announced the level when they introduced the Bill.

Mr. Ian McCartney: In the past, my hon. Friends have called the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) the Vulcan. After his current performance, he can be called Mogadon man. The final minute of the right hon. Gentleman's speech shows why he is so out of touch with British business. The CBI, the Institute of Directors and every other British business organisation support the principle and the concept of the Low Pay Commission, and are working effectively with it. Only the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues do not recognise that the commission is accepted by both sides of industry as the best way towards the establishment of a national minimum wage.

Mr. Redwood: The Minister said that my remarks just before he intervened showed that I was out of touch. They were that I wanted the Minister to make the decision, and it is interesting that he thinks that that final remark shows that I am out of touch. I would prefer the Minister to make the decision. The minimum wage began as a Labour party measure, and Labour is now trying to use the quango to cloak it with respectability. They are very worried that it will come up with either a figure that is too low, in which case the Minister will be deeply embarrassed, or one that is too high, which will worry the Chancellor because it will destroy jobs.

Business opinion is not as the Minister describes. I have heard many representations from business on the issue, and the CBI has warned that if the minimum wage is set too high, it will lead to a loss of jobs. Companies throughout the country would tell the Minister that if he sets it too high, too far above current remuneration in those companies, jobs will go. I do not know whether the Minister knows the seriousness of the problem in manufacturing. He and his colleagues seem to be doing nothing about the problems that have been created by the Government's independent monetary committee, by their taxation of savings, by their refusal to listen to the arguments against the abolition of PEPs and TESSAs, and against the taxation of pension funds and the £27,000 million tax hit on British business in the Budget. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. Far too many hon. Gentlemen and hon. Ladies are making sedentary remarks. I ask them to desist.

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful to you for that, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I realise that we are running out of time. The Government did not allow enough time to debate the Bill, and my hon. Friends are frustrated that they have not been able to explore all the important matters in it in the depth that they warrant, given that it is such a lousy Bill.

The Opposition message is that the Government do not care about manufacturing or about savers. Taxing savers in the current economic situation is extremely dangerous and puts all the pressure on interest rates and sterling, and that undermines jobs and prospects in our manufacturing heartlands. The last thing that manufacturing wants is a load of moral lectures and laws from the Labour party on top of the terrible problems that are being created by high sterling and the Government's interest rate policy.

The Chancellor says that he is pursuing a policy of toughness. The Minister is about to unleash a big pay explosion as a result of the differential awards that will be needed as all the skilled groups try to have the same increase as people at the bottom of the scale. The result will be extremely damaging, and that is the opposite of what manufacturing and business needs. The Minister does not understand business opinion. He is not being open with the House and telling us the level of the minimum wage or who will be affected by the Bill. He has not even told us how wages and remuneration will be calculated for the purposes of the Bill.

The Bill is another death blow to manufacturing and it is bad news for the economy. The Government are throwing away a golden inheritance and they will destroy the job-creating machine that we left them.

7.13 am

Gillian Merron: It is 86 years since a national minimum wage was first brought before the House. The concept has been a long time in Parliament and our debate on Report has also taken a long time. Like many of my hon. Friends, I am happy to sit here for as long as it takes to pass the legislation because it is right for Britain, and that is why the electorate put us in government. The Opposition spoke throughout the early hours of the morning, but we have heard it all before. In the historic Committee on which some of my colleagues and I were privileged to serve, Opposition Members ducked and dived. The undermining of the Bill was dressed up in the form of amendments. We heard all about what we came to term the national minimum gratuities Bill, with Opposition Members believing that tips should be included in a national minimum wage. What on earth were they thinking about?

Mr. Hammond: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Gillian Merron: I believe that the hon. Gentleman has had enough time. I will not give way.

Let us be clear. It is the Opposition who have constantly opposed the national minimum wage. They have not given a direct answer as to whether they would repeal the legislation, but the absence of such an answer gives a clear message. They have been consistent. They are happy with low pay, but we are not.

On behalf of my Labour colleagues, I pay tribute to Ministers, who have shown passion and skill in dealing with the subject. Labour Members have grown accustomed to that and we expect and value that contribution, the like of which the Opposition have no experience of making.

For many years, I have been proud to represent people in the public services, first, in the National Union of Public Employees and, latterly, in Unison: people who cook, clean, care and carry for us, who do the invisible work and who are not regarded highly in our society. We are here today for them.

Mr. Gale: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Gillian Merron: I will not.

Mr. Gale: How much?

Gillian Merron: During the general election, one of my constituents, in deciding how he was going to vote, said to me that the line in the sand for him was decency, that the national minimum wage was all about decency and that that was why he would support Labour.

Mr. Gale: How much?

Gillian Merron: Let us remember that, at this stage in the debate, the constant barracking and constant questioning about how much the rate will be is a complete diversion. We all know that. The Low Pay Commission has been established so that we have a thoughtful, sensible and well-supported rate. We will have its report in a few short weeks and it does Opposition Members no credit that they criticise the action of a cautious and wise Government. Opposition Members seem to prefer rashness and policies that are irrelevant to the reality of the business world and people's working lives. We will not allow that.

Let us remember that this very construction will bring benefits all round. Businesses in my constituency and in the constituencies of hon. Members on both sides of the House welcome the national minimum wage because they know that it will—

Mr. Lansley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) was at pains to refer to the need to declare interests. I wonder if she would care to declare an interest in relation to her entry in the Register of Members' Interests concerning the loan of a car for seven weeks from Unison, which she records as her former employer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter for the occupant of the Chair. It is for hon. Members to decide what they need to declare.

Gillian Merron: It is no secret that I am very proud to be associated with Unison and its members.

Businesses welcome the national minimum wage because it will cut unfair competition, where a business undercuts the next business. That is why cleaning companies and private contractors will be pleased to have a national minimum wage. Taxpayers pay £100 a year more than they should to compensate for low-paying employers and to cover the cost of in-work benefits. Women, the majority of whom are low paid and work part time, will benefit. This country will benefit because the national minimum wage will give it a competitive edge. We will have a better trained, more stable and more productive work force. That is what we need to be able to compete.

If Opposition Members need any proof that we need a minimum wage and have not been to their jobcentre, they are welcome to come to the jobcentre in my constituency of Lincoln. They will see vacancies for night care assistants, where people are required to have experience and their own transport and to take full responsibility for £2.20 an hour. Tell me that that is acceptable. Perhaps they would like to see the advertisements for security guards, at less than £3 an hour—and they even have to supply their own dogs. Is that acceptable? I think not.

If ever I need convincing, I think back to when I was a local government worker advising on welfare benefits and debt. In one family a low-paid husband and a wife who was at home caring for the children were claiming in-work benefits. They were struggling, as many low-paid families do, with terrible debts, and I was trying to assist them. On the eve of an election—when, I regret, Labour lost—the wife said that she would be celebrating if Labour won because she would then have something to look forward to. When Labour lost, I felt that we had let her down. Today, we have not let her down; we have done something for her and for low-paid people who deserve so much better.

My hon. Friends and I were elected to this House to do the sort of work that we have done today. We came here to ensure that this Bill went through. That is what the people of this country want and we will not be diverted from that. Make no mistake—as the Opposition do—about what the people want. They want the first ever national minimum wage in this country, and it is a Labour Government who will give it to them.

Mr. Chidgey: I do not intend to delay the House for long, as I know that other hon. Members wish to speak.

We have come a long way since Second Reading. Dealing with this Bill has been an exhaustive and, for some of us, an exhausting experience. Throughout our debates, many hon. Members—certainly in my party as well as the Labour party—have shared a common aim: to put an end to cowboy employers undercutting their competitors by paying poverty wages which are then subsidised by social benefits paid for by the taxpayer. That has never been right and it has no place in the modern industrial economy to which we aspire and, indeed which we hope to lead in the coming century.

Ministers know that we have some concerns about certain elements of the Bill. Throughout our debates, we have made it clear that we are concerned about the mechanisms for introducing a single national minimum wage. We are concerned about the variation in the economic impact, the degree of which we do not know, that a single national minimum wage could and would have on different areas of the country.

During what has been a very long night, and I am grateful to the Minister—[Interruption.] It is interesting how hon. Members who have come into the Chamber only at this late stage in our proceedings should be so confident that they appreciate the finer points of the debates that have gone before.

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chidgey: I think not; we have had enough.

We have come some way during the night and I am grateful to the Minister for confirming that the issues on which I have pressed him on a number of occasions will be dealt with by the Low Pay Commission and will feature in its report. That report will precede the secondary legislation which, we are told, will set out the detailed proposals for a national minimum wage. We will grasp the opportunity to scrutinise those details.

We have come a long way in teasing out, in Committee, some of the less clear aspects of the Bill. It has been improved through an all-party contribution on new clause 1, relating to volunteers, for which we should all take credit.

The Bill will provide protection for the most abused sector of the working population—home workers. I am pleased that the Minister shares the concerns that I drew to his attention earlier about the exploitation of that particularly vulnerable employment sector.

Although we have reservations about the general application of a single national minimum wage, we shall not oppose the Bill's passage.

Mr. Pond: I am sad that I did not get a straight answer to my intervention in the speech of the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) about whether the Conservative party would plan, after all our debates, to repeal the National Minimum Wage Bill. I am even sadder that the right hon. Gentleman is no longer in the Chamber. However, the Leader of the Opposition is in the Chamber, and I should be happy to give way to him at any point in my speech if he would like to tell me whether the Conservatives plan to repeal the national minimum wage that we are introducing today.

Mr. Boswell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Pond: No, I shall make a little progress—unless the hon. Gentleman will tell me whether the Conservatives would repeal the legislation, in which case I should be very happy to give way.

Mr. Boswell: Has it occurred to the hon. Gentleman that it will be reasonable to ask us whether we will repeal the Bill once the Government tell us what it is that we might or might not be invited to repeal? We do not know.

Mr. Pond: It was against my better judgment to give way.

In Committee, there was some confusion about whether Conservative Members had a hidden agenda in dealing with the Bill. The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) told us that there was no hidden agenda, but the hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) told us that there was one—although he was not quite sure whose agenda it was. During the Committee stage, another hon. Member told us, very honestly, that the purpose of the Opposition's amendments to the Bill was to restrict the national minimum wage "as far as possible".

Conservative Members want to ensure—as their behaviour in the past few hours has been intended to ensure—that we do not have a national minimum wage in the United Kingdom. They still do not get it, do they? They do not understand that four out of five people in the United Kingdom are in favour of the national minimum wage, or that two out of three of those who still admit to being Conservative supporters—admittedly, numerically, there are not many of them—say that they favour a national minimum wage. Conservative Members continue to oppose the legislation. They do not understand that it is not only a matter of basic social justice but makes good business sense.

Opposition Members have told us in today's and yesterday's debates and in Committee that they are not in favour of sweated labour. In Committee, the hon. Member for Daventry told us that he had seen a sweatshop only in Romania. That might present a little challenge for his local press in Daventry—perhaps to discover whether they can uncover something that might look like a sweatshop. Every hon. Member will have to admit that, in the absence of a national minimum wage, we all have among our constituents people who are earning pitifully low pay.

While working at the Low Pay Unit, I saw at first hand, during 18 years of Conservative government, the effects of low pay. Although Conservative Members now tell us that they are not in favour of sweatshop economics, I saw at the sharp end the impact of their policies: abolition of wages councils; and sweatshop economics which led us to a situation in which—as the Minister told us earlier in the debate; I, too, commend Ministers for their work on this Bill—pay inequalities in the United Kingdom are now wider than they were in 1886, when figures were first collected, and have increased faster than in any other industrialised country. That is part of the reason why, shamefully, the numbers of those in poverty in the United Kingdom trebled under the previous Administration.

Despite the enormous economic and social costs of the previous Government's policies, those policies have had no benefit. One might have thought, listening to the right hon. Member for Wokingham, that the sweatshop economics that the previous Government pursued have provided a nirvana of job creation and competitiveness. In fact, those policies created far fewer jobs for the nation than were created for countries that provided a decent level of pay and a minimum wage. We slipped down the competitiveness league, and eventually, in terms of national income per head, we were 11th out of 15 member states of the European Union. If that is economic success, I would hate to see economic failure. We must take Opposition Members' arguments with a pinch of salt—or more appropriately, perhaps, with a salt mine. Their aim is to continue the discredited policies that we saw when they were in government.

Let me remind the House why we have sat here throughout the night to make sure that there is a national minimum wage. Let me give some examples that have recently been encountered by the Low Pay Unit, the organisation for which I used to work. An economics graduate is working for a firm of London solicitors for £1.75 an hour. An 18-year-old with NVQ 2, working in a private nursing home for adults with special needs in Yorkshire, earns £1.50 an hour. A 20-year-old employed as a stablehand in the east midlands earns 66p an hour.

We have sat here throughout the night, and we sat through two Committee sittings for more than 20 hours, to ensure that those people receive the decent minimum wage that they deserve. Let me remind the House why Opposition Members have sat here throughout the night. They have gone through the theatre—the fiasco—of pretending to scrutinise legislation, while going round and round, intervening on each other, to make sure that those people do not have the national minimum wage to which they are entitled. Labour Members will not let it happen.

Mr. Gale: I will be brief, because the hour is late. [HON. MEMBERS: "Early!"] It is late in the evening.

What we heard from the Minister was an unreconstructed rant from the 1970s. It was a time warp, returning us to the Trades Union Congress that we all used to know and loathe. The Labour party has clearly learnt nothing from those days. It has not learnt that, if people are to be paid more money, that money must be earned by the company concerned before it can be paid.

The Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry said in a disparaging speech that it did not matter, but of course it matters how much the figure is. We have sat here all night asking over and over again what that figure will be, but not one clone—not one radio pager—is prepared to tell Labour Members what to say.

The hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond) is not prepared to tell us how many Kentish jobs the Bill will cost, although he has been working on it for years in the

[Mr. Gale]

Low Pay Unit. We are told that we have been looking forward to this for 70 or 80 years, but no one is prepared to put a figure on it, and that is what matters.

I will vote against the Bill, because it will cost my constituents jobs. I came here to represent my constituents' interests, and I do not believe that it is in their interests to be put out of work by any meaningful figure. If the Minister tells us that it will not be a meaningful figure, I will say that we have wasted the entire night, and that some of my colleagues have wasted a great deal of time on the Bill. If it is to be a figure of the kind that has been bandied about in private on the Opposition Benches, industries and businesses in my constituency are very concerned indeed. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) said, there will be a ratchet effect. Wage costs will go up and up and up.

I represent a part of the south-east that has historically had high unemployment. I want my constituents to earn more: I want to see more money in their pockets, so that they can put more money into retail industries in my constituency. However, that money must be earned. I do not want an unrealistic wage, at whatever level, to be imposed on the seaside industries that I represent, on the agricultural workers and casual workers whom I represent or on those working in the toy industry—a highly competitive industry, which is seeking to deal with overseas competition and costs that companies are already finding it very difficult to meet. If those people are to be put out of work by the Bill—as I believe they will—I would be doing them no favours by voting for it. If Labour Members are prepared to name a figure now, we shall know where we stand. If they are not, I fail to see how they can go into the Lobby in support of this nonsense.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): While the hon. Gentleman is on the question of naming, can he name the toy firms in his constituency?

Mr. Gale: I can and I am proud to do so. Hornby Hobbies is one of the most respected toy companies in the country. The managing director wishes to raise the wages of his employees. He is a new managing director who has turned the company round. It went into liquidation, it was bought out of liquidation and it recovered. It is a proud international name, but it is competing with assembly workers around the world. Good, part-time jobs employing my constituents are being sent overseas because British companies cannot compete with the wage costs.

If my constituents working for that firm will be placed out of work by the legislation, the Government and the legislation will be doing them no favours whatever. They, and Labour Members' constituents, will find that their jobs have gone and the small husband-and-wife businesses that were considering taking on a young person will work longer hours because they cannot afford to take on another employee. That is not creating work; it is destroying jobs and that is what the legislation and the Government will do.

Mr. Jim Murphy: It is good that the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) joined us this evening. It was good of him to set his alarm and wake from his slumber. It was good of him to slip his suit over his pyjamas, but it was very bad manners for him to nod off in the middle of his own speech. He has since sleep-walked back to his office, no doubt to prepare for the rest of his busy day. It is a shame that he is not in his place, but perhaps the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) will comment on what I have to say.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond) asked the right hon. Member for Wokingham whether he would repeal the legislation, but the Opposition would not make a commitment three years in advance. I wonder whether that could be reconciled with other comments by the right hon. Member for Wokingham, who seemed perfectly eager and determined to comment in principle on opposing and repealing other legislation for a decade and beyond. I refer in particular to the European currency.

The Opposition lectured us on the impact on young people of a national minimum wage. That rhetoric does not fit well with an Opposition who objected to the single greatest job creation and opportunity enhancement project this century, in the shape of the new deal. We accept no lectures from them on opportunities for young people.

I have sat here throughout the debate this evening, and watched the Opposition pass the baton of filibustering from Back Bench to Front Bench and back again. It is now twenty minutes to 8 in the morning. It says something strange about the Chamber that this is the largest number of hon. Members that I have ever addressed, and that we are all gathered here at twenty minutes to 8 in the morning.

Although I feel a little jaded after listening to Opposition speeches throughout the night, I feel most sorry for my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford), who has been sitting here all evening waiting for the Adjournment debate on his local fire service. I feel equally sorry for the Minister who is waiting to reply to that debate. I wish my hon. Friend every success with his Adjournment debate.

I have a couple of quick comments, because I know that time is not an ally this morning. The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) said that his town was the home of the armed forces, and that the Bill would bode ill for the people of Aldershot. Every constituency is the home of the armed forces, because we all have constituents in the forces. They will all be affected by the findings of the pay review body.

Like many hon. Members, I would have been affected by a national minimum wage in the past 18 years. I was affected by the Conservatives' repeal of the wages councils in 1993. Since then, I have worked night shifts, I have worked in shops and I have worked for very low wages. I bore the brunt of the previous Government's policies.

I do not accept the claim of Conservative Members that a minimum wage will lead to a reduction in the number of jobs, and will create unemployment. Again, I cite the Conservatives' record in government. In 1993, they abolished the wages councils, claiming that that would create jobs. The facts do not bear that out. Of course various economic circumstances have an impact on jobs, but let us examine one important fact: in the year before the abolition of the wages councils, nearly 18,000 new jobs were created in this country; in the year after the abolition, that number went down to 5,000. The abolition of the wages councils did not have a positive impact on the level of unemployment.

Mr. Lansley: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that unemployment has gone down every month since 1993? Does he not attribute that to the economic policies of the previous Government, including labour market flexibility?

Mr. Murphy: No, I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. There was a sharp reduction in job creation after the abolition of the wages councils. The Conservatives doubled the number of unemployed when they were in government. We shall not accept any lessons from the Conservatives on unemployment, because they failed to implement any programmes for change for the young unemployed, and failed to bring in a minimum wage—indeed, they did the opposite.

I welcome the comments of my hon. Friend the Minister earlier this morning, or late yesterday evening, on unfair dismissal. It is crucial that no one should be sacked or victimised for exercising their legal right to demand the national minimum wage. That right must be protected in law.

Much was said in Committee about benefits. One of the main reasons why I support the Bill is that we shall no longer have to subsidise low pay. Crucially, no longer will taxpayers have to subsidise employers who pay poverty wages to people who work long hours. No longer will we have to subsidise families who have the dignity of going to work, but then have to suffer the indignity of signing on to make up for their poverty wages.

Many of us sat up all evening listening to the debate, some of us participating in it. Many of the lowest-paid workers throughout the country work night shifts. One night shift in the House is an evening and morning well spent if, at the end, the scourge of poverty pay is ended for hundreds of thousands of people in every town and city throughout the country.

Mr. Hammond: One issue with which Ministers would have no difficulty in agreeing is that we have had an extensive debate on the Bill over the past few weeks. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) summed up very eloquently the concerns we still have at the end of that debate.

The Government will, of course, get their Bill through; there has never been any doubt about that. That ought to be the end of story, but, because of the unusual structure of the Bill, there will be yet another chapter in the saga when the Low Pay Commission reports and Ministers come back to the House with the regulations, which, for the first time, will allow us to understand what the Bill means in substance. Those regulations will put flesh on the skeleton that is all we have before us at the moment.

The debate has been quite extraordinary. Although it has been extensive, the key piece of information has been missing—the piece that we all need to make any sense of the Bill. It is only when we obtain that vital piece of information—what the rate is to be—that we will be able to understand at last what the national minimum wage legislation really means.

Despite the Minister's uncharacteristically churlish opening remarks, the debate in Committee and on Report has, to a large extent, been good natured. Often, it has been constructive, and there has been a good deal of consensus across the Committee and the Floor of the House. Given that we stated on Second Reading our principled objection to the legislation, our objective in Committee was to try to improve the Bill. I hope that the Minister will accept that, if we have not always agreed, we have at least attempted to be constructive, and to suggest areas of concern as we have seen them in the practical operation of Bill.

The issues of principled objection remain, as well as many practical concerns about the detailed operation of the Act. We are convinced that the Bill will cost jobs, fuel inflation and damage public services. The degree of damage can be assessed and debated only when we have the vital missing pieces of information. Assuming that the Secretary of State accepts the Low Pay Commission's recommendations and puts them before the House in the form of regulations, we will finally have a chance to debate the issue on a fully informed basis. That debate may be more substantive than the debate that we have had over the past 100 or so hours, including proceedings in Committee and on Report.

I have been very brief, as is my wont. If I may, I would like to steal one of the Minister's favourite expressions. I do not feel that I am about to be parted from the National Minimum Wage Bill. It is more a case of au revoir, because I am sure that we will be visiting it again when the regulations come before us.

Mr. Healey: This Bill was badly needed, and is long overdue. It brings Britain into line—finally—with other modern economies, and gives us for the first time a national minimum wage. To borrow a well-worn phrase, the Bill is tough on low pay, and tough on the causes of low pay. The Bill will stop cowboy companies driving down wages and driving down standards in other workplaces. There is a strong correlation between low pay and low staff morale and motivation. There is a strong correlation between low pay and high rates of staff turnover. There is a strong correlation between low pay and low levels of training. Moreover, there is no future for this country in competing with the world's worst economies, when we must compete with the best.

For my constituents, the Bill may well be the most important piece of legislation we pass this Parliament. In Rotherham, between 1981 and 1991, we lost 12,000 coal and steel jobs, and gained 9,000 service sector jobs. Our employment structure and pay structure changed. Our economy is increasingly characterised by low-paid, part-time and temporary work.

Last year's jobcentre survey showed that half of all full-time vacancies paid less than £4 an hour, and that one in 10 paid less than £3 an hour. One man was so incensed by what he saw at the jobcentre that he ripped away one of the jobcentre cards and brought it to my surgery. It gave details of a £1.85-an-hour, six-day-week job for a security guard. [HON. MEMBERS: "Shame."] Those trends are mirrored throughout the country and the economy.

The aim of the Bill is simple: to achieve a universal national minimum wage. That principle was reiterated throughout the time in Committee, in the face of a stream of amendments tabled by Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members, seeking to punch holes in that principle. They wanted variations by region, by sector and by occupation. They wanted variations by size of firm. The principle of a universal national minimum wage was reinforced tonight on Report, not least by the amendments we passed to prevent employers from penalising or dismissing employees as they move toward eligibility for minimum wage protection.

Many of my hon. Friends have worked in the employment field. We are familiar with those hire-and-fire employers who have been given freer and freer rein throughout the 1980s and early 1990s. We are familiar with their practice of firing people, days or weeks before they complete two years of employment and become entitled to protection from unfair dismissal. That is why the amendments on which we voted tonight were so important: they reinforced the basic principle of the Bill.

I look forward to the publication of the Low Pay Commission report in May. I am disappointed by the grudging recognition that Conservative Members have given to the work of the commission, which has done a thorough job, and will produce an authoritative set of recommendations. Conservative Members miss the point: the Low Pay Commission is part of an important policy and political process, which they fail to understand.

The Bill is a tribute to the Minister—and his work in opposition and in government—because he, and the Government, have moved employers to accept the principle of the national minimum wage, and then to become involved in helping to prepare plans to implement it, preparing the consensus on which the Bill and legislation relating to it must be based. That is why, in Committee, Conservative Members were bereft of the critical briefings and draft amendments that they might have expected, especially from employers' organisations.

Unions, too, have moved. They have moved to accept that a fixed formula is not the way ahead. They have moved to accept that they also must become involved in helping to prepare plans and achieve a consensus for the Bill's implementation. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order.

Mr. Healey: Those Conservative Members are the last of Britain's pressure groups that are unable to come to terms with the principle of the national minimum wage. They cannot come to terms with the fact that public opinion has left them behind. After 86 hours—

Mrs. Laing rose—

Mr. Healey: After 86 hours in Committee and 15 hours on Report, I want to see the end of the national minimum wage being kicked around as a political football. I want to see the beginning of the national minimum wage as a permanent feature of the British economy as we move into the next millennium.

7.54 am

Mr. Lansley: After participating in the lengthy Standing Committee and the Report stage, I am grateful for the opportunity to say a few words on Third Reading.

I am glad that the Minister of State is here, because I suspect that he is a little like Queen Mary Tudor: that, when he departs—I pray many years hence—and they open him up, instead of "Calais", they will find "national minimum wage" written on his heart, so profound has been his commitment to it. I fear that, in the long run, like Queen Mary Tudor, he is committed to a lost cause. He may fight over it for generations, but in the long run he will lose it.

I did not get a chance to speak on Second Reading. Way back then, I thought that I would put my points in the debate, but would be willing to listen. The points that I intended to make were, first, that the academic evidence suggests that the minimum wage costs jobs, and, secondly, that it hits the unskilled and those without training and skills the hardest. The minimum wage does not merely set a floor—it is a floor with edges, and people fall off it. Some people are lifted up by it, but others fall off.

All those arguments came up in Committee, but time and again, rather than an attempt to respond with evidence and argument, all we had from Labour Members were assertions and bluster. They voted for the minimum wage, and they must have it. The terracotta army has been given its orders. It will march in the direction of the national minimum wage and do what it has to by the mandate presented to it, but not on the basis of evidence.

What deeply depressed me was that, from the point of view of the Government, the heart of the matter was that they wanted to lift people out of poverty by introducing the national minimum wage, yet the evidence from the Institute for Fiscal Studies and others was clear—that the minimum wage is a bad device to alleviate poverty. Often, it is directed not towards those in the lowest income groups, but towards the thousands of working partners, who are in households that are not particularly poor. The benefit of the minimum wage is greatest for the middle deciles by income, not the lowest. The beneficial effects that Ministers have suggested the national minimum wage would have on poverty simply are not there.

Ministers could have accepted that in Committee, and said that they wanted to make the minimum wage work better. They could have seriously debated the rate and, for example, home and agency workers, where there are abuses. Conservative Members recognise that abuses are committed by certain employers which have to be dealt with, and we engaged in that debate. However, Ministers would not provide information on which a serious debate could take place. Throughout, it was suggested that the minimum wage could be set at £3.50, £4 or £4.50. Who was to know where it was to be set? We introduced amendments designed to set a ceiling on the level, but the Government would not accept them.

Now the Government argue that business organisations accept the national minimum wage. I have represented business organisations, and I can tell the House that they accept that the Government are going to have their Bill—just as Conservative Members know they will. At the risk of repeating myself from another debate—it applies here just the same—

Mr. Jim Fitzpatrick (Poplar and Canning Town): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lansley: No, because time is short—[Laughter.] As the hon. Gentleman knows, in 100 hours I gave way every time anyone asked me. In Committee, his colleagues were told never to give way. I remember the number of times that I stood up and had to sit down again because they would not give way.

I must tell the Minister that, just because Labour Members kow-tow to the emperor, that does not mean that he is wearing any clothes. When the time comes, he will see. It will not be a pretty sight—we will find that the Minister wears no clothes.

7.59 am

Mr. Boswell: I may have spent 100 hours in Committee and on Report closely associated with the Minister, but he leads me irresistibly to think of Lenin, who asked the essential question, "Who, whom?" Even given the time that we have spent in our deliberations, some very important questions have not been answered—Ministers have fallen over backwards to avoid answering them. We have been told no national minimum wage rate, no details of the coverage of remuneration, no specification of pay reference periods and no details of the mechanism of uprating. At the end of 100 hours, we simply do not know the answers.

Every time that there has been a difficulty—for example, as recently as the one in the debate on honoraria—the matter is referred magically to the Low Pay Commission. The Government have been a blend of Lenin and the fairy godmother.

Mr. Fitzpatrick: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Boswell: No, I shall not give way, as I have a number of points to make and I have been giving way for 100 hours.

The Government have not been able to run away from the overall economic difficulties that will arise because of the Bill. The Confederation of British Industry has continued to point out that, even if the rate was set as low as £3 an hour, there would be problems if differentials were not compressed. It is also concerned about record keeping and the reversal of the burden of proof.

Such concerns are echoed especially in the more vulnerable parts of the private sector—hospitalities, charities, horticulture and remote businesses and industries. Less explicitly, concerns have also been expressed about the impact on the public sector, particularly caring.

At the end of this amazing process we are left, as others have said, with Hamlet without the prince—we still have not elicited that elusive rate. We have at least secured the publication of the Government's advice to the Low Pay Commission, although not until 600 other bodies and individuals had given it evidence. We do not have Hamlet, but we do have the first grave-digger.

It would have been much better if the Low Pay Commission—given that the Government were going to create it anyway—had been invited to take evidence, deliberate and report. Ministers could have decided at what rate they wanted the minimum wage to be set and the other details—which will eventually have to be put into regulations—and then brought them to the House as the full monty, for a proper set of debates.

Instead, the Bill has been conducted most extraordinarily. In Committee, we debated the sittings motion on the first day, but we did not sit on the following Thursday afternoon. The week after that, one debate was curtailed when Labour Members moved the closure, which the Opposition voted against, as we wanted to debate the Bill. Then the Afrika Korps rolled into town and tried to steamroll the Bill overnight. Labour Members should have known that my hon. Friends were made of sterner stuff. They had many points of substance to raise and, my goodness, they raised them.

Given that the Bill seemed only to be an enabling Bill, it is amazing that it has had to be so heavily amended—by both the Opposition and the Government. It would have been much wiser to have allowed more time for the remaining stages.

I have learnt in Committee and on Report that, in addition to the general economic case against the Bill, which has been so well deployed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), we have been left with enhanced worries about the way in which the Bill will operate in practice. My hon. Friends and I are still extremely unhappy about how it will affect charities, although the provisions are now considerably better than those that were first proposed. We are deeply disappointed about therapeutic earnings. We remain concerned about record keeping, enforcement and penalties. The Agricultural Wages Board is left with a gross untidiness, and there is real anxiety about double employments, well exemplified by Mr. McSporran of Gigha, who had 14 jobs at once.

There is real concern about spouse employments. Governments are ill advised to start regulating the economic or any other relations between spouses. There is uncertainty about the commission. Above all, there is uncertainty about whether the under-26s will have a lower rate or a training rate and whether others will join them.

All that uncertainty arises because of the complexity of a modern economy, to which the Government have not alerted themselves. There are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in their philosophy. The Government have tried to fit a modern economy into a narrow and constricting mould.

Of course there is a political attraction for Ministers in choosing one rate. If only the real world were so simple. The Government are learning. First, they had to exempt the armed forces. There has been no explicit information, but it is clear that they have completely filleted the Bill. By destroying its universality, they have destroyed its integrity.

The essential moral equivocation of the Bill, which we pointed out in the very first Committee sitting, remains and will remain at least until the rate is stated and any exemptions or lower rates for the under-26s are revealed.

The choice is simple. If the national minimum wage is set at a safe rate dictated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it will not make much difference. The result will be political disillusionment among Labour Members. It would have been far better to adopt the Opposition's approach of a minimum income.

If, alternatively, the minimum wage is set at a high rate—say £4 an hour or more, which would still be well below the £4.60 that would be consistent with Labour's previous election pledge—it will damage significant sectors of the economy, including, for example, the care sector and tourism, which are great generators of jobs. Through the effect on differentials, it will run the risk of cranking up wage-cost inflation. The evidence from

[Mr. Boswell]

Incomes Data Services only this week is that it is already doing so. All that is the natural result of a Government whose policies are driven by soundbites: the louder they sound, the more their policies turn out to bite. Ministers have, throughout this extraordinary consideration of the Bill, been strong on rhetoric and weak on answers. The damage to jobs comes later.

We have been implacably opposed to the Bill all along. We sought, and modestly achieved, certain improvements in Committee, but we remain implacably opposed to the Bill and will shortly have the pleasure of voting to decline it a Third Reading. There it is.

8.7 am

Mrs. Roche: As I said consistently in Committee and throughout this evening, we have had a full and interesting debate. It is good that we can do so. I must, however, say to the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), for whom I have some regard, that his last gesture, in throwing down a copy of the Bill, was petulant.

The Conservative party has learnt nothing and forgotten nothing. It has not learnt the lessons of 1 May. It has not learnt that the policy of a national minimum wage is deeply popular. The Conservatives say that they want no minimum wage—yet. They say that they want a high-wage economy—but not yet. They say that they want economic efficiency and partnership—but not yet.

I am extremely and eternally grateful to the team who have worked with us in Committee to bring about the national minimum wage. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will agree that it has been one of the great experiences of our parliamentary lives to work with such a wonderful and dedicated team and to have the support of our right hon. and hon. Friends this evening.

Conservative Members may sneer but, for all Labour Members, this Bill is why we came into politics, why we joined the Labour party and why we are proud to be part of this Government.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I join other hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend and her team on the work they have done on this important Bill. She mentioned teamwork, but has she received any information about the attitude of the Scottish and Welsh nationalists to the Bill? I have not seen them tonight. Do they support the Bill?

Mrs. Roche: I am deeply disappointed that the Scottish and Welsh nationalists are not here, because the Bill will introduce a national minimum wage that will bring great benefits throughout the United Kingdom.

I wish to emphasise the intention behind the Bill, in case anybody is still mystified. The Bill is part of the Government's overall employment relations strategy, which aims to encourage greater adaptability at work, a greater sense of partnership in the workplace and decent minimum standards of fairness at work for all, enforceable in law. In our Third Reading debate this evening, we have heard passionate contributions—I make no apology for describing them as passionate—from my hon. Friends the Members for Lincoln (Gillian Merron), for Gravesham (Mr. Pond), for Eastwood (Mr. Murphy) and for Wentworth (Mr. Healey), who all talked from their experience about what poverty wages mean to the men and women whom they represent.

What have we heard from the Conservatives? We have heard the same old stories. They made the same arguments that they made when equal pay for women was debated. They claimed that equal pay legislation would mean a reduction in jobs for women. In reality, women's employment increased overall. The Conservative party has learnt nothing and forgotten nothing, and that is typical.

The Conservatives have told us that small firms will suffer. They are so unambitious for the small firms in our country which do so much work for our economic wealth. The Conservatives deem small firms second class, but the small firms will not forget what they have done. The Conservatives were rejected by the small firms. Indeed, the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), who speaks on small firms for the Opposition, has said that her party had failed to make the arguments. She also said, with admirable honesty, that the Conservatives would produce no policy on small firms in the future because they had got it so wrong in the run-up to the election. Why should we listen to them?

The minimum wage has both a business and a social justification. If I may borrow a phrase from my hon. Friend the Minister of State, it is an idea whose time has come. The Bill has the simple aim of providing a wage floor, set by the Government, below which workers cannot be paid. That is a simple idea, but it has thrown up a vast number of issues—as the length of our debates bears witness.

Mr. Fitzpatrick: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way, especially as two Conservative Members had opportunities to give way but declined them. I can only imagine that that is a measure of their last-ditch efforts to defend the previous Administration's policy of creating a low-skill, low-wage economy in this country. Does my hon. Friend agree that this policy is central to our new Government's social exclusion policy which will treat British workers with dignity? The creation of a national minimum wage is long overdue. It is testimony to the difference between Conservative Members, who treated the British people with contempt—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not attempt to make a speech on an intervention.

Mrs. Roche: I understand well the points that my hon. Friend made. What Aunt Sallies the Conservative party has put up. The hon. Member for Daventry—this was not worthy of him—was worried that there were terrible enforcement measures. Where did they come from? They are, of course, based on previous enforcement provisions enacted by the Government in which he served as a Minister, as did the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood). They said nothing about draconian enforcement then. The Conservative party has learnt nothing and forgotten nothing.

I look forward to the progress of the Bill in another place. We will watch its deliberations. I remain confident that there will be a good debate there, despite the confusion and complications spread by the Opposition. The minimum wage is above all a practical measure designed to deliver to the people we represent. It is about people who are held down and treated unfairly. It is about company managers who need, and wish, to be free from the fear that a competitor will undercut them by recruiting a desperate labour force. The Conservative party's opposition to the Bill shows how out of touch it is with business. The Bill is a practical, hard-headed business measure, but it is practicality and hard-headedness with justice and fairness thrown in.

When the Bill becomes an Act, as it surely will, it will take its proper place alongside the other landmark legislation introduced by previous Labour Administrations. When my political life and awareness began, I looked at those past Labour Administrations with great admiration. They influenced my young life. This will take second place only to the setting up by a Labour Government of the national health service, whose anniversary we will celebrate this year. What more fitting tribute than to wish the Bill's passage well. I commend it to the House.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With permission, I shall put together the Questions on the three motions.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

Urban Development

That the draft London Docklands Development Corporation (Transfer of Functions) Order 1998, which was laid before this House on 21st January, be approved.

That the Urban Development Corporations in England (Area and Constitution) Order 1998, dated 19th January 1998, a copy of which was laid before this House on 27th January, be approved.

Local Government

That the draft Local Authorities (Transport Charges) Regulations 1998, which were laid before this House on 9th February, be approved.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

Question agreed to.

Road Traffic Reduction (United Kingdom Targets) Bill [Money]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Road Traffic Reduction (United Kingdom Targets) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any expenses of the Secretary of State which are attributable to the Act.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

8.28 am

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): The next few items on the Order Paper are important, and the House will want to give them proper consideration. They are money resolutions and Ways and Means resolutions following from private Members' Bills. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Would right hon. and hon. Members who are not staying to listen to the debate please leave as quickly and as quietly as possible out of courtesy to the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth)?

Mr. Forth: These matters require to be considered by the House. They are in no sense automatic or trivial. There is an increasing trend for private Members' Bills to give rise to the expenditure of a large amount of taxpayers' money. That would be bad enough, but a trend that is well exemplified by the measure before the House is also contained in the following measures, as we shall see when we examine them.

Clause 3 of the Road Traffic Reduction (United Kingdom Targets) Bill states:

"There shall be paid out of money provided by Parliament any expenses incurred by the Secretary of State under or by virtue of this Act."

That is the clue to what we are being asked to do in this measure as in other measures relating to, let us remember, private Members' Bills. We are being asked to sign a blank cheque, and we are given no estimate of the amount that will require to be expended in pursuance of this private Member's Bill.

We must get some idea from the Minister of how much of the money is already being spent in the Department on the items that are covered by the Bill. I suspect that some of them are fairly easy to justify. Clause 2(3)(a) refers to "emissions of greenhouse gases;" those are almost certainly dealt with already within the Department. However, it might be useful for us to be given some idea of the cost of that. Similarly, other items in clause 2 such as "effects on air quality" are probably already covered. Clause 2(3)(c)refers to "effects on health". That is a broad category and we must know more about it.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, as in the matter of greenhouse gases, which covers many strands of policy, the health issue will cover not only the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, but the Department of Health? Would not it be appropriate to have a Health Minister in the House to explain in detail the extent of the overlap, what it costs and how it is administered?

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that matter. I intended to deal with it later, but I shall deal with it now because it gives rise to a problem. Perhaps there is a defect in the money resolution arising from the issue that my hon. Friend raises. The money resolution states:

"for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Road Traffic Reduction (United Kingdom Targets) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any expenses of the Secretary of State".

I assume that that means the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, because that is the logical conclusion, but, perhaps as a result of the items in the Bill that give rise to the money resolution, other Secretaries of State may be required to spend extra money in pursuance of the Bill's requirements.

Perhaps the money resolution is defective in that regard or inadequate. I assume that the reference in the money resolution is to the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, but perhaps the Minister will clarify that. We need to be reassured that if the Bill becomes an Act, all the items will somehow be covered by just one Department and one Secretary of State. In that case, to refer again to my hon. Friend's point, how can the effect on health be properly dealt with by the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions without any contribution by the Secretary of State for Health?

Clause 2(3)(d) is probably simpler than those to which I have referred because it refers simply to "congestion". I assume that that is not a bodily congestion, which might be a health matter, but traffic congestion, although it does not say that. We are being asked to accept that the Secretary of State will prepare a report on the adverse impact of road traffic congestion. That is a complex matter, and perhaps it has already been dealt with in the Department. The House will wish to know from the Minister about each of these headings and about how far the Department is already dealing with these matters.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): My right hon. Friend is on an important point. My county council, for example, has ascertained that the second largest cause of traffic congestion is the journey to school. One of the consequences of that is that the council is seriously considering policy changes that will directly affect the budget of its local education authority. Therefore, the money resolution may be defective in that, as far as I can see, it makes no reference to costs falling on other Government Departments as a direct consequence of the attempt to reduce congestion.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He has again anticipated what I was going to say. I am obviously so predictable—

Mr. Soames: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I draw your attention to the hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie), the Deputy Chief Whip, who is forcing Labour Members to leave the Chamber against their wishes, like underpaid and underfed sheepdogs? Do you agree that this legislation is important and deserves the scrutiny of the House? The hon. Member seems to think that, merely by driving new Members who are keen to please him out of the Chamber, that will stop my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) and me examining in some detail the issues that are before us. I tell the Deputy Chief Whip that it will not alter the position in any way if we have to speak to an empty House, except for the admirable and distinguished Minister. We will go on speaking because we believe that this is worthy of examination.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Whether hon. Members remain in the Chamber is not a matter for the occupant of the Chair.

Mr. Soames: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is a serious point. It is not whether hon. Members remain or not, but whether they are being told to leave the Chamber by the Deputy Chief Whip. He went up to them and said, "Go," and a very obedient group of ladies who were keen to please him left with their tails between their legs. Is that not monstrous?

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As someone who has just come into the Chamber because of the matter that we are discussing, may I put it on the record that I have sat with my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie), the Deputy Chief Whip, and he said nothing of the sort? May I make it clear that those of us who, unlike the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames), to my knowledge, have sat through all the proceedings of the Bill—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I repeat: this is not a matter for the occupant of the Chair. This is a brief debate and I suggest that we proceed with it.

Mr. Forth: Indeed. I do not want to prolong my remarks because many of my hon. Friends wish to make a contribution, about which I am glad. My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) had anticipated the point that I wished to cover and it is important. I was going to skip forward to clause 2(3)(g), which has the heading "other social impacts", which is the broadest possible term that one can imagine.

I have worked out that one of the aims of road traffic reduction must inevitably involve the item that has come to cause so much congestion: the transport of young children to school by their parents, which is an important part of traffic. If the Bill, were it to become an Act, will reduce that element, those children will have to get to school somehow. My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent has made a crucial point.

Mr. Soames: To follow up the point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe), by extension, there is no reference anywhere in the money resolution to the apportionment of money that will be required to undertake the survey. Clearly, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions has its own mechanisms for doing traffic surveys. It will, I am sure, subcontract them to county and district councils. Surely in this case, councils will need to be repaid for their work in subcontracting that business from the Department.

Will my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) turn his mind to that and also tell us what he believes will be the impact on the Bill of European legislation on greenhouse gases?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend makes very important points. One of them, certainly in the context of the money resolution, is how far we can identify the costs arising from the Bill's requirements—that is the first question that must be answered. The second involves the apportionment of the costs not only across several Government Departments, but, as we have now identified, across local government. As my hon. Friend said, local government may well be involved in the surveys to underpin the reports that will be required under the Bill.

It has also been pointed out that additional transport costs may well fall on local authorities that have to transport to school children who would otherwise be taken by their parents, but who will be discouraged from doing so if the Bill becomes law.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): As the money resolution leaves everything to the Secretary of State, and given the Government's propensity to give more money to urban than to rural authorities, is it not likely that money will be taken from rural authorities and given to urban authorities? Yet rural authorities have a much greater need to transport children long distances, by road, to school.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend makes a crucial point. One of the difficulties—I was about to say nonsenses, but I will say difficulties at this stage—inherent in the whole business of a seductive-sounding Bill to make further provision for road traffic reduction targets, is that if the targets are to be meaningful, they will have to be highly discriminatory between rural and urban traffic, to use the broadest possible terms.

The targets would have to identify the elements of traffic that were to be reduced in an ideal world, according to the sponsors of the Bill. That requires a high level of differentiation which I think will be difficult, and therefore expensive and complex. Following on from that will be all the implications of the flows of finance across Departments, from the Government down to local authorities, in an undoubtedly discriminatory way. The Bill would be used to justify a further skewing of support for local authorities away from rural areas, where the congestion is almost certainly less—although we do not know that yet because the surveys have not been carried out—and towards the urban areas.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) made a crucial point, which illustrated the extent to which an apparently seductive and attractive Bill, to which many hon. Members wanted to attach their names because it sounded so good—

Mr. Soames: My right hon. Friend has, as usual, and in his own seductive way, got to the core, the heart, indeed the nub of the Bill. This Bill commands considerable support. I have received a large number of letters from my constituents in favour of it. I do not know whether my right hon. Friend has had the same experience.

However, what we are seeking to do is not something that may or may not be popular, in public terms, in relation to what may or may not be a good piece of legislation. It is our job to analyse the money resolution and decide whether it goes totus porcus. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, within the money resolution, there should be—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. That intervention is far too long.

Mr. Forth: I think that I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he said. I hope that he will try to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to expand on the interesting concept that he has just introduced to the debate. Perhaps the term that he has just used leads us on to the question of biodiversity. I suspect that it does. I am not sure that I know what biodiversity means, and I certainly do not know what it means in the context of the Bill.

We are being asked to vote money to support a Bill that tasks the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to produce a report involving targets for the effect of traffic on land and biodiversiy. That goes rather wide of what any of us might have imagined would be in a Road Traffic Reduction (United Kingdom Targets) Bill.

I can understand references to greenhouse gases or to the European context, to which we must return later. I can also understand references to air quality, health, congestion, danger to other road users and other social impacts—under which I had intended to deal with the point about schools. However, I really am struggling when it comes to understanding "land and biodiversity".

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): Will my right hon. Friend allow me?

Mr. Forth: Yes, of course.

Mr. Maclean: As one of those who was at Rio and negotiated the original treaty, I can say that biodiversity is the wealth of our wildlife. My right hon. Friend will be aware that, in the context of this Bill, less wildlife would be squashed by car tyres if there were less traffic on country roads. I assume that that is the meaning of that provision in the Bill.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. I thought that he might come to my rescue on the matter. However, in helping me, he has given rise to another thought: yet again in one word—biodiversity—is contained implications that, one might well imagine, could lead to considerable costs in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions in working out how many items of squashed wildlife were involved, to provide a target, or the implications of targeting, for the Bill's broad purposes.

Mr. Rowe: My right hon. Friend may be unaware that when my hon. Friend the former Member for Basingstoke—Sir David Mitchell—was a Transport Minister, one of the achievements of which he was proudest was his authorisation of construction of underpasses for some of the busiest roads in Britain, to enable hedgehogs, badgers and otters to cross roads. The cost was absolutely enormous. It may well be that, in trying to protect our nation's biodiversity, we are being asked to sign an enormous cheque.

Ms Walley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. No Opposition spokesman is on the Opposition Front Bench, as Opposition Front Benchers are absolutely dissociating themselves from this farce.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Forth: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we are debating private Members' legislation. It is therefore entirely appropriate that the House, as a collection of private Members, should consider the Bill, which is exactly what we are doing.

At this point, I shall have to introduce a tiny element of discord into my comments—which I shall soon draw to a close, as I suspect that colleagues would like to speak. I am not sure that I agree with the comments just made by my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent—but only to the extent that he assumes that the Bill's provisions might give rise to a need to provide more tunnels for hedgehogs to cross roads so that they are not squashed. I understand his reasoning, but I approach the matter from a different angle, and am perhaps keeping more faith with the Bill.

The Bill states that we want to attempt to reduce traffic, which will be done through targets, reports, surveys and investigations. We may consequently reduce the need for hedgehog tunnels under roads to the extent that traffic is reduced, as there would be less risk of hedgehogs suffering from traffic. I therefore have to disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent, but only in that respect.

Mr. Soames: Is my hon. Friend aware that the National Federation of Badger Groups—the groups exist across the country—is one of the prime sources of information—[Laughter.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that we are debating a serious matter.

Mr. Forth: It is a very serious matter, and I can only assume that, in his comments, my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) is taking me back to biodiversity. His comments also dealt with the comments made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean). Furthermore, I suspect that there is probably the odd squashed badger and hedgehog to attest to the truth of my hon. Friend's comments.

Mr. Soames: I was trying to make a serious point. The National Federation of Badger Groups, which is the architect of much of the work that was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe), would be able to help the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) in her task. The groups are manned by volunteers who love badgers, and who would be quite prepared to do such a count for free.

Nevertheless, does my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) agree that the type of research work that will have to be done to get a detailed feel for the total impact of traffic congestion on wildlife, let alone on human beings, would be an extremely costly measure, and that that cost should be far more clearly stated in an order?

Mr. Forth: Of course my hon. Friend is right. Let me, however, draw his attention to a provision in clause 2(2):

"The Secretary of State is not obliged to specify targets . . . if he considers that other targets, or other measures, are more appropriate for the purpose of reducing the adverse impacts of road traffic".

That would worry me somewhat, but subsection (2) goes on to say:

"but in that case the report must explain his reasoning and include an assessment of the impact of the other targets or other measures on road traffic reduction."

In some ways, I am encouraged by that. At least it provides a degree of flexibility in the Bill, which I am sure that we all welcome. But it opens up the prospect of further costs, because the work involved in examining whether "targets or other measures" are involved will be considerable.

Mr. Sayeed: I shall be delighted if I can save my right hon. Friend from being badgered by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames).

May I ask my right hon. Friend a serious question? There is no specification about the amount of money involved. We are not told where it will come from. Is there not a considerable danger that, in such a money measure, the money will be taken from other very necessary and very admirable causes?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend makes an important point, which underpins the debate and gives me an opportunity to wind up my remarks.

We are being asked the same thing, not just here but in subsequent business that we must submit to the same degree of scrutiny. We are being asked it for the same reason. In all these cases, a private Member's Bill, having been passed, is submitted to a money motion—something which, as I recall, rarely occurred some years ago, but is now a matter of routine because nearly all private Members' Bills seem to involve considerable expenditure.

We are asked to nod such motions through, because they come after the main business and are assumed to be matters in which we should not take much interest. But—for the reason given by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire—we should take at least as much interest in them as we do in most other matters. They involve the expenditure of taxpayers' money, and therefore may well involve—if we believe the Chancellor's claim that he will keep a tight rein on public expenditure as a whole—our old friend "choices and priorities".

My hon. Friend is right. Given that the Bill may become an Act and impose on this Secretary of State—or several Secretaries of State—additional expenditure, we really must know what other items of expenditure will be forgone by the Government in order to give effect to its provisions. Until I am much more satisfied than I am now, I am loth to give my consent.

8.52 am

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): I wish, very briefly, to support the views expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth).

My mind goes back to the days when my party was in power. In those days, Bob Cryer and the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) always contested money motions, to the great advantage of the House of Commons. Even after a long sitting to which a number of hon. Members on both sides of the House have contributed, we should not necessarily give the nod to a measure just because it is 8.50 am, and let a money motion sail through the House.

One of the most distinguished things about Bob Cryer—in a long and not undistinguished parliamentary career—was his devastating ability, on almost every Bill, to speak fluently for up to 45 minutes. I always used to stay to listen to him, because he was so good at what he did. He was a pleasure to hear, and I for one miss him greatly. I am delighted that he sent the House such a fine wife and such a splendid son, and I am surprised not to see them here this morning. The hon. Member for Bolsover assures me that Bob Cryer's son is a chip off the old block, and I am disappointed that he is not here to support us this morning in holding this high-handed, arrogant, big-headed Government to account.

The main points that I want to make about the motion are connected with public expenditure, as one would expect, and particularly, with clause 2(3), which states:

"In preparing the report the Secretary of State shall have regard to the adverse impacts of road traffic, including" paragraphs (a) to (g). As my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst said, they are extremely onerous charges, particularly with regard to the impact of emissions of greenhouse gases, given the appalling road traffic congestion.

In my constituency of Mid-Sussex and in my old constituency of Crawley, some of the roads running through that very prosperous and beautiful part of the world are, as the Minister knows, absolutely jammed solid every morning.

Mr. Rowe: My hon. Friend may be unaware of one of the interesting elements of social impact as, only relatively recently, Age Concern informed me that something like 60 per cent. of women above a certain age have never had a driving licence. As the Government are preoccupied with social exclusion, gender equality and so on, it must be within their targets to enable women who are excluded by the absence of a driving licence to have one. That suggests that there should be more rather than fewer cars. Therefore, the requirement in the Bill that every year the Secretary of State should publish a report aimed at looking at the social impact of traffic reduction would have to take that into account, too. It would have to be wide-ranging and potentially very expensive.

Mr. Soames: My hon. Friend is completely right. Such a project would indeed be onerous.

I am a 90s man. I am equipped, chiselled and born to be part of the cutting edge of the 1990s. As we move towards the millennium, I feel very much part of contemporary times, but even I do not feel that it is right, and nor do I have the courage, to speculate as to why fewer women than men have driving licences. It would not be sensible for a Conservative Member to do that.

I have my own theories, but I could not repeat them in the House of Commons. Nevertheless, the survey proposed by my hon. Friend would be extremely costly.

The effects on air quality represent vast possible expense. My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) was a delegate at the Rio convention. Because of my admiration for him and my dedication to conservation and the preservation of wildlife, I have always carried around with me a little piece of paper that my right hon. Friend gave me with the Rio declaration printed on its centre pages.

I am sure that some of my hon. Friends remember our late lamented colleague, the former Member for Watford, now Lord Garel-Jones, who sadly, was translated into another place. We all remember that he used to carry around in his pocket a list of the cads in my party who voted against various pieces of Government legislation. I do not do that. I am a 90s man. I carry round in my pocket the Rio declaration. Some of my hon. Friends will find that very strange. They will think, "What is that fellow Soames carrying around? He is not into eating bats' droppings and stuff. He is a proper person." However, I carry around the Rio declaration. I would urge the Minister to study the Rio declaration with care if she intends to bring before the House of Commons onerous legislation that imposes the most extraordinary and expensive demands on God knows who. We are not told who will pay for any of it.

Mr. Sayeed: The taxpayer.

Mr. Soames: Yes, but we are not told which taxpayer. We are not told whether it will be the county council, the district council or central Government. How will the county councils be repaid? How will the National Federation of Badger Groups be reimbursed for all its work?

Mr. Forth: I can help my hon. Friend. The resolution says:

"it is expedient"—

ha, ha—

"to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any expenses of the Secretary of State which are attributable to the Act."

Members of Parliament are being asked to sign a blank cheque for the Secretary of State, which may carry tax implications for all citizens, to support the rather greeny aspirations of the Bill.

Mr. Soames: We certainly are. My right hon. Friend is correct. We are signing a blank cheque. Clause 2(3)(a) to (g) shows enormous potential costs. The clause says:

"In preparing the report, the Secretary of State shall have regard to the adverse impacts of road traffic, including" the measures listed in paragraphs (a) to (g).

Principle one of the Rio declaration is:

"Human beings are at the centre of concerns for sustainable development."

Who could disagree with such a splendid aspiration? Sentence two is:

"They are entitled to a healthy and productive life in harmony with nature."

Living in harmony with nature in 1998 is not cheap. Most of us do not live in harmony with nature. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst lives in harmony with nature. My right hon. Friend the Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark) certainly does—he is an expert, a champion of wildlife and conservation and a forward-thinking conservator. My hon. Friend—what is your seat, Chope?

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): Christchurch.

Mr. Soames: My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) is a living example of someone who lives in harmony with nature, but it is not cheap. The list in the Bill includes emissions of greenhouse gases, effects on air quality and effects on health. When we consider the vast number of illnesses known to be caused by traffic congestion and the awful build-up of pollution and smog, we have to ask how the Secretary of State, in conjunction with the Department of Health, will pull together all the statistics. Will that not be a hugely costly operation?

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Does my hon. Friend agree that, while nobody could fail to support the main thrust of the Bill, the problem is in clause 3? It says that

"There shall be paid out of money provided by Parliament any expenses incurred by the Secretary of State under or by virtue of the Act."

My local authority could have duties placed on it by the Secretary of State. It is having a 12 per cent. increase in council tax this year—three times the rate of inflation. Because of the lack of detail on who will pick up the tab on each of the requirements of the Bill, it could be extremely expensive.

Mr. Soames: My hon. Friend raises an important point. There is just a whimper of opposition to us. No Labour Member is rising to debate the idea that the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions should be given a blank cheque—a blank cheque—at a time of great public expenditure restraint, to undertake a survey, which, in my judgment and that of my right hon. and hon. Friends, will cost millions of pounds.

The Minister will chastise those of us who have sought to give a little more examination to the issue, saying that we are mobbing the issue up. We are not. We are dealing with a very important question. In the old days, when Bob Cryer was in the House, every money resolution was examined, to the embarrassment of my Government, in the most formidable way, with support from other Labour Members. What do we hear today from the Labour poodles? There is not a word from the running dog lackeys of the Labour Whips. All we hear is silence. We could be in the Chinese assembly for all the riot and disorder that we are hearing. Look at them giggling and laughing. We hear not a word—not a word. They are cutting single-parent benefit; they are cutting here there and everywhere; they are sticking to the most vigorous and robust public expenditure policies, attainable only by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who laid the preparations for the Labour Government, which are so good that they are sticking to them. What do we hear from them: not a word on the prospect of the Secretary of State being given a blank cheque.

[Mr. Soames]

I hope that the Minister will, in a detailed exposition, set out with absolute clarity every penny that she expects to spend in the furtherance of this—I am sure—admirable private Member's Bill. The House has a right to know; the House needs to know—if we do not hold it to account, who will—how much the Bill will cost.

9.4 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Glenda Jackson): I trust that I will not disappoint the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames). I was not going to castigate him; I was going to sympathise with him.

The House has become used to the naked ambition that is invariably displayed by the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), whose desire to be restored to that cabinet of shadows is such that, at the behest of his Whips, he will walk into the House at any hour of the day or night to speak on any subject that they put in front of his nose with the same lack of seriousness of approach.

In this debate, we saw a move in the ambition stakes. We were privileged to see the first run of a new Little and Large—the Little and Large of the House of Commons—featuring the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst and the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex. I say with all generosity to both the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Gentleman that, although I appreciate their desire to entertain the House and their motives in paying absolutely no attention to an extremely serious Bill and the money resolution which the Bill requires before it can be put on the statute book, their act needs a great deal more rehearsal.

We were privileged to hear from Conservative Members a litany of disapproval of the money resolution, which is vital to a Bill which is surely vital to the country's health and well-being. The right hon. Members for Bromley and Chislehurst and for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) and the hon. Members for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe), for Mid-Sussex, for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) and for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) all stood up to express their deep concern about what they perceived to be a blank cheque in the money resolution on the Road Traffic Reduction (United Kingdom Targets) Bill. There was not one word from them on the costs that are already being incurred by the failure of their Administration for 18 long years to do anything about reducing road traffic or to introduce any policy which would have brought about some form of integrated transport.

Conservative Members are expressing concerns about the mayhem that is being wrought on wildlife, particularly in rural areas, yet they formed the Government who privatised buses, which reduced the services running in rural areas, and who privatised railways, which has reduced any kind of public transport in those areas virtually to nil or to that which is totally useless to the people who need it. One cannot say that one is surprised. As my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody)—regrettably, she is not in the Chamber—would say, their brass neck on any subject beggars belief.

The money resolution covers the eventuality of any expenses arising for the Secretary of State which are attributable to the Bill. Such expenses might include the cost of commissioning surveys. As the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis), the Bill's promoter, said on Second Reading:

"The economic costs of congestion are enormous—between £15 billion and £20 billion."

That figure is from the Confederation of British Industry. The hon. Gentleman went on:

"Maddison and Pearce put the cost higher than that in the study, 'The True Costs of Road Transport'".

The effect on health, which particularly concerned some Opposition Members, is also directly linked to an ever-increasing number of vehicles on our roads and the inevitable pollution of the air that we breathe.

Mr. Rowe: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wonder whether you have had any intimation from the promoter of the Bill that he would not be present when his Bill was being discussed. Is it not a normal courtesy of the House that, when something as important as the money resolution relating to a private Member's Bill is being discussed, the private Member whose Bill it is, is present?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair.

Ms Glenda Jackson: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am certain that the hon. Member for Ceredigion did not think that any Member of the House would speak against the money resolution. The Bill had all-party support. It has cross-party sponsorship. The Bill will bring massive improvements to the health and well-being of people in this country. [Interruption.] I have already pointed out to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley, who, from a sedentary position, said that he wished to know how much the money resolution would cost, that the existing cost to the country of congestion on our roads is estimated to be between £15 billion and £20 billion.

On Second Reading, the hon. Member for Ceredigion said:

"A recent Department of Health report says:

'We have clearly underestimated the true overall effects of air pollution.'"—[Official Report, 30 January 1998; Vol. 305, c. 622.]

Mr. Soames: I want the hon. Lady to break the habit of a lifetime and give a straightforward answer to the following question. She is asking the House of Commons to vote through on the nod a money resolution which says:

"There shall be paid out of money provided by Parliament any expenses incurred by the Secretary of State under or by virtue of this Act."

I understand that the hon. Lady regards it as an impertinence for anyone to question her about anything to do with the payment of public funds, but will she now tell the House how much the Bill will cost? That is the purpose of the debate. She has not been here very long; she is not familiar with the ways of the House. If she were familiar with them, she would not have started her speech in the impertinent manner that she did. Will she now answer the question—how much money is she inviting us to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is no need to personalise the debate in this way.

Ms Jackson: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I thought it was quite touching. The hon. Gentleman could not keep his own argument together. First, he asked whether I would break the habits of a lifetime; then he said that I had not been in this place very long. Then he said that I regarded requests from everyone as an impertinence. I say to him in all honesty, it is only his requests that I regard as an impertinence because his approach to the money resolution, and to the Bill, has been to attempt to treat the whole thing as a farce—indeed, to present himself as a farceur to the House. He may have the build for it, but he certainly does not have the timing.

There are concerns, some of which were expressed by Conservative Members, on the issue of health. The hon. Member for Ceredigion said on Second Reading that the Department of Health report says:

"the deaths of between 12,000 and 24,000 people a year are 'brought forward'" and that

"Children, the elderly and the poor suffer most."

He also said:

"According to Dr. Ian Roberts of the child health monitoring unit at Great Ormond Street Hospital for Sick Children, more than 6 million children are at risk because of the volume of traffic on our roads."—[Official Report, 30 January 1998; Vol. 305, c. 622-23.]

Mr. Forth: Instead of quoting the absent promoter of the Bill, will the Minister simply tell us whether she does, or does not, know how much the Bill would cost her Department were it to become an Act? It would help us enormously if we were given even that much information. If she could give us an estimated figure, that would be even more helpful, but if she simply told us, as a matter of open government, whether she knows what the Bill is likely to cost—

It being three quarters of an hour after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52 (Money resolutions and Ways and Means resolutions in connection with Bills):—

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Road Traffic Reduction (United Kingdom Targets) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any expenses of the Secretary of State which are attributable to the Act.

Shooters Hill Fire Station

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

9.24 am

Mr. Clive Efford (Eltham): I have waited nearly 12 hours to deliver my speech. Now that the deliberate attempts by Conservative Members to talk out this Adjournment debate have collapsed, we can get to the serious issue of the threatened closure of Shooters Hill fire station.

I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for the way in which he has approached the issue and for taking considerable time to discuss it with a delegation that came to his office to make representations against the closure. I recently received a letter from him that set out the criteria by which he will make his decision. He said that the matter had been widely publicised, that the authority had considered it properly, and that the fire service inspectorate had given its opinion that national standards of fire cover would be maintained. I have placed in the internal mail of the House 1,100 letters to my hon. Friend, collected over the weekend, to underline the strength of feeling on the issue in my constituency.

I hope to demonstrate through that correspondence and through this debate that the London Fire and Civil Defence authority does not meet the criteria that my hon. Friend set out in his letter to me. Why do we bother to consult the local community around a fire station such as Shooters Hill if we do not take people's representations seriously and make them aware of the proposals? Is the consultation designed merely to satisfy the wider public, away from the immediate vicinity, or is it a genuine attempt to address local people's serious concerns?

When we were elected, the credibility and standing of politicians were at a low ebb. One of the Government's tasks must be to restore that credibility, so we must treat consultation exercises seriously and not leave people feeling that they are nothing but a sham.

The LFCDA's decision was based on a consultation process that started in December 1995 and ended on 31 January 1996. The resulting document was considered at a meeting of the authority's policy and resources committee on 8 February, and then at a full meeting of the authority on 22 February. Given that the consultation started only in December, that Christmas intervened and that the closing date was 31 December, the process may not have been sufficient.

Furthermore, the local authority was asked on 21 December for its comments. I do not have to point out to my hon. Friend the Minister that that was unreasonably close to Christmas. Even worse, the local authority was asked to consult all the local groups, so it would have had to circulate the LFCDA's proposals, receive the comments and return them by the closing date at the end of January. That was clearly insufficient time.

My hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Thamesmead (Mr. Austin), who was then the hon. Member for Woolwich where the fire station is situated, also made representations against its closure. He wrote to the chair of the LFCDA and to the Secretary of State. He also initiated an Adjournment debate on the subject on 9 February 1996. A further debate on fire services was held on 13 March, which my hon. Friend the Minister will recall, as he took part in it.

Given that so much attention was paid to the issue in the House, which is only across the river from the headquarters of the LFCDA, the Minister will be surprised to learn that the objections raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Thamesmead were not recorded in the report to the LFCDA, which was made on 22 February. The council met on 15 February and passed a letter to the authority on 16 February. Its objections were also not recorded in the report that was sent to the authority on 22 February. The consultation arrangements were wholly inadequate, and I know that the chief executive of the London borough of Greenwich has written this week to the authority to make that point.

The LFCDA's decision to close Shooters Hill fire station, taken this week, is based on the consultation that took place in December 1995 and January 1996. That consultation was flawed because it did not accurately record the objections. Although some of them were received later than the closing date of 21 January, they were in time to be considered at the meeting of the authority on 22 February.

More important, as I have said, the decision has been based on that consultation. Because the objections of the local council and the Member of Parliament were not known and the consultation with local people was not sufficient, none of the objections is recorded in the current report before the LFCDA. Therefore, its decision is flawed.

The report that went to the LFCDA in October 1997, and led to the decision to close Shooters Hill fire station, did not take account of any developments in the area. For instance, it did not consider the development along the waterfront from Deptford to Thamesmead. It did not address the Creekside development, the Woolwich dockyard, the Royal Arsenal or the development at Thamesmead. It did not even consider the imminent development at the Queen Elizabeth II hospital.

I am sure that hon. Members will be surprised to learn that the report made no mention of the millennium experience, which will have 75,000 visitors on peak days and 35,000 visitors on non-peak days. The transport infrastructure that has been put in place—the docklands light railway and the Jubilee line extensions—was also not considered. All those developments may be subject to special measures, but they will still have an impact on the fire cover for the local area. Each time the issue has been raised with the LFCDA, it has claimed that it will not affect its ability to meet Home Office-recommended response times. That might be the case if the response times are measured from point A—the fire station—to point B or the location of the incident. Given the expansion and development in the area, that decision does not take account of the possibility that point C might need attention at the same time that the fire station is dealing with point B. That aspect is causing great concern in the local community.

I suggest that members of the LFCDA did not have all the facts before them when the decision was taken. For that reason, the report was flawed. It did not record the opposition of the council or the MP. The Minister cannot consider that public consultation was adequate and, therefore, the subsequent decision based on that was flawed and, I believe, challengeable. It also said that there was no need for reconsultation because there had been no significant developments. I have been told by the LFCDA that its decision is out of time for a challenge, but I suggest that there are significant grounds, as the section 19 request has not been granted yet by the Minister.

Local people fear that the service is being shaped by financial considerations. The 1995 Audit Commission report, "In the Line of Fire", referred to pensions and warned of the extreme financial pressure that would be placed on fire services throughout the country. Local people worry that their fire station is being closed not because of rationalisation of the service but because of financial constraints. That puts local people and property in danger. They are also concerned that too much emphasis is placed on property rather than people in calculating response times and the ability of the fire service to cover an area.

People feel that the assumptions made in the report to the LFCDA in October are woefully inadequate and that the failure of the previous consultation, and the failure to report honestly the concerns that were raised by the local authority and Member of Parliament, have seriously called into question other assumptions that were made in the report. Those are genuine feelings of concern in my constituency. I suggest that the Minister cannot grant the section 19 request of the LFCDA.

Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford): My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford) has outlined the anxiety of people who believe that the millennium experience, with its car parks and increased traffic, will distract fire cover from residential calls. That is part of the background to the debate.

There is no doubt that the closure of Shooters Hill fire station is driven by difficulties with the London fire and Civil Defence Authority's pension funds. Were there no such difficulties, I doubt whether the closure would have arisen. This year's financial settlement in increasing support to the LFCDA has recognised the difficulty, but the LFCDA decided to use the extra money not to avoid shutting the station but to overcome the imbalance in its pension fund this year. It feels that, without some guarantee of the future, it has a fiduciary duty this year and subsequently to ameliorate the imbalance.

I recognise that the LFCDA operates within the rules laid down for it, but it is wrong for London's fire cover anywhere to be influenced or determined by the exigencies of the pension fund. I accept the Minister's assurances that provision, even with the closure of Shooters Hill fire station, will meet national minimum standards. Why, however, should cover above minimum standards be determined not by the appraisal of fire risks but by the number of firemen who have been injured and had to retire early, a bulge in past recruitment that is causing a retirement bulge now and the fact that firemen live longer in retirement than was anticipated when the actuarial foundations of the fund were laid? To accept those factors as legitimate influences on fire cover in south-east London is tantamount to accepting that, within limits, cover is determined by chance.

That cannot be a sound or acceptable basis on which to administer public service and recruit public confidence. I should like to make three requests of the Minister: to set aside the proposal to close Shooters Hill fire station; in the meantime, to urge the LFCDA to use the cash it has to overcome this year's pension difficulties; and to review the fire brigade pension arrangements and produce a lasting solution to an endemic problem in time for next year's settlement.

Mr. John Austin (Erith and Thamesmead): My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford) has clearly set out how he feels the consultation was flawed in the way in which the decision was taken. He has just handed to me a copy of the LFCDA report that went to the committee on 2 February 1996. It refers to the fact that 267 responses, excluding petitions, had been received. In fact, the leader of the fire authority told my hon. Friend that 900 responses were received. I responded to the authority in writing, which was acknowledged by the leader of the authority on two occasions and I submitted an objection from the police consultative committee in Greenwich, but none of that was reported at the time to the authority.

The main concern is the area represented by my hon. Friend around Shooters Hill, but the fire station covers not only its own ground, but surrounding areas. It is in the centre, surrounded by Woolwich, Plumstead, Eltham, Lee Green, Bexley, East Greenwich and Sidcup fire stations—all of which, with the exception of Plumstead, are one-appliance stations. If Shooters Hill station were to close, it would mean that, whenever two appliances were called out, whether on a two-fire or a one-fire call, there would be an entire sector left without cover.

Mr. Jim Fitzpatrick (Poplar and Canning Town): May I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the fact that there are several Labour Members here who are concerned about the future of the London fire service, but there is not a single Opposition Member present?

Mr. Austin: I note my hon. Friend's comments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham commented on the effect on the wider area. The following structures are on the major incidents plan involving Shooters Hill fire station: Eltham palace, the A102 motorway, the Blackwall tunnel, the Thames barrier, Erith oil works, Charlton Athletic's football ground, the Valley, the millennium site and all the developments that have taken place along the waterfront since the report was received.

The speed with which an appliance arrives on the scene of a fire is vital to safety, not only for the occupants of the buildings, but for the firefighters themselves, because their lives are at risk when their arrival is delayed. I shall quote some examples, which I know the Minister has, because I sent them to him. When there was a fire at Eastcote primary school, the first appliance arrived in five minutes, the second in seven; for a fire at Long Walk housing office, the first arrived in three minutes, the second in seven; for a fire in Shooters Hill itself, the first arrived in four minutes, the second in seven; for a fire in Warland road in Plumstead, the first arrived in four minutes, the second in seven; for a fire in Elmdene road, the first arrived in three minutes and the second in six. If Shooters Hill fire station had been closed, I doubt whether those areas would have got even one appliance within 10 minutes.

I shall compare two incidents: the first took place when Shooters Hill had two appliances and the second when it had only one. Six years ago, there was a fire in Rowton road, and four people had to be rescued from upstairs bedrooms. The crew worked well: they passed the people on to the second crew, who carried out first aid and essential resuscitation. All four survived.

Two years later, when Shooters Hill had only one appliance, there was a serious fire in Llanover road. Again, the crews worked magnificently and did all they could, but four children did not survive. I cannot say with any certainty that, if there had been two appliances at Shooters Hill, those children would have lived, but there is a nagging question in the mind of everybody living in the area—what would have been the outcome if that cut had not been made?

My hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard) referred to the pension provision. The Minister will know that I raised that matter during the debate on the Queen's Speech in 1994 and in the debate on the fire services. I acknowledge that the Minister has been as good as his word. This year's fire settlement, with the additional cash for the fire and civil defence authority, was the best settlement in years. I do not believe that when the Minister gave that extra money he expected it to be stashed away in the reserves: he expected it to be spent on fire cover for the people of London, and that is what we expect.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford) on securing the debate. The House will admire his patience in sitting through the night to raise this issue of importance to his constituents.

I am pleased that firefighters in London have decided against taking industrial action on the proposals to change fire cover in London. Whatever their motive, such action would have had the most costly and damaging consequences for Londoners.

I fully understand the concerns of hon. Members and their constituents about the quality of their local fire service. That was emphasised again last week when I met my hon. Friend with my hon. Friends the Members for Erith and Thamesmead (Mr. Austin) and for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard), both of whom have contributed to the debate. They were with a delegation of residents from the area served by Shooters Hill fire station, who expressed their concerns about the proposed closure of the station. My hon. Friends and their constituents made it clear that they take this issue very seriously.

The fire service is a local authority service. Statutory responsibility for providing an efficient fire service rests with the local fire authority. In the case of Shooters Hill, that is the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority. It is for the authority to keep its fire cover provision under review and to set its budget at such a level that will allow it to discharge its statutory responsibilities.

It is important for the House to know that the proposal to close Shooters Hill fire station—and, indeed, the Barbican station—has its origins in a fire cover review by the London fire brigade. The aim of the review was to ensure that fire cover was provided on a strategic basis, deploying all the brigade's resources in the most effective and efficient way. It recognised, in particular, that appliances at any individual fire station were not the only resources available to that locality.

On section 19 applications, the legislation provides safeguards to ensure that statutory responsibilities continue to be met. Section 19(4) of the Fire Services Act 1947 requires that a fire authority cannot reduce the numbers of fire stations, fire appliances and firefighting posts without the express consent of the Home Secretary, who has a specific role in considering section 19 applications. He grants approval only if he is satisfied, first, that the proposals have been sufficiently widely publicised, in sufficient detail and with adequate time to enable any interested party to make representations; secondly, that representations have been considered by the fire authority; and, thirdly, on the advice of Her Majesty's inspectorate of fire services, that the national standards of fire cover will be maintained.

There is no statutory right of consultation, but the existing guidance makes it clear that the Home Secretary considers it desirable that there should be appropriate consultation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham dealt in some detail with the consultation arrangements made by the authority. That is primarily a matter for the authority, but the consultations on the fire cover review were extensive: 194 bodies were consulted, including hon. Members, MEPs, London boroughs, staff associations and others. The authority is itself a representative body made up of 33 members drawn from each of the London boroughs and the City.

The section 19 guidance makes it clear that the Home Secretary will take into account any representations that are made directly to him. The volume of letters that we have already received makes it clear that the authority's proposals are widely known and that the opportunity to make representations has been taken. The fact that I have received another 1,100 reinforces that point.

My hon. Friend spoke about new developments in the relevant areas. I know that the authority monitors new developments and keeps under review its assessment of fire risk. We have sought the advice of Her Majesty's inspectorate of fire services on the substantive issues that were raised in representations to us, including those that were made to me last week in correspondence on new developments. Because of the importance of the matters that have been raised by this application and the number of representations, we have sought the personal advice of Her Majesty's chief inspector of fire services.

Levels of fire cover are determined locally against national, recommended standards of fire cover. Those standards dictate the initial responses to a fire in terms of weight and speed of attack. The area that is served by Shooters Hill fire station is predominantly C risk, but it was made clear last week that just under 30 per cent. is classified as D risk. We shall not approve any proposals for Shooters Hill unless we are entirely satisfied that the national fire cover standards will be maintained. Shooters Hill already relies on neighbouring fire stations to meet the agreed standards of fire cover. In particular, the stations at East Greenwich, Plumstead, Woolwich, Eltham, Lee Green and Bexley supply second pumping appliance cover for the B risk area. I think that my hon. Friend would acknowledge that.

It is the responsibility of the fire authority to set a budget that will allow it to meet its legal obligations. In setting its budget for 1998-99, the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority will have taken into account the local government finance settlement and the criteria that were proposed for council tax capping. As part of that settlement, we are increasing the fire service share of standard spending assessment in England by £61.6 million. That is a 5 per cent. increase. It is a good settlement for the service and I am proud of it.

Under the proposed capping criteria, London was able to set a budget for 1998–99 up to £12.5 million, which is 4.7 per cent. higher than in 1997-98. That compares with an increase of 3 per cent. last year, 2 per cent. the year before, and 0.5 per cent. the year before that. If the authority thought that it could not otherwise meet its statutory duties, it was open to it to set a budget that was higher than the proposed capping limit and to apply for redetermination of the cap. It has chosen not to do so. That decision was entirely for the authority.

The application for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's approval for the closure of the Shooters Hill station has now been under consideration for four months. I make no apology for the time that we have taken. Such an application raises sensitive issues and it is important that that they and the many representations that we have received are given the most careful consideration. However, it is important to state a vital principle. These decisions are taken locally—in this case by the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority. The role of Ministers is limited to being satisfied on advice from Her Majesty's chief inspector of fire services that such decisions do not affect a brigade's ability to meet its statutory obligations.

In fairness to the authority, it is right for us to aim to make a decision as soon as possible, but, before doing that, I shall want to reflect carefully on the points that have been raised in the debate and on any other information that my hon Friend passes to me.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

BBC World Service

1. Mr. Cranston: What assessment his Department has made of the role of the BBC World Service in raising the UK's profile in British export markets. [31794]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Derek Fatchett): The BBC World Service raises the UK's profile in British export markets in two ways. A survey of British business leaders has shown that, through its role as the most trusted international broadcaster, the World Service helps to create a climate favourable to British trade. In addition, the World Service enhances the UK's profile with its reports on the latest developments in science, industry and commerce and presents a picture of Britain attractive to international business.

Mr. Cranston: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply, which acknowledges that the BBC World Service is a real asset on the world stage for this country. My hon. Friend is aware that the BBC World Service is now operating in an environment in which competitors are bringing on the internet and using television and modern forms of radio broadcasting such as FM and digital. Will he lend his support to the strategy of the BBC World Service to meet the challenge from those competitors by using on-line television and modern forms of radio broadcasting?

Mr. Fatchett: I agree with my hon. Friend in his comments about the value of the BBC World Service. It is now broadcasting in 44 languages and reaches more than 140 million people throughout the world. Its reputation is well established. My hon. Friend raises a number of important points about the development of the service. The chief executive had a recent meeting with my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and will have a further meeting with my noble Friend Baroness Symons to discuss the future. All the issues to which my hon. Friend referred will be taken into account in those discussions.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Is the Minister aware that to remain competitive in the new environment, the BBC World Service believes that it needs a very modest cash injection spread over four years? Is there any hope of that injection being given?

Mr. Fatchett: I realise that the hon. Gentleman was not a Member of Parliament under the previous Government, but he will know what happened to the BBC World Service under them. It was constantly subjected to cuts by the Conservative Government and during that period morale fell considerably. The hon. Gentleman will be delighted to know that morale has now increased. There is a good relationship between the Government and the World Service and funding will continue to be discussed with it. No announcements will be made without the World Service's knowledge.

Mr. Howard: Is not short-wave transmission of the BBC World Service to China jammed? Is that not a vivid manifestation of China's attitude to human rights? Is it not an utter disgrace that, next month at the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in Geneva, for the first time in 10 years, the United Kingdom Government will not support a resolution to draw attention to China's record on human rights?

Mr. Fatchett: I am delighted to hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman taking up human rights. When the Government have made a stance on this issue on other occasions, he has been critical. We are always pleased to see a convert on these issues. The United Kingdom, under the Labour Government, has entered into a constructive dialogue with China on human rights. Mary Robinson, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, will visit China. That was announced during the visit of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary. We have a record on dialogue with China on human rights of which we can be proud and we shall continue to play a constructive role.

Middle East Peace Process

2. Mr. Fabian Hamilton: If he will make a statement on Britain's role in the middle east peace process. [31796]

6. Mr. Gapes: If he will make a statement on the prospects for a comprehensive peace settlement between Israel and its neighbours. [31800]

10. Sir Sydney Chapman: If he will make a statement on progress with the middle east peace process. [31805]

14. Mr. Quinn: What plans he has to visit the middle east to discuss the peace process. [31811]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): With the presidency of the European Union, we have launched an intensive European effort to restore momentum to the middle east peace process. In a speech last Thursday, I set out an EU initiative on the peace process, in three parts. First, I detailed six immediate steps that must be taken to restore confidence in the peace process. In particular, I called on the Government of Israel to make substantial, credible and urgent further redeployments of troops. At the same time, I called on a 100 per cent. commitment from the Palestine National Authority in respect of security.

Secondly, I pledged the EU to provide practical assistance to remove the obstacles in the path of progress. Under the UK presidency, the EU has agreed to renew financial assistance to the peace process which would otherwise expire this year. We shall now work for a joint effort by Europe, the United States, Israel and the Palestine National Authority on how that aid can best boost the peace process.

Thirdly, we shall undertake intensive diplomatic action to break the current deadlock. On Sunday I leave for a tour of Israel, the Palestine National Authority, Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. I shall be pressing, in all six places, the urgent importance of restoring progress towards an agreement that provides peace with security for Israelis and peace with justice for the Palestinians.

Mr. Hamilton: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. I hope that he will accept my congratulations on his attempt to restart the Oslo peace process with his speech of 5 March. Does he agree with Ziad Abu Ziad, one of Yasser Arafat's deputies, who has said that to be a true friend of Israel one must also be a friend of the Palestinian people? Will my right hon. Friend pass on our congratulations to President Ezer Weizman—a man very much involved in the peace process—on his re-election as President of Israel?

Mr. Cook: I am happy to associate myself with my hon. Friend's congratulations to President Weizman, who has always been a friend of the peace process. My hon. Friend also highlights an important part of the whole issue. At the election, the Israeli people voted for a Government who promised to deliver peace with security. The great majority of Israeli people know very well that there can be no security for them if there is no peace. That is why, in working for a resumption of the peace process, we are working with the overwhelming majority of Israelis.

Mr. Gapes: When my right hon. Friend goes to Syria, will he emphasise to the Syrian Government the importance of Syria's being engaged in the process? Does he agree that if there is to be a comprehensive settlement in the middle east it is not just a question of the relationship between Israel and the Palestinians? All the states neighbouring Israel must also recognise Israel and come to a peace settlement with Israel if there is to be lasting peace in the region.

Mr. Cook: I shall be taking to Damascus the very message that my hon. Friend suggests. It is important that Syria play its part too. The Syrian Government's negotiating position is that they want to start again from where they allege the negotiations broke off under Yitzhak Rabin—an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan heights. It is, however, difficult to make progress from that starting point in present circumstances.

My hon. Friend rightly draws attention to the importance of other dimensions of the peace process. I very much hope that it will be possible to persuade Prime Minister Netanyahu to make concrete his verbal assurances of interest in an Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon.

Sir Sydney Chapman: I welcome Israel's proposal to withdraw troops from southern Lebanon. The Foreign Secretary said in his speech last Thursday that no peace plan would be complete in the middle east if it neglected the Syrian and Lebanese tracks. When he goes to Syria, will he put it to the Syrian Government that since Israel is prepared to get out of southern Lebanon, Syria ought to get out of Lebanon?

Mr. Cook: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point—one of the keys to solving the Lebanese situation and tragedy is to be found in Damascus. I shall certainly raise that issue while I am there. My progress in Damascus will probably be greater if Israel will act on its promises and complete the withdrawal, which the hon. Gentleman seemed to imply had already taken place.

Mr. Quinn: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is much frustration among hon. Members at the lack of progress in the peace process in the middle east? Why is there no opportunity for him to visit the kingdom of Saudi Arabia, so that it may help to bring about a rapid and successful harmonisation in the middle east?

Mr. Cook: I am happy to tell my hon. Friend that I visited Saudi Arabia last month. The focus of that visit was to discuss the then confrontation with Iraq, but we did, of course, touch on the peace process. My hon. Friend will be aware that across much of the middle east an unfair comparison was made between our robust approach to Iraq and our alleged weakness towards Israel. I very much hope that the clear, resolute approach that I took in my speech and the comprehensive visits that I am making to the region next week will make it abundantly clear to all that Britain takes fully its responsibility under the resolutions on the middle east—as we do under the resolutions on Iraq.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I, too, commend the Secretary of State on the terms of his speech last week, in particular his recognition of the importance of Syria and Lebanon and his call for an immediate halt to the settlements. As he knows, the settlements are in breach of resolution 242, which sought to provide a homeland for the Palestinian people. Does he accept that not only are the settlements wrong in international law, but they are a continuing and damaging source of provocation to Palestinians?

Mr. Cook: The hon. and learned Gentleman makes a fair point and one that is central to the peace process. Mr. Netanyahu has sought an early resumption of final status talks. I would welcome the possibility of proceeding to final status talks, but it will be extremely difficult to engage the Palestine National Authority in final status talks unless some concrete progress can be seen on the ground, in particular an end to provocations such as the expansion of the settlements. We have continually condemned such provocation and I hope during my visit next week to visit Har Homa and to express that view there in person.

Mr. Wilkinson: When the Foreign Secretary goes to Israel on behalf of the EU presidency to try to bring about peace, will he bear in mind the extent to which the Israeli people have grievously suffered from terrorism? Does he believe that the standing and authority of the European Union and Her Majesty's Government will have been enhanced in the eyes of the Israeli Government by the Government's decision not to accede to the extradition request of the German authorities in respect of Miss McAliskey, who was arraigned under terrorism charges in the federal republic? Will he bear it in mind that the European Union should be seen to encourage the rule of law and to be resolute in cross-border co-operation against terrorism?

Mr. Cook: My general impression is that the middle east peace process already suffers from too many linkages being made. To make a linkage to peace in Northern Ireland is to ensure that no progress is made. On that case, it has been made perfectly clear that the release was on humanitarian and medical grounds. It in no way diminishes the long-standing position of Britain in resolute opposition to terrorism. While I am in the Palestine National Authority I will make it clear that progress on the peace process must be matched by tough progress on security as well.

Dr. Palmer: Will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity of his visit to encourage progress towards the construction of a Palestinian airport in Gaza? We have seen press reports suggesting that the Israeli Government are ready to move on that. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be a substantial step forward, which would encourage Palestinians to feel that the process was working in their favour too?

Mr. Cook: There are four interim agreements on which progress could be made, which would help immensely to boost the political process. One is the airport; another would be the industrial estate on the border; the third would be the sea port; and the fourth would be the southern free passage. Europe currently puts a great deal of financial assistance into the peace process. We put in twice as much as the United States. I would like to see our money targeted more on helping projects that would break through the obstacles to the peace process. I shall explore in particular how Europe's commitment to continuing aid can be used to unblock the obstacles to the airport and the sea port. My hon. Friend is quite right: if we could achieve that, not only would it be a visible help to the Palestinian economy, but it would go a long way towards building confidence between the parties to the peace process.

Mr. Faber: I, too, return the Foreign Secretary to his speech of last week, particularly to the six key steps that he rightly identified as marking the start to unblocking the peace process—five of which I believe require joint or unilateral action by Israel. Can the Foreign Secretary confirm that, during his meeting with Mr. Netanyahu at the weekend, the Prime Minister forcefully pressed all five of those issues? Did he seek, and indeed receive, any commitments from the Israeli Prime Minister? If he did not receive any assurances, what action do the Government propose to take to bring further pressure to bear on the Israeli Government to see that the demands are met, and within what time scale?

Mr. Cook: I thank the hon. Gentleman for saying that they are the right six steps: I am glad that the approach has bipartisan support. I am glad also that the hon. Gentleman asked that question as it gives me the opportunity to rebut some of the claims that I understand have appeared in the Israeli press in the past 24 hours to the effect that the Prime Minister took a different position from me in my speech last week. I am pleased to tell the House that there is absolutely no difference between the Foreign Office and No. 10 on this issue: every word in my speech was cleared and discussed with No. 10 before the speech was made.

The whole Government stand behind the speech and the points that I spelled out in it. As to what further pressure is now required, I discussed with my opposite number, Madeleine Albright, on Monday where we go from here. We shall jointly increase pressure for a positive response from Israel.

Zambia

4. Mr. Goggins: What representations he has made about the state of emergency in Zambia. [31798]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tony Lloyd): We have urged the Zambian Government quickly to complete their investigations into the coup attempt, to charge or release detainees, to address claims of torture and to lift the state of emergency soon. We note that most of the detainees have now been charged.

Mr. Goggins: I thank my hon. Friend for his reassuring answer. Does he agree that last October's failed—some might say rather pathetic—coup attempt in Zambia is symptomatic of a country that spends four times as much on debt relief as on health care, which is rife with corruption and where, in the words of ex-President Kaunda, there are no jobs, only people dying of hunger? Will my hon. Friend assure the House that the Government will do everything within their power to encourage good governance and sensible economic reform in that country so that the impoverished people of Zambia can look forward to a more hopeful and stable future?

Mr. Lloyd: In many ways, the real tragedy of Zambia is that the present Government seemed to be making real progress, so when the attempted coup took place and President Chiluba quite correctly told his people to go about their business, it was all the more bizarre and surprising that he then announced a state of emergency. Even more deplorable was the continuation of that state of emergency in January.

We want Zambia to get back on a proper path of reconstruction for the benefit of its people. However, that will mean lifting the state of emergency and bringing to speedy and fair trial those who have been detained. Before the rest of the world is ready to begin the real process of helping those who are most impoverished by the situation in Zambia, the Zambian Government must commit to a drive against corruption and to the restoration of constitutional order.

Mr. Wells: What representations have Her Majesty's Government made to the Government of Zambia, and particularly the President, on behalf of ex-President Kaunda? Is it not outrageous that, first, he has been banned from standing in Zambian elections and, secondly, as I understand it, he remains under house arrest? If he has been charged, I do not believe that he has been brought to justice. That is thoroughly anti-democratic and something that we cannot possibly support.

Mr. Lloyd: I make it quite clear that former President Kaunda is only one of some 100-plus people who were detained initially without charge. I am glad to inform the House that subsequently the former President has been charged—although we are very concerned about the nature of the charges that have been laid. They include having knowledge of a conspiracy to overthrow the Government, which is very unusual. I cancelled my visit to Zambia at the time of the former President's detention because it would have been impossible to go ahead in the circumstances. We shall continue to urge the Zambian Government to lift the state of emergency and ensure that the former President, as well as all the other detainees, has a fair and speedy trial.

Mexico

7. Helen Jones: What representations he has made to the Government of Mexico about human rights in Mexico. [31801]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed the human rights situation in Mexico with the new Foreign Minister, Mrs. Green, on 12 February in Panama City. He made clear our concerns that those arrested in connection with the massacre in Chiapas should be brought to trial and that there should be no immunity for those with connections with municipal or state government. I discussed human rights issues with Mrs. Green's predecessor last November.

Helen Jones: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that one of the best ways to protect human rights in Mexico is to support the growth of free and independent trade unions, which already receive support from the Trades Union Congress and other democratic unions? What plans does he have to assist trade unions in their development?

Mr. Lloyd: I agree with my hon. Friend. The development of a fair and democratic society in Mexico depends not only on the growth of proper, democratic political parties and a political system but the growth of civil society more generally. The trade union movement in Mexico is an important component—as it is in this country, certainly under this Government—in underwriting the freedoms of the people of Mexico. I met the Mexican trade unions when I visited Mexico just before Christmas and had long and interesting conversations with them about the future of democratic and free trade unions in that country.

Iraq

8. Mr. Ian Taylor: If he will make a statement on the role played by the EU presidency in the negotiations over the situation in Iraq. [31802]

Mr. Robin Cook: As we have the presidency of the European Union, Britain has maintained close contact with our partners throughout the crisis. In early February, I chaired a special meeting of the General Affairs Council on Iraq. On the weekend of the Secretary-General's visit to Baghdad, the General Affairs Council agreed a policy statement that welcomed the outcome, insisted that Iraq comply with Security Council resolutions and noted that the international community had needed to show firm resolve to achieve agreement.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister spoke in person or by telephone to the Heads of Government of many other European member states and all the major nations. In New York, the United Kingdom worked closely with Sweden and Portugal, which are currently members of the Security Council, in co-sponsoring the resolution that more than doubles the oil-for-food programme.

Mr. Taylor: Although the Foreign Secretary finds close proximity with Madeleine Albright exhilarating and, over the Iraq affair, there was absolutely no doubt that our interests and those of the United States were very much in harmony, will he recognise that that will not always be the case? What practical steps is he taking to ensure moves to more effective common European foreign policy? In what aspects will that be likely to be deployed during the EU presidency and immediately thereafter?

Mr. Cook: I am not sure that exhilarating is quite the word that I would choose to describe it, but it is a great asset for Britain that the two Foreign Secretaries work closely together and often share each other's thinking.

On the wider question of common foreign and security policy, during the short period of our presidency we have already demonstrated large agreement in taking forward initiatives. For instance, we now have a new common position on Iran, and I hope that on the basis of that common position in Europe we shall be able to bridge some of the transatlantic gulf. We also acted speedily to find both a foreign and a domestic response to the emigration of Kurdish refugees from Turkey and Iraq. We took a quick initiative in relation to Algeria. The Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett), led a troika to Algeria and, over the past week, we have been working hard to ensure that Europe is in the lead in response to the current crisis in Kosovo. I shall discuss all those issues and others with my Foreign Minister colleagues when I welcome them to my home town of Edinburgh at the weekend.

Mr. Winnick: Do our EU partners fully accept that if the Iraqi regime breaks the agreement which, fortunately, has been reached, there will be most serious consequences, as stated in the latest United Nations Security Council resolution, and the most serious consequences will mean precisely that—there will be no second chance?

Will my right hon. Friend consider further the possibility of humanitarian relief to the first victims of that criminal regime—the civilians? Is there any possibility of aid being flown in, albeit only on the basis that we are satisfied that it will be used for civilians, particularly children, who are undoubtedly suffering—not from sanctions, but from the Iraqi Government's policy?

Mr. Cook: I can confirm that the resolution that we drafted and presented to the Security Council makes it clear that if Iraq breaks the agreement there will be the severest consequences. We resisted attempts to produce a lesser phrase.

My hon. Friend raises an important issue that we must now address: the humanitarian needs of the people of Iraq. In my speech last Thursday I set out our intention as presidency of the European Union to convene a meeting with the European nations, some leaders of the Arab world and non-governmental organisations to work out how we can make best use of the doubling of the oil-for-food programme that we have steered through the United Nations. It is not enough to ensure that that money is not mis-spent; we must ensure that it is spent properly. If Saddam Hussein blocks our initiative to bring medicine, food and humanitarian relief to his people, it will be clear to all the world that it is not the west or the international community but Saddam who is responsible for their suffering.

Mr. Howard: Is not the simple truth that there was no agreement in the EU about the nature of action to be taken on Iraq and that contrary to the question just asked by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), France revealed in the discussions at the Security Council an interpretation of the resolution that differed sharply from that of the UK Government? Why does not the Foreign Secretary say in a straightforward manner that there was no agreement in the EU on that, instead of indulging in self-satisfied waffle?

Mr. Cook: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman is genuine about putting pressure on Iraq and wants Saddam Hussein to listen to the international community, it might be responsible for him to tell Saddam Hussein and the House the self-evident truth that the great majority of members of the EU shared Britain's position and that when Kofi Annan went to Baghdad he went with the agreement of all five permanent members. The right hon. and learned Gentleman undermines the efforts of the international community when he tries to suggest that there are deep divisions.

Mr. Dalyell: Does my right hon. Friend's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) mean that he rejects the view of the Chinese ambassador to the United Nations, that in no way does the Kofi Annan agreement give authority for Anglo-American—

Mr. Winnick: It does.

Mr. Dalyell: My hon. Friend is very sure that it does; I am just asking the question. Does it give authority for Anglo-American military action without going back yet again to the Security Council?

Mr. Cook: I would say gently to my hon. Friend that when we want legal advice we may look elsewhere than to the Chinese ambassador at the United Nations. He himself voted for the resolution, which is explicit: if Iraq breaks the agreement, there will be the severest consequences.

EU Enlargement

9. Mr. Pickles: Which countries will be represented at the EU enlargement summit on 12 March. [31803]

Mr. Robin Cook: The Luxembourg European Council agreed that the member states of the European Union, the 10 countries of central Europe that have applied to join the Union, Cyprus and Turkey should be invited to participate in the European conference.

Accordingly, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has invited his colleagues in those countries to attend the first meeting of the European conference, which he will convene in London on Thursday. It is expected that the conference will agree to practical co-operation in areas of immediate relevance to the public, such as combating the drugs trade and organised crime, improving the environment and building competitive economies. The European conference will be important chiefly because it represents an historic first step towards a stronger, enlarged European Union and a final end to the division of Europe which has scarred our continent for half a century.

Mr. Pickles: Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the progress made by the Polish people since the fall of communism has been truly breathtaking, and that there is great vitality among the upcoming leadership there? Does he believe that it is in the interests of not only Poland, but this country and the strengthening of the European Union that Poland should become a member? Given that not all our partners share our enthusiasm for Polish entry, will he give an undertaking to the House that sufficient momentum will be built up under the British presidency to ensure that any qualifications and problems can be quickly addressed?

Mr. Cook: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that Britain fully backs the enlargement of the European Union and recognises that Poland is a prime candidate for enlargement. I said that in a speech in Warsaw when I visited that city just before Christmas. In the past three days, I have spoken twice to the Foreign Minister of Poland, who currently occupies a position of great importance as the chairman of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe for the whole of Europe. We are working closely with him and with his Government, and we shall be delighted to assist them in the process of negotiations because we regard the negotiations not as confrontational, but as between two partners seeking a common objective—the enlargement of the European Union, and stability and democracy throughout central Europe.

Mr. Dismore: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be in the best interest of all Cypriots if Cyprus were to accede to the European Union? In that context, will he take the opportunity to confirm that accession talks will not be dependent on or linked to progress in peace negotiations and, in particular, that accession talks will not be subject to veto by the regime in northern Cyprus?

Mr. Cook: I can confirm that there will be no veto for the regime in northern Cyprus. However, the people of northern Cyprus have more to gain than anybody else in Cyprus from EU membership as their income level is currently a quarter of that of the Greek Cypriot part of Cyprus. For those reasons, we have urged the Government of Cyprus to bring a mixed delegation of Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot negotiators. I am pleased to say that there are signs that President Clerides and his Government are willing to do that. I regret to say that the present stubbornness on the Turkish Cypriot side may prevent that from happening.

Mr. Streeter: Does the Foreign Secretary recall saying, on 14 January, that the Government would be working hard to strengthen relations between the EU and Turkey? Does he recall the Prime Minister saying, in December last year, that he wanted to see Turkey as a closer partner in Europe and as part of the European conference that would be held in Britain in the next year? Does he accept that Turkey's decision to boycott the conference on Thursday represents a major diplomatic failure by the Government? Will he tell the House what he intends to do to secure Turkey's future involvement in that vital process?

Mr. Cook: If the hon. Gentleman says that in Ankara, he will be given a robust raspberry by the Government there, who know perfectly well how hard Britain has worked to involve Turkey and to resist the Luxembourg conclusions which they have found so offensive. I discussed this with my opposite number in Turkey over the weekend. Turkey is invited and it is for that country to decide whether to attend. It has decided that, in view of the conclusions of the Luxembourg conference, it will stand by the view it expressed then that it will not be coming. My colleague, the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett), and I have agreed that after the European conference, we will look for other ways in which to take forward our dialogue, probably through the association partnership, on which the Commission is about to produce interesting and detailed proposals.

Mr. Pike: Does my right hon. Friend recognise that the people of Romania welcome the fact that he has indicated that it is possible for that country to get on to the fast track for entry into the European Union? Will he be meeting President Constantinescu of Romania this week to spell out what steps need to be taken in Romania to ensure that it can enter the European Union on the earliest possible date?

Mr. Cook: I am pleased to say that Romania will be one of those participating in the European conference. Like all the other conference members from central and eastern Europe, it will participate in a meeting with the Prime Minister, and its Foreign Minister will participate in a meeting with me. I have met the new Foreign Minister of Romania to discuss how we take forward the enlargement process. The Foreign Office has agreed to provide specific technical expert help to the Romanian Foreign Office to help it build up expertise for the negotiations. My hon. Friend's first point is quite right; just because negotiations start with six specific members does not mean that those six will be the first across the line. All 11 have every incentive to make as much progress as possible. Those who get in first will be those who have made the most progress.

Iraq

11. Mr. Leigh: If he will make a statement on Iraq. [31806]

12. Mr. Alan W. Williams: If he will make a statement on progress towards removal of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. [31808]

13. Mr. Robin Cook: Britain played a key role in drafting Security Council resolution 1154 which was adopted unanimously by the Security Council last week. It provides a clear endorsement by the whole of the international community of the agreement between the Secretary-General and the Iraqi authorities. The resolution makes it clear that if Saddam Hussein breaks the agreement, there will be the severest consequences. I am pleased to report that inspections resumed in Iraq last Friday. International inspection has made good progress in halting the Iraqi nuclear and missile programmes. The United Nations Special Commission has now dismantled more weapons than were destroyed during the Gulf war. However, the Iraqi capacity for chemical and biological weapons production remains immense. We are determined that such a capacity cannot be left in the hands of Saddam Hussein, who has repeatedly used chemical weapons in the past and cannot be trusted not to use them in the future.

Mr. Leigh: Is the Foreign Secretary satisfied that Iraq is fully complying with the UN accords? Would he like to comment on the accusation that it is fairly worthless allowing inspectors into presidential sites because, by the time of inspection, they will be cleared of any weapons of mass destruction, which will be taken elsewhere? Therefore, there must be continued access. Can the Foreign Secretary confirm that if, at any future date, the Americans decide to use force, we shall stand four square with them?

Mr. Cook: The answer to the last point is that we remain in constant contact with the United States. We stood resolutely together during a confrontation, and we will do so if there should be a future confrontation. I am not sure whether I shall disappoint the hon. Gentleman if I say that inspections have been proceeding well over the three days since Friday. There is no question of one-off inspections—that was one of Saddam's initial bargaining positions, and it was one of the issues on which he was forced to climb down. The agreement represents a success for our strategy and, if properly carried out, will enable us to halt him in developing weapons of mass destruction.

Mr. Williams: It is seven years since the Gulf war, and it has taken that long for UNSCOM to uncover these chemical and biological weapons. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the present inspection crisis has to be resolved in a matter of weeks or months rather than years, that those weapons must be rendered harmless and that, if Iraq co-operates, economic sanctions can be lifted in that time scale?

Mr. Cook: The resolution we drafted and presented to the Security Council makes it clear that there is light at the end of the tunnel for the Iraqi people. Sanctions can be lifted if Saddam carries out the obligations to which he has again signed up. The reason we are here, seven years on from the original resolution, is precisely because Saddam has practised a continuous programme of deception and concealment. I cannot accept that we should put a deadline on when the inspectors withdraw; when they withdraw must be decided by when they have finished their business. However, I agree that it could be done in weeks if Saddam Hussein would, for once, honestly accept his responsibilities and fully co-operate with inspectors.

Mr. Cash: The Foreign Secretary and the Government deserve congratulations on the solidarity they have shown with the United States over Iraq. To refer to a previous question, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman to indicate what sort of phone calls the Prime Minister had with the other member states in Europe? Furthermore, what did the Prime Minister mean in his statement to the House the other day when he said that we had support from the EU member states? What specific and practical military commitments were the other member states prepared to make to support the United States and the United Kingdom in what could have turned out to be the necessity for direct military action?

Mr. Cook: I am happy to answer the hon. Gentleman's question. Belgium and the Netherlands provided a frigate for the fleet; Denmark provided transport aircraft; Sweden was willing to provide medical and logistical troops for support; and Portugal, Spain and Germany offered and made available use of their bases for planes flying on to the Gulf. Those European nations that were asked to help all did so.

Ann Clwyd: Given the growing support among our European Union partners and many other countries in the world for the indictment of Saddam Hussein and some of his closest associates before an international criminal court, has my right hon. Friend thought about some of the other ideas proposed by the Iraqi opposition, which include lifting the sanctions in northern Iraq, supporting the installation of a provisional Government in northern Iraq and installing a no-drive zone in that area to protect it in the same way as the no-fly zone is protected?

Mr. Cook: This is an issue that we keep constantly under discussion, not just among ourselves, but with our partners. However, what my hon. Friend asks for involves a step that can be taken only with great seriousness and solemnity. We are very much aware that when people in Iraq were invited to rise up in 1991, they were then abandoned and there were many casualties among those who had taken us at our word. For that reason, there is a grave responsibility on us not to encourage people to take action which we then cannot follow through.

13. Mr. Boswell: What activities in relation to Agenda 2000 have been initiated under the British presidency. [31809]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Doug Henderson): The Council has approved the framework regulation for the accession partnerships, which will be the principal plank of the EU's relationship with the countries of central and eastern Europe over the coming years. We shall launch the European conference, which will bring together the member states and candidate countries, in London on Thursday.

We expect the Commission to table draft regulations for the reform of the common agricultural policy and the structural and cohesion funds, and proposals for the future financing of the EU on 18 March. Those are only the most immediate activities. We expect that the Cardiff European Council in June will record good progress on Agenda 2000 during our presidency.

Mr. Boswell: Although the Minister will have heard the discouraging noises coming from Brussels last week about the possible withdrawal of Community support for aid to the British regions, will he ensure, in the forthcoming conference and subsequently, that he sits down with our existing partners in Europe so that any burdens of transfer to the applicant countries under Agenda 2000 are fairly shared and so that British interests are robustly represented?

Mr. Henderson: I am happy to reassure the hon. Gentleman that the position that he outlines is the one that the Government will adopt. As we support the enlargement process, it is important to have a funding system, which means that some of the structural funds must find their way to central and eastern European countries to help them. That means that less funding will be available from the structural cake for the existing European Union states, so it is important to have a fair burden share. That will be a principal objective in our negotiations.

Mr. Bill O'Brien: Does my hon. Friend accept the great importance of the structural funds to many of our regions, particularly Humberside, because of the economic development of those regions? Will he assure the House that during our presidency, he will lay the foundations necessary to ensure fairness and equity in the distribution of the structural funds so that our regions may continue with their economic progress?

Mr. Henderson: I hope that I can reassure my hon. Friend that a principal objective in our negotiations will be to seek a fair solution, part of which is that areas within the European Union that have similar characteristics and a similar need for help will get help. Many areas near my hon. Friend's constituency would qualify, and I hope that we can protect them on the basis of achieving a fair settlement.

Mr. Gill: The Minister mentioned reform of the common agricultural policy; he will appreciate that to get any fundamental reform of the CAP will require unanimity. What realistic prospect is there of achieving unanimity in the European Union at present?

Mr. Henderson: There is a growing recognition in the European Union that the current agricultural policy is wasteful and that a better way in which to support agricultural interests in the Community could be found. That is recognised in many countries that have previously taken a pretty reactionary view. The prospect of enlargement will force the European Union to look at agricultural policy. I believe that with tough negotiation and perseverance, we can begin to make progress towards bringing agricultural prices in Europe down towards world prices, which will be good for the consumer. Finding the right sort of support for agricultural interests will give the greatest support to those parts of the industry with the greatest need.

Mr. Skinner: Is my hon. Friend aware that we have been talking about reform of the common agricultural policy ever since Britain joined the Common Market on 1 January 1973? I do not see it coming any nearer. If it ever comes about that a policy is presented here in Parliament to reform the CAP, those 142,000 people, or however many went on the countryside march, will be knocking at every single door here, telling the British Government that they do not want it. All those Tory and Liberal Democrat Members of Parliament who theoretically support CAP reform will say, "No, we can't afford it."

Mr. Henderson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, but I had thought that he was more of an optimist and would be looking forward to changes in agricultural policy. I think that he can reassure me that, in the event of large numbers of sectional interests arguing against changing agricultural policy, he will be able to persuade many millions of consumers in our country that some of the changes, at least, will be in their interests—and they will turn up to show their support.

Departmental Commercial Sections

15. Ms Jenny Jones: If he will make a statement on his Department's commercial sections' priorities for 1998–99. [31812]

Mr. Fatchett: Our priorities will be to implement a new export initiative based on the recommendations of the Export Forum, and to continue to make the Foreign Office more businesslike through interchange with the private sector.

Ms Jones: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. What action is he taking to ensure that the relevant overseas posts are aware of the new priorities in this Government's export drive? What arrangements will be put in place to ensure that, in future, all commercial inquiries are dealt with quickly and effectively?

Mr. Fatchett: On the final point, we work closely with our colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry and we will ensure that there is an improved service for potential exporters. It is fair to say that the Foreign Office has become more commercially minded. More than one third of our full front-line staff time is now devoted to export and commercial activity. We have 217 commercial posts, and we are determined to ensure that we become more businesslike and are more successful in selling Britain. We have to improve on the record of the previous Government; we shall do so and are taking all the right steps to do so.

Mr. Soames: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his reply. Does he agree that the Foreign Office has, for a long time, been moving towards becoming much more commercial? When I had anything to do with the Foreign Office, I was always very impressed by its effectiveness in promoting British trade. Will the Minister acknowledge the extraordinarily powerful role that is played by defence in commercial diplomacy, not just in terms of weapon sales—where, clearly, the expertise of the British forces and the sophistication of their equipment commands ready markets overseas—but through a range of other goods and services, where the skills of our forces are well deployed in showing how they work so well?

Mr. Fatchett: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his opening remarks. I will certainly ensure that those remarks are drawn to the attention of those staff involved in commercial activities. It is important for all of us that we continue to make strong efforts to promote Britain's exports. As the hon. Gentleman knows, defence sales are an important part of Britain's export activities and an important signal of Britain's export technology. We regulate those sales in a manner that has always been exercised by Government. Although we are determined to do that, we shall ensure that there is due process and due support for export industries, including the defence industry.

Bosnia

16. Ms Southworth: When he next intends to visit Bosnia. [31813]

Mr. Robin Cook: I am pleased to be able to tell my hon. Friend that I visited Bosnia on 4 March. I was encouraged by the significant progress that has been made—particularly on the key issues of corruption, black-marketeering and poor transparency in the use of public funds, which I highlighted on my visit in July. It is a sign of the new mood in Bosnia that I was invited to address an assembly of the Republika Srpska—the first Foreign Minister to do so.

The new Government of Prime Minister Dodik have made more progress on the Dayton peace process in two months than his predecessor did in two years. However, much remains to be done. I stressed during my visit the need for more rapid results in the return of refugees to their homes, and the central importance that Britain attaches to the prosecution of all those indicted for war crimes. If we want to build a future for Bosnia based on ethnic tolerance, we must be resolute in bringing to justice those who committed the atrocities of ethnic cleansing.

Ms Southworth: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the dramatic changes that have occurred in Bosnia since last summer. I congratulate him also on the moves that have been made towards implementing the Dayton treaty, which is so important to so very many people. Does he agree that those changes are a vindication of the tough stance that he and his colleagues took at their meeting, last June, in Sintra?

Mr. Cook: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I agree that the progress that has been made in Bosnia is entirely the result of the resolute approach from outside Bosnia, coupled with the will of many people in Bosnia for peace. One of the central challenges that we now face, if we are to secure and stabilise that peace, is to ensure that we also tackle the regional dimension provided by Bosnia's neighbours. One very important message that I sent in Sarajevo is that there is no map of Europe that has on it any place for a greater Croatia or a greater Serbia.

Algeria

18. Mr. Waterson: What assessment he has made of the human rights situation in Algeria following the recent EU troika mission. [31815]

Mr. Fatchett: The Government continue to be concerned about the situation in Algeria. We discuss human rights in our bilateral contacts with the Algerians and as the European Union presidency. We are encouraging parliamentary exchanges, greater access by international media and visits by United Nations rapporteurs to strengthen democracy and the rule of law in Algeria.

Mr. Waterson: I thank the Minister for that answer. Does he agree that it is an absolute disgrace that, in this day and age, a country such as Algeria is being terrorised and brutalised, that many people are being murdered in terrorist activity, and that those atrocities have so little resonance in the world outside? Is there not more that we could do, as an individual nation and through the European Union, not only to put the spotlight on those dreadful atrocities, but to try to end them?

Mr. Fatchett: In our presidency, the United Kingdom has already taken one initiative on behalf of the European Union, responding to public concern in Europe. I led a European Union troika visit to Algeria. We established a political dialogue with the Algerian Government—part of which was to discuss the terrorist situation there—which we hope will continue. On behalf of the European Union, I invited the Algerian Minister of Foreign Affairs to come to London during the United Kingdom presidency to meet my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Corbyn: Has the Minister had an opportunity to discuss the proceedings of the parliamentary human rights group, which held an open meeting to take evidence on abuses of human rights in Algeria from a wide variety of sources—although the ambassador himself refused to attend? Is he aware that much of the evidence received by the group seemed to suggest that many of the human rights abuses and illegal killings in Algeria emanated from the army or from elements in Algerian society that are close to the army, and that there must be a very robust exchange with the Algerian Government if we are to put a stop to the killings there?

Mr. Fatchett: I have had the opportunity to read that evidence, which was shocking. It again made the point that, sadly, life is cheap in Algeria, and that too many lives have been lost there. During my visit to Algeria, I stressed to the Algerian Government that it was important for them to be open and accountable in their human rights record. I also suggested that the United Nations special rapporteurs should visit Algeria, so that they have an opportunity to report on some of the issues that have been raised by my hon. Friend. I think that that is very much the best way for the Algerian Government to deal with all the allegations and potential criticisms that have been made of them.

EU Enlargement

19. Mr. McNulty: What progress he has made towards achieving enlargement of the European Union; and if he will make a statement. [31816]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Our preparations for enlargement are on schedule. In two days, we will inaugurate the European conference. We will launch the accession process in Brussels on 30 March, and accession negotiations with six candidates will begin the next day.

Mr. McNulty: I welcome the Government's initiative in holding the conference between EU member states and applicants this Thursday. Can my hon. Friend assure me that enlargement will remain a top priority throughout the United Kingdom's presidency, and in years to come? Does he agree that we have learnt something that the Tories have never learnt—that it is not possible to be serious and positive about enlargement while being negative about the European Union?

Mr. Henderson: That is a good point. The difference between our approach to enlargement and that of the previous Government is that we believe that enlargement is important for the security of Europe and for its economic prospects. We do not favour it simply as an alternative to the deepening of the European Union.

Kosovo

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): With permission, Madam Speaker, I will make a statement on the crisis in Kosovo.

On Monday, I chaired a meeting of the six-nation contact group, which consists of Britain, the United States, the Russian Federation, France, Germany and Italy. The group met in London at my invitation. We issued a comprehensive statement, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

The whole House will share the grave concern expressed by all nations at the contact group meeting about the events in Kosovo of the past two weeks. The security operations around Dreniza in the last week appear to have left at least 80 dead. It is simply not credible that all those killed were terrorists. Of the 51 corpses released yesterday by the Serb police, less than half are believed to have been men of military age. The local press reports that 12 were children, 13 were women and four were elderly men.

Belgrade cannot claim that such extra-judicial killings are a purely internal matter. The international community has a legitimate right and a duty to condemn such gross violations of human rights. Europe has a particular responsibility to reduce violence in the Kosovar region before it produces instability in neighbouring countries.

I visited Belgrade last Thursday. I made it clear that I did so not just on behalf of Britain, but as the presidency of the European Union. I regret to tell the House that President Milosevic sought to present the events in Kosovo as a legitimate police response to terrorism. Britain's record against terrorism is firm and resolute. We strongly condemn the use of violence for political objectives, including the terrorism of the self-styled Kosovo Liberation Army. Terrorism, however, cannot be used as a pretext for the indiscriminate use of force against the civilian population.

While I was in Belgrade, I spoke to leaders of the Kosovar people, including Dr. Rugova. That leadership advocates a peaceful pursuit of legitimate political views. The international community does not support separatism in Kosovo; we do demand that Belgrade provide enhanced and real autonomy for Kosovo, without which the demands for independence are only too likely to grow. It is the tragic irony of Kosovo that its people enjoyed more autonomy under the communists than they have under President Milosevic.

On Monday, the contact group approved a lengthy statement expressing our dismay at the current repression and condemning the excessive use of force. We approved a 10-point action plan to stabilise the security position in Kosovo. Let me highlight four key objectives.

The first is justice. We urged the prosecutor of the war crimes tribunal to investigate the recent violence in Kosovo, and we invited independent forensic experts to investigate the allegations of extra-judicial killings. Those responsible for repression in Kosovo are now on notice that they cannot act with impunity.

The second objective is international monitoring within Kosovo. We called for access to Kosovo for the Red Cross and for all embassies of the contact group in Belgrade. We also supported a new mission by Felipe Gonzalez as the personal representative of the chairman of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe. If Belgrade has nothing to hide, it has nothing to fear from an increased international presence.

The third objective is regional security. The contact group agreed to arrange an early meeting with representatives of neighbouring countries, in particular to determine how to enhance the monitoring of their borders. After yesterday's meeting, I phoned the Prime Minister of Albania and the President of the former Yugoslav republic of Macedonia. Both expressed strong support for the contact group statement, and President Gligorov gave a warm welcome to our commitment that an international military presence must continue on the border with Serbia after the current United Nations mandate expires in August.

The Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd), will tomorrow visit Tirana and Skopje as a representative of the presidency of the European Union in order to discuss what more can be done to strengthen their security.

The fourth priority of our action plan is sanctions against Belgrade. The contact group resolved to take specific sanctions to underline our condemnation of its acts of repression and to encourage it to co-operate with the action plan. We endorsed four measures for immediate action.

The measures are: a resolution in the UN Security Council for a comprehensive arms embargo against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including the supply of weapons to terrorists; a refusal to supply equipment that might be used for repression or terrorism; denial of visas for senior Ministers and officials responsible for repressive action; and a moratorium on official credit for trade and investment, including privatisations, which are currently vital in maintaining the Yugoslav budget.

Five members of the contact group agreed to all those measures with immediate effect. I spoke by phone at the end of the meeting to Mr. Primakov, the Russian Foreign Minister. He agreed that Russia could support with immediate effect the arms and equipment embargo and would be willing to consider the denial of visas and the moratorium on official credit if there was no progress in Kosovo within two weeks.

We have given President Milosevic 10 days to withdraw the paramilitary forces from Kosovo and to commit himself to a process of dialogue with the leadership of the Kosovar community. If President Milosevic takes those steps, we will immediately reconsider the sanctions that we have adopted. If he fails to do so, the contact group will take further measures, including a freeze on the funds held abroad by his Government. The contact group meets again on 25 March to assess the Belgrade Government's response.

While I was in Belgrade, I also met representatives of the Serbian opposition, and gave an interview to the independent B92 broadcasting station, which has had material support from Britain. It is important that we recognise that many people in Serbia also reject the police action over the past two weeks, and want their country to accept the human rights standards of a modern European democracy.

We also want the day to come when we can welcome the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia into the family of democratic nations of Europe. We cannot do so, though, unless Belgrade starts to behave by the standards of modern Europe. It is for President Milosevic now to decide whether the future of his state and its people will be deepening isolation from Europe or enhanced co-operation. I ask for the backing of the whole House for a firm message to President Milosevic and his Government that the essential first step must be to stop the violence now.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): May I thank the Foreign Secretary for making his statement, and echo on behalf of the Opposition his condemnation of the appalling violence of the past few days? We join him in condemning the continuing repression that has caused such suffering to the majority Albanian community in Kosovo.

Like the Foreign Secretary, we condemn all violence, including that of the Kosovo Liberation Army, and welcome Dr. Rugova's continued commitment to peaceful negotiation. Will wider economic sanctions, along the lines of those that were in force before the Dayton agreement was reached, follow if Serbia does not abide by the terms proposed by the contact group? Does the Foreign Secretary consider there to be a role based on the Macedonia model for United Nations monitors in Kosovo? What progress has been made in securing access to the affected area of Dreniza to allow medical and humanitarian aid to be given?

What prospects does the Foreign Secretary see for a return to the autonomy enjoyed by Kosovo before 1989? Does he agree that Kosovo's unique position makes it crucial to the stability of the region, and, given recent remarks by President Tudjman of Croatia, does he share my anxiety at reports that Serbian Croats have also been rounded up? Can he confirm recent reports that there is growing evidence of ethnic cleansing in the Sandzak area—not in Kosovo, but on the Serbian side of the border with Bosnia east of Sarajevo? Has he had reports that women and children are arriving in Tuzla, in buses, from that area?

Will the Foreign Secretary say what steps are being taken to keep the situation under review so that the suffering of the majority population in Kosovo is brought to an end, and the danger to the stability of the region is kept to a minimum?

Mr. Cook: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his support. It is welcome to be able to speak for both sides of the House when discussing an issue of such importance in international forums, and President Milosevic should not underrate the degree of unity in the western community.

It is indeed the case that we shall consider wider economic sanctions if there is no progress on the matter between now and 25 March, when the contact group meets again. We have specifically committed ourselves to examining a freeze on the assets of the Governments outside Serbia and Montenegro.

Other steps must be considered. One of the criteria by which we shall judge on 25 March whether sanctions should be further imposed is whether President Milosevic has co-operated with the action plan, a key part of which is increased monitoring throughout Kosovo, particularly in the most affected areas. That is why our statement calls for Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe monitors and representatives of contact group embassies in Belgrade to be admitted to the region. I hope that we can at some stage secure a European Union presence in Kosovo, which would increase the openness of the region.

We have not at present managed to put medical and humanitarian assistance into Kosovo, which is a matter that we want to pursue in a broader dialogue with the Belgrade Government. We are pressing to put monitors in to find what can be done.

We have not had reports of an exodus from Sandzak. Our ambassador to Belgrade frequently travels throughout the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and was in Kosovo last week. We shall keep the situation under close review, and report to the right hon. and learned Gentleman as soon as we receive evidence of any such exodus, but he is right to say that ethnic cleansing continues throughout the former Yugoslavia.

While I was in Banja Luka, it was confirmed that a significant number of refugees from eastern Slavonia continue to arrive, where we wound up the United Nations mission on the ground that we had achieved stability and security for the minority Serb population there.

While in Sarajevo, I deeply deprecated the speech made by President Tudjman, which suggested a return to the politics of ethnic hatred and ethnic confrontation. My hon. Friend the Minister of State will visit Zagreb on his tour of the Balkan countries, and will make it plain that the way forward for the Balkans is through ethnic reconciliation, not ethnic cleansing.

Mr. John Austin (Erith and Thamesmead): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the warm support from the Albanian and Kosovar communities in London for his swift response to and condemnation of the ethnic violence of the Serbian authorities. He referred to the actions of President Rugova, who has used every constitutional and democratic means, and has been an advocate of non-violence. Is he aware of President Rugova's intention to hold elections on 22 March? What action will the contact group take to ensure that those elections proceed peacefully, so that the democratic wishes of the Albanian majority may be determined?

Mr. Cook: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his words about the speed with which we have responded. We have all learned lessons from the period in 1991 when the international community failed to respond with determination and speed; for that reason, we are anxious to try to ensure that we bring pressure to bear when the situation can be contained, rather than when it has deteriorated.

My hon. Friend is also absolutely right to say that Belgrade is fortunate in the leadership of the Albanian community in Kosovo. I met several of them while I was in Belgrade, and I was humbled by the moderation, reason and good sense of many of them in situations of intense provocation.

The elections on 22 March are what are termed parallel elections, which is to say that they are not official elections: we do not recognise those elections; we are turning a blind eye to those elections. While I was in Belgrade with President Milosevic, I urged him also to turn a blind eye to such elections, in order that they may be organised and may go forward among the local people without disruption from Belgrade.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife): May I from these Benches support the right hon. Gentleman's determination to send a firm message to President Milosevic? However, does he agree that, in spite of his best efforts, there is unwelcome gap between the legitimate and robust language of condemnation used by himself and Madeleine Albright at the weekend and the measures adopted so far by the contact group?

Does the right hon. Gentleman further agree that it would be unfortunate in the extreme if we were to allow the achievements in Bosnia over the past two years to be undermined in any way by instability in the region? Has NATO made any assessment of the consequences for Bosnia if there is continuing unrest in Kosovo? Has NATO made any assessment of the steps it might take, if invited by the UN, to assist in the restoration of order in Kosovo?

Mr. Cook: I met the Secretary-General of NATO, Javier Solana, yesterday, and discussed the situation with him. However, at a time when we are trying to de-escalate the violence and promote peaceful political dialogue, it may not be helpful to escalate what consequences may be necessary some way down the track, if the situation were to deteriorate. We are all focusing now on finding a diplomatic and political solution. If NATO has a role to play, it may well be in the follow-on force in the former Yugoslav republic of Macedonia, when the UN mandate expires in August. That is currently the only military commitment that might be in contemplation.

The hon. and learned Gentleman pointed to a gap between rhetoric and action. I should be the first to say that it is important that we are not complacent about how much has been achieved; indeed, the situation in Kosovo remains as disturbing as it was when we called the contact group.

One of the tragedies of the events of the past two weeks is that their legacy will make it more difficult to achieve the reconciliation which is our objective. However, in the 10 points of the action plan, the four points of sanctions are a robust response—much more robust than the response of the international community in the early days of the collapse of Yugoslavia, and possibly a more robust response than I would have been prepared to put money on before we had the meeting on Monday.

That meeting was five hours of intense talks, which produced substantial support, not only for robust rhetoric, but for a clear statement of our resolve expressed through specific action. I urge hon. Members not to underrate the extent to which that will increase pressure on Milosevic, especially if he is unable to finance future privatisations.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): As one of the many people who took part in relief work in Bosnia and who witnessed scenes that were a disgrace to European civilisation during four dreadful years, before NATO took a grip on the situation in that country, I urge my right hon. Friend not to allow time for any further atrocities to take place in Kosovo. Can we depend on him to insist on firm, urgent and resolute action, and, if necessary, intervention by the European members of NATO?

Mr. Cook: As I said in answer to the previous question, any question of military intervention has not been contemplated, and is not on the agenda. We seek to ensure that we achieve progress that averts the need for military intervention. Nor would such military intervention, if it were to happen, have a simple or uncomplicated impact on the region as a whole. It is much better that we make progress on the strategy that has been adopted by the contact group, but I agree with my hon. Friend: if we had intervened earlier in the conflict in Bosnia, we might not now be dug in for several years' presence, putting together a country that we allowed to fall apart.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the methods used by the security forces bear a sad resemblance to things that we have seen before? However, does he agree that perhaps one significant difference is that the war crimes tribunal is now well established? There was much cynicism about it 18 months or a year ago, but there can be no doubt about how effective it is going to be. Does he believe that a clear message must go out that, no matter how high or how low a person is in a particular country, people who have committed or ordered these atrocities will eventually face justice?

Mr. Cook: I am delighted to agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman. At Dayton, President Milosevic signed up to an obligation to co-operate with the International Court in The Hague. Its writ runs throughout the whole of former Yugoslavia, including Kosovo. There is therefore nothing to prevent the court from seeking to indict people who it believes may have committed an offence under its terms.

The hon. Gentleman is right to say that we have managed to make serious progress at The Hague. One third of the people who have been indicted by the prosecutor have been arrested and brought for trial at The Hague. That is more progress than we could have dared hope for a year ago, and I echo his words. People who remain indicted and have not yet been brought to justice should consider surrendering themselves, because there is no hiding place in the international community for those who break the law of that community.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Is the Foreign Secretary aware that even those among us who are most cautious about military intervention must recognise the appalling complexity and, indeed, peril of the situation that we have to face? In the light of the Minister of State's visit to Skopje, I recall that, two years ago, when the all-party arts and heritage group went to Thessalonika, we were harangued on the issue of greater Macedonia. What will be said about the Macedonia position? Are we talking to the Government of Greece, a European partner, which has an immediate stake in this, and what is it saying?

Mr. Cook: My hon. Friend raises a point that is an important part of the complexity of the situation, which is why I keep using the tortuous mouthful, "the former Yugoslav republic of Macedonia"; if I did not, I would receive a letter from the Greek ambassador, so I am very happy to stick to the terms of that agreement. I am pleased to say that, over the past year, relations between Greece and the former Yugoslav republic of Macedonia have considerably improved. They would be at one on the issue of ensuring that instability in Kosovo does not spill over the border.

My colleague the Foreign Secretary of Greece was in Belgrade. I will meet him on Friday when he attends the meeting of European Union Foreign Ministers in Edinburgh, and I am arranging to have a bilateral with him to discuss the position. In the meantime, I seize with delight the opportunity for my hon. Friend and me to bat on the same side again.

Mr. Martin Bell (Tatton): Is the Foreign Secretary aware of the effect of broader sanctions on the Serbs last time, which was to reward the black marketeers and racketeers and to punish and sometimes to kill the poor, the sick, the weak and the old? Can we be very careful before going down that road again?

Mr. Cook: The hon. Gentleman's words are wise and fair. It is not just the ordinary people of Serbia but Serbia's neighbouring countries who have concern on that matter. We have received representations from one or two of them expressing their deep concern that the effect of sanctions was to promote smuggling and black marketeering in their countries. That is a down side that must be fairly reflected in any decision that we make.

We must seek to impose sanctions that do not hit the poorest but hit the elite to whom we are trying to get the message across. That is why the initial list includes an arms embargo, a denial of visas to top people and the withdrawal of credit for the financing of privatisations. That is crucial to the Government of Yugoslavia, but is not so important to the daily shopping list of its people.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): Further to the earlier remarks about the Macedonian problem, does the Foreign Secretary agree that the key task now from the west's perspective is to stop the spread of this conflict throughout the region, and that Macedonia is the linchpin in that task? Does he think that 700 front-line troops—the UN troops at present in Macedonia—are remotely enough to protect Macedonia from the spread of the conflict? Does he support the urgent request that President Gligorov has often made in public and in private that the UN presence be replaced by more sizeable NATO forces at the key strategic points on the frontier with Kosovo?

Mr. Cook: There may be only 700 troops and they may therefore be of limited immediate military effect on a very difficult border, but they are overwhelmingly American troops, and that immensely concentrates the minds of Belgrade if they ever think of doing anything on that border.

I spoke to President Gligorov yesterday after the contact group meeting. I am pleased to say that he said several times that the result was a good one. He was particularly pleased that we had obtained a commitment to a follow-on force after August. For the first time, Russia raised no objection to that. In the current state of Kosovo, that is an important step forward. Precisely what that follow-on force might be has yet to be resolved, but we now have strong international commitment to making sure that it continues.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the main objective of policy, at least for the present, must be to re-establish the autonomous status that Kosovo enjoyed before 1989? Will he take every opportunity in his discussions with Dr. Rugova and others to stress that the separatist solution would not receive the backing of the western community, and that the western community would not support an independent state of Kosovo or any union between Kosovo and the adjoining states, other than, of course, Serbia?

Mr. Cook: I agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman that there is no map for a greater Croatia or a greater Serbia, and equally there must be no map for a greater Albania. We said in the statement of the contact group yesterday, and I repeated in my statement this afternoon, that it was not our position to support an independent Kosovo. Of course, if Belgrade does not respond to the legitimate political demands of the people of Kosovo—for instance, to have control over their own education and to be taught in their own language—that will fuel demands for independence.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned restoration of the pre-1989 autonomy. When I discussed that with some of the younger Albanians from Kosovo, they said that, while that would be welcome, for it to work there would need to be changes within Serbia. A successful solution to the crisis does not simply require greater autonomy for Kosovo. It also requires more freedom of expression, more pluralism, more democracy and more participation of the people within Serbia in the political process.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge): I thank the Foreign Secretary for speaking to the independent radio station B92, as I have been involved with its efforts to maintain independence during the period of repression. While I in no way condone the actions of the Serbs, I urge that we remember the importance to the Serbian national identity of the whole region of Kosovo. The battle of Kosovo is as important to Serbian history as Magna Carta is to England.

Mr. Cook: Yes, I have had that view expressed to me several times in Belgrade. The battle was fought in 1389: the Serbs lost. The case was made to me by President Milosevic that Kosovo was the spiritual home of the Serb kings. I respect people's identity with their cultural history—it should be handled with dignity—but that is a difficult basis on which to found a territorial claim so many hundreds of years later.

When I was interviewed by the people at B92, I was impressed by the fact that they were as lively, cosmopolitan and pluralist in outlook as young people in any other country of Europe. In that generation there is hope for the future of Serbia and the Balkans—but they must be given the opportunity to express themselves.

This week, the Belgrade Government make an important series of decisions about the awarding of radio frequencies for the independent stations. I very much hope, particularly at this moment in history, that they will not close down any of the independent stations by denying them a frequency.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): The Foreign Secretary has referred to mistakes made in the past. I welcome the broad thrust of his remarks this afternoon, but does he agree that one mistake made by politicians on both sides of the House and by certain parts of the Foreign Office in the past was to regard President Milosevic as a moderating force on the excesses of the Bosnian Serbs? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that, far from being a moderating force, he was an instigator of those excesses? Would he further agree that it is unwise to say "never" to the use of force, because, if the atrocities get worse, force will have to be used?

Mr. Cook: I know that the hon. Gentleman's wing of his party does not regard the Foreign Office as really having been a part of the previous Government—but I am afraid that it was. If errors were made last time, they are errors for which Ministers in power at the time must accept responsibility.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): The Foreign Secretary is to be commended on his prompt response in going in person to Belgrade to confront the malign reality in power there. Can he state unequivocally that, for a settlement to endure, it will ultimately have to be based on the fundamental democratic principle of self-determination for the people of Kosovo?

Is it not that principle which distinguishes our system in the free part of Europe from what has existed in the Republic of Yugoslavia in the past, be it under communism or under the rump that remains? Can he assure the House that he will keep together the contact group—not least the Americans, who should maintain a military presence in whatever force is located in Macedonia in the medium and longer term?

Mr. Cook: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right: it is important to maintain unity, and we shall work hard to do so. I felt that yesterday's discussions, particularly my phone call with Foreign Minister Primakov, demonstrated the extent to which peer group pressure now produces a much more common front among nations in the international community. I am pleased that we managed to achieve that much agreement.

The hon. Gentleman is also right to say that there is a long way to go; we must watch the situation with the greatest of care. I assure the House and the hon. Gentleman that we will do so.

Adoption and Fostering

4.3 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require local authorities, when considering adoption or fostering, to make use of married couples unless they can show that no such couples are available who meet the needs of the child; and for connected purposes.

I am grateful to Members of all parties who have agreed to co-sponsor my Bill.

We have a special responsibility to unwanted children. Not only do they have no voice of their own, but it is very sad that any child should be without a loving home. We all read from time to time, with a shudder, of young lives that have been ruined by physical and sexual abuse, drug taking or child prostitution. We are failing the most vulnerable and defenceless members of our community.

Perhaps the worst features are the horrendous statistics associated with children in care—the very children whom the state has taken as its own responsibility. The occasional inquiries into the torture and abuse of children in some children's homes represent only a small part of the total picture. We know, of course, that there are many workers in children's homes who struggle to provide a decent life for some very difficult and damaged children, but the overall statistics for children leaving care are terrible.

A child leaving care is 50 times as likely as a typical youngster of the same age to end up in prison, and far more likely to become a drug addict. Perhaps most shocking is the fact that a quarter of all the girls who have been in care became pregnant while they were in care, and one in seven are pregnant at the point of leaving care. The abuse among boys is at much the same level.

Those evils are passed on to the next generation. We remember the tragic case of Rikki Neave, the six-year-old who was repeatedly beaten, tortured and finally choked to death by his natural mother, herself a graduate of our so-called system of care.

Yet there is one highly underrated institution that serves so many of those children so well: adoption. Studies from the United States, Australia, New Zealand and this country have shown the astonishing success of adoption. Adopted children not only do much better than those in care, which is perhaps to be expected because some of the most damaged children must be kept in care, as no one wants to adopt them; children adopted from care also do very much better than those children from care who are returned to their natural parents.

Perhaps most surprising of all, the studies show that damaged children adopted from care by married couples do better on average than children who have never been in care, who are raised in certain categories of natural family, including those raised in single-parent families headed by a young, never-married mother.

However, adoption has collapsed numerically. From 21,000 adoptions 20 years ago, the figure was down to less than 6,000 last year. I draw the attention of the House to three features of current adoption practice, besides the dramatic fall in the absolute numbers.

First, while most adoptions are still with married couples, there is a growing tendency for some local authorities to place children with individuals who are in other forms of union. There was the celebrated case last year, for example, of the 11-year-old boy whom Southwark sought to place with a homosexual who was in a supposedly stable relationship with another man. What was Southwark trying to achieve?

I believe that we should be tolerant towards adult unions of all sorts, where only adults are concerned, but a child of 11 does not have the mature sexuality that would allow it to make a free choice as to the sort of sexual relationship in which it wants its minders to be involved. Indeed, I do not know whether the child in that case tried to make such a choice. Children must not be allowed to become the pawns of some social workers in the battle that they are fighting for their own social and political agenda.

The institution of marriage, even in this era of divorce, is still an astonishing success. A child born to a married couple has a better than four in five chance that 10 years later its parents will still be together. On the other hand, according to the latest British household panel survey, a child born to a couple who are not married but in an allegedly stable relationship has only a one in five chance of his parents remaining together for 10 years—unless they subsequently marry.

So many married couples who are unable to have their own children would dearly love the opportunity to adopt a child and, in some cases, are willing to adopt very damaged children from the care system. It is sad to hear that such couples are often denied that opportunity. In one case, a mixed race couple were denied the opportunity to adopt a coloured child because social services in the authority concerned considered that they had suffered insufficient racial harassment to provide a good home for the child. What nonsense.

Alongside the practice of placing some children with unmarried individuals in other relationships and imposing unfair restrictions on some married couples who would dearly love to adopt, there is a third feature of adoption that I believe has been insufficiently examined: the financial risk to a family who take on a severely emotionally damaged child from care. I am at present dealing with a constituency case involving a married couple who adopted two girls who had been severely sexually abused. One of the adoptions succeeded, but, sadly, after a long struggle, the couple were forced to relinquish the other girl back into care.

At the time of adoption, the parents were forced to take on the full legal responsibilities that natural parents would assume. That is fair enough when a child is adopted at birth. However, the social services department is pursuing this couple for an enormous bill for the care of the second child, even though the couple have provided a good home for one child and struggled very hard with the other. That hardly seems just.

That brings me to the specific proposals in my Bill. First, local authorities should be required to consider adoption for all children who have been taken into care as a result of being severely physically or sexually abused, putting the interests of the child, not the natural parents, first. Secondly, wherever possible, adoption should be granted to married couples unless it can be shown that no suitable married couple are available.

Thirdly, when adoption is not an option—probably because a child is so damaged that no one can be found to take him on—the alternative should be fostering by a married couple. I do not deny the splendid work done by some individual carers. However, where possible, it is best that fostering should be undertaken by married couples, for the reasons I have outlined.

Fourthly, when children are adopted out of care, the authority should have to sign a financial waiver so that, if an adoption fails and the child returns to care, the parents are not put at financial risk. Finally, the Bill seeks to give the Secretary of State the power to intervene when a local authority fails to follow these rules, and to give that authority's control over adoption to a voluntary agency.

In our country today—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's 10 minutes have expired. I understand that there is opposition to the Bill.

4.13 pm

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): In rising to speak against the Bill, I sincerely congratulate the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) on at least raising in the House the tremendously important subject of fostering and adoption. I come from a professional background of managing fostering and adoption, and have great sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's genuine, obvious desire to ensure that children in care are given the security, consistency, respect, consideration, guidance and all-round care they need.

I would counsel the hon. Gentleman to reflect on the fact that adoption is not a panacea. It is an over-simplification to say that it can be a solution for all children who have been abused and then come into care. Nor is fostering as an alternative to adoption invariably better than residential care. Many young people, particularly adolescents, make a positive choice for residential care rather than go back into a family.

No adult has a right to be a foster carer or adopter, but, like the hon. Gentleman, I want children in care to be offered excellent placements where they can have good experience of family life that meets their needs and helps them to prepare for the future. I just do not think that the hon. Gentleman's Bill is the way to do it, because, despite what it says, it would run the risk of undoing the Children Act 1989 principle—the good social work practice principle—that the needs of children are paramount. The very act of requiring local authorities to show that no married couples are available who could meet needs means that some aspects of real needs could be compromised to avoid criticism.

Matching children with foster carers or adopters is an extremely complex task, wherein all the growing and developing needs of children from a vast variety of backgrounds, who have often been abused, rejected and neglected, must be matched carefully to the assessed abilities and qualities of prospective carers. It is not an exact science—far from it. It is a matter of delicate and subtle judgment. At its heart, it is about working with human relationships.

In assessing foster carers, it is, of course, vital to gauge the quality and commitment of people's personal relationships, but it seems inappropriate to elevate a couple's marital status so that it could begin to be more important than factors such as whether the prospective carers really have the skills to work with children who have been sexually abused; whether they have the ability to work with birth families; and whether they share a cultural background, which is important, or can tolerate extreme acting-out behaviour. Social work is extremely sensitive, acute—sometimes intuitive—work that does not always fit comfortably within the bureaucracy of local authorities. The Bill would establish another unhelpful rule.

Children in care need flexibility and tolerance. They need to have their views heeded, and sometimes they need very caring people to be prepared to take risks. They do not need the imposition of moral imperatives that are nothing to do with keeping them safe or meeting their individual needs.

In this day and age—let us face it—one does not have to be married, or even be in a relationship, to provide excellent care for children. Indeed, there is evidence that, in some circumstances, one group of much-maligned potential carers—single parents—can have more to offer than couples. Crucially, it may be easier for a child, especially one from a disturbed background, to attach to one new adult rather than two.

Research carried out by Dr. Morag Owen from the university of Sussex and published by the British Agencies for Adoption and Fostering, considered the experience of 48 children who had been adopted by single people. Some of the children felt that it was an advantage to have one parent: the views of two adults did not have to be reconciled, and there was real consistency. Girls who had been sexually abused valued the opportunity to have a one-to-one relationship with a caring woman. The study concluded that, given the needs of children in the care system, single people are often uniquely equipped to parent them.

However, single people are often deterred from coming forward for assessment as foster carers or prospective adopters. We need more placements, particularly for older children with more complex needs and challenging problems. But giving priority to married couples could well mean that even fewer single parents or couples living together would present themselves for what should in any case be the challenging and rigorous process of assessment.

I am concerned about the Bill. It is highly unlikely that it will become law, but were it to do so, it could undermine the chances of some of the most needy children in our society to have a decent childhood. I do not intend to take up the time of the House by pressing the matter to a Division, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will reflect upon what I have said, and decide not to proceed with the Bill.

A Bill which celebrated the rich variety of adoptive and foster placements in Britain, which promoted adoption and fostering as some of the most profoundly important tasks which all sorts of adults in all sorts of relationships and none can undertake, and which offered better training, support and recognition, would be a much better Bill, and that would have my whole-hearted support.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 23 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business), and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Julian Brazier, Sir Peter Lloyd, Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe, Mr. Andrew Rowe, Mr. Tom Cox, Sir Teddy Taylor, Mrs. Ann Winterton, Mrs. Marion Roe, Mr. John Burnett, Mr. Peter Bottomley and Rev. Martin Smyth.

ADOPTION AND FOSTERING

Mr. Julian Brazier accordingly presented a Bill to require local authorities, when considering adoption or fostering, to make use of married couples unless they can show that no such couples are available who meet the needs of the child; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 27 March, and to be printed [Bill 141].

Ministerial Correspondence

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid–Bedfordshire): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I have a letter in my hand purportedly from the Minister for Local Government and Housing. It is not addressed in the form that is customary in this place, it is not signed and, although I wrote on 14 January, I did not receive a reply until 9 March. Would you agree that such conduct is discourteous, and if Ministers demonstrate by their actions a belief that Parliament no longer matters, it is not surprising that the BBC follows suit?

Madam Speaker: I refer the hon. Gentleman to an exchange which took place on various points of order last Thursday, when the Leader of the House was in her place. The right hon. Lady answered questions at the Dispatch Box only yesterday, and she will not be doing so again until 6 April. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman forms a question for the Leader of the House, setting out the matter and asking for reasons for the delay and the lack of signature. In the meantime, no doubt Ministers concerned will report the matter to the appropriate place.

Opposition Day

[9TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Taxation

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

4.23 pm

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden): I beg to move,

That this House deplores the fact that the Government broke its pledge not to raise taxes by raising 17 taxes in its first Budget; notes that, although the full impact of many of these taxes, such as the Pensions Tax and higher business taxes, was not immediately apparent to the public, these taxes will undermine Britain's economic success and people's retirement incomes in the long term; and urges the Government not to introduce any further hidden taxes in the forthcoming Budget.

With the Budget only a week away, I am sure that the House will not expect Ministers to give us details of their tax plans today. Hon. Members are becoming used to the fact that the House is the last to be informed of any Government policy. But we expect Ministers to answer for the hidden taxes that the Government have introduced so far—hidden taxes on pension funds, savings and business, not to mention extra taxes on motorists, students, smokers and home owners.

Before the last election, Labour had to convince a sceptical electorate that it had changed. It said that it was no longer the party of tax and spend. It claimed to have undergone a conversion, so it invoked biblical language to persuade people that it was genuine. The Prime Minister, in messianic mode, told his conference:

"I vow that promises we make on tax, we will keep. This is my covenant with the British people. Judge me upon it."

New Labour, Old Testament. When the Prime Minister said,

"We will not increase taxes at all", people believed him. The Chancellor of the Exchequer took a high moral tone. He said:

"We will not make promises we will later break, we will not say one thing before the election and another after. Above all, we will be straight with the British people about tax."

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Alistair Darling): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the promise we made was that we would not increase the top or basic rate of income tax?

Mr. Lilley: I was quoting the Prime Minister, then Leader of the Opposition. According to a report in the Financial Times on 21 September 1997, the right hon. Gentleman said at a meeting in Birmingham a few months before the election:

"We have no plans to increase tax at all."

If the Chief Secretary wishes to dissociate himself from the Prime Minister, he should have done so before the election, not afterwards.

As I was saying, the Chancellor also took a high moral tone. He said:

"We will not make promises we will later break, we will not say one thing before the election and another after. Above all, we will be straight with the British people about tax. That is why at the General Election we will spell out quite clearly our tax plans, so the British people know what we intend to do. There will be no lies, no deceit."

When he said,

"Apart from the Windfall Tax, Labour's plans do not require any extra taxes", people felt that they could believe him. They did not realise that the Chancellor intended to impose hidden taxes—taxes that he had hidden from the voters before the election and which he hoped would be largely invisible after their implementation.

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): The right hon. Gentleman says that the Labour party said that it would spell out to the electorate what its tax promises were. As a candidate I know that they were explained in the manifesto on which I fought and won my seat. Can he cite a single promise from that manifesto—not from newspaper reports or cuttings—that the Government have broken?

Mr. Lilley: I was quoting from a speech by the Chancellor given just before last year's Budget—I will be addressing the same audience tomorrow. He said that he would spell out clearly the Government's tax plans so that the British people would know what they were. When did he spell out clearly to people with pensions that he planned a £5 billion annual tax on their pension funds? When did he spell out to business men that he planned £22 billion of extra taxes on the corporate sector? When did he spell out to savers that he would impose the savings tax that we debated last week?

Mr. Ivor Caplin (Hove): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lilley: No, I will get on because I have many questions to which the Chief Secretary may wish to reply.

When did the Chancellor spell out to home owners that he would tax their mortgages by cutting relief even while interest rates were rising? When did he spell out to students that he would impose a pay-as-you-learn tax on higher education? When did he spell out clearly to motorists, especially rural motorists, that he would raise extra taxes on petrol?

Those are the questions that the Chief Secretary must answer today. The Government think that they can get away with deceiving the British people, betraying their pledges and concealing the cost. The cost will come through and then the facts will be clear. They will not get away with it: the facts will not let them; we will not let them; and the British people will not let them.

Mr. Darling: The right hon. Gentleman will find a clear reference in our manifesto to the fact that we intended to review corporation tax. And does he accept that the previous Government, of which he was a member, were committed to a real increase in road fuel duties every year?

Mr. Lilley: During the election campaign, I warned people with pensions that Labour might be planning to abolish tax credits, and that that would hit them. The Times reported the then shadow Chief Secretary as saying:

"there was no basis for the Tories' claims. They were desperate talk intended to frighten."

I will give way to the Chief Secretary if he wishes to explain that. Since the election, the Chancellor has dropped the Chief Secretary from his circulation list—what a shame that the Chancellor did not send him his "no lies, no deceit" speech about taxes before the election.

Labour thought that people would not understand the changes that it was making to taxes on dividends. Labour hoped that people would not recognise that money was being siphoned out of their pension funds until they retired and found that their pensions were smaller than they expected or, if they had already retired, until they found that their pensions did not rise as much as they hoped. The last person who thought he could get away with robbing pensions was another Labour Member of Parliament and business colleague of some absent Treasury Ministers, Robert Maxwell—the original bouncing Czech. That is why I dubbed the July Budget the Robert Maxwell memorial Budget at the time.

The Chancellor cannot claim that this back-door tax was foisted on gullible new Ministers by Treasury officials. All the evidence suggests that it was cooked up in opposition. It was concealed from the electorate—and even civil servants were not consulted until the last minute. That is why the tax has stumbled like a drunken man from one change to the next. The Paymaster General was supposed to have brought his immense business expertise to bear on it. All I can say is that if this is the best example of his work, he is not worth the money he is not paid.

Ms Ruth Kelly (Bolton, West): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that tax credits on pension funds were a gross distortion of the tax system? Will his party reinstate those tax credits if it returns to power?

Mr. Lilley: Of course I do not accept that the credits were a distortion. On the contrary, the imputation tax system was the least distorting form of tax. I am glad that the hon. Lady accepts that we will form the next Government. I cannot tell her how many of the Labour party's messes we will restore because I fear that there will be many more on top of this.

Mr. Caplin: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the UK has the lowest rates of corporation tax?

Mr. Lilley: The changes introduced by the Government reduce the rate but increase the tax take by £8 billion during this Parliament. We reduced the burden of tax on business, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) can vouch for that.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, if a company issues a false prospectus and its directors ask for support on the basis of promises that they have no intention of keeping, those directors go to gaol? What does he think should happen to the Labour party, which asked for, and got, the support of the people on the basis of false promises?

Mr. Lilley: In politics, the penalty is usually inflicted by the electorate—as we ourselves have been known to find out.

What is particularly appalling about Labour's pensions tax is that it threatens a great Conservative success. We encouraged people to build up personal and occupational pension funds. As a result, Britain has more money invested to pay for future pensions, not just than any other country in Europe but than all the other countries in the European Union put together. It is criminal to put that at risk, as this tax does.

Faced with the charge that the tax was being levied at the expense of pensioners, the Government have come up with the most preposterous defence. They claim that the tax is unique. It might raise £5 billion at the expense of pension funds, but the Financial Secretary said that that would be good for pensions, good for pension funds and good for pensioners. In short, she thinks that taxation is good for people—except for the Paymaster General, for whom it is too good. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] He is probably in Guernsey.

The Chancellor flatly denied that the pensions tax would have an impact on the value of pensions, but the Government Actuary said otherwise. He concluded:

"The tax changes resulting from the July 1997 budget . . . potentially affect all forms of contracted-out pension funds."

He calculated that pension contributions need to go up by some 12 per cent. For most members of pension schemes, that is equivalent to more than 1p on their income tax. Labour raises taxes whereas we cut them.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that he was a member of the Cabinet when Mr. Lamont first cut the tax credit on dividends and raised £1 billion by doing so?

Mr. Lilley: Surely the hon. Gentleman recognises that the then Chancellor introduced a target 20p rate of tax and aligned the tax credit with it at that time.

The pension tax will come through gradually, but the extra petrol tax was slipped in overnight. By introducing an extra rise in July, slapping on 4p per litre and accelerating future increases, the Chancellor pocketed a cool £730 million of extra tax. If he jacks up petrol taxes yet again next week, there will have been three such new tax rises in 16 months.

Many people have no choice but to pay that extra tax. For most people in rural areas, driving is a necessity, not a luxury. The trouble is that the Government simply do not understand the countryside. They do not care about people who live in rural areas and they do not realise that they need to be able to plan for the future. If the Chancellor wants to regain respect for his party in the countryside, he should drop his plans for yet another petrol tax hike next week.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lilley: No, I wish to make progress.

We must hope that the Chancellor makes a better fist of next week's Budget than he did of last July's. As millions of mortgage holders and business men have been finding out, that Budget was seriously misjudged. In his Budget speech, the Chancellor argued that higher taxes were needed to cool consumer spending. Then, far from taxing consumers and spending, he piled the bulk of his extra taxes on business and savings: £22 billion of extra tax on the corporate sector over the course of this Parliament; taxes on pensions; and taxes on PEPs and TESSAs. Despite his own arguments, he left consumers largely unchecked and the Bank of England has been raising interest rates every since.

Businesses have had the worst of both worlds: higher taxes and higher interest rates, leading to an overvalued pound, clobbering exports, hitting manufacturing, and putting jobs at risk. Does not the Chancellor realise that taking £22 billion from industry leaves it with that much less to invest and create jobs? Do not Labour Members realise—they must see evidence of it in their constituencies—that the Chancellor has brought manufacturing industry to the brink of recession? They may not be able to see that, but we can. Labour is bad for business and we shall defend business against Labour's tax rises.

The Chancellor cannot claim that he opened the books and found that he needed all that extra tax—so much that he had to break his solemn pre-election pledges. On the contrary, he opened the books and found that we had left him with a golden economic legacy. The Budget deficit is falling even faster than my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe forecast in his last Budget. That should mean that borrowing can be eliminated with less of a rise in the tax burden than anticipated, but instead the Chancellor has been deliberately adding to it.

According to the Government's own figures, the Chancellor now plans, by the turn of the century, to take nearly 3 per cent. more of national income in taxes than in the last year of the Conservative Government. That is equivalent to nearly 10 extra days of tax paying in the course of the year. In the last year of the Conservative Government, taxpayers had to work from 1 January to 10 May to pay off their dues to the state—10 May was tax freedom day. Thereafter, every penny that they earned was their own to spend, give, save or invest as they chose, but under the Labour Government, people will have to work until 20 May to clear their taxes. They will have to do 10 more days of hard labour. That is the price of Labour's plans.

Labour Members cannot claim that it does not matter because the bulk of the taxes fall on businesses, not individuals. All taxes are paid by ordinary people, through higher bills, lower pensions or less take-home pay. As Professor John Kay, a new Labour business guru, says:

> "There is no such thing as a tax on firms: the effective incidence of all taxes is ultimately on individuals."

All taxes fall on individuals, but not all individuals pay taxes—indeed, not all Treasury Ministers pay taxes, or not as much as they should, according to the Chancellor, who said:

> "It cannot be right that the decent hard-working majority, paying their share of tax, should watch a minority abusing the system, using scams, loopholes and dodges; distortions in the tax system which must be eliminated."

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): Where is the Paymaster General?

Mr. Lilley: In Guernsey.

It is true that on Friday the Treasury announced that it was cracking down on offshore trusts. It said that a tax loophole would be closed to prevent wealthy individuals from bringing their trusts onshore to avoid capital gains tax. That is all well and good, but the new policy fails the Robinson test: it leaves the Paymaster General in the clear. He is still a tax-free zone. While the rest of us have to work for an extra 10 days a year to finance the Government, he keeps his £12 million offshore to finance his retirement. It seems that the only tax that the Chancellor will not raise is a tax on his hon. Friend the Paymaster General.

In his pre-Budget report, the Chancellor reaffirmed his promise to introduce a 10p starting rate of income tax. We now learn from the newspapers that he may defer it—how typical of Labour. The Government drive ahead with raising taxes in defiance of their pledges, but hold back on the one tax cut that they promised.

Let there be no doubt where we stand on a 10p tax rate. Any reduction in tax is welcome, especially after the hidden tax rises that we have had from the Government so far. We shall hold the Chancellor to all his promises on the 10p rate. Does he recall his pre-election pledge, when he said:

> "We would ensure that all lower and middle-income families receive the full benefit of the tax cut"?

Will he guarantee that he will not claw back the benefit of the 10p rate from basic rate taxpayers by starting the basic rate at a lower rate of income or by cutting allowances? It is bad enough that the Chancellor has broken his promise not to raise taxes; it would be a disgrace if he did not carry out one of his few tax-cutting commitments in full.

The Government were elected on the basis of the most solemn pledges—

Mr. Darling: The right hon. Gentleman is urging my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to reduce the starting rate of income tax to 10p, but in today's Financial Times he said that he was against that measure.

Mr. Lilley: I certainly did not. On the contrary, I said in the document reported in the Financial Times that we would support the reduction but that we thought that the Government would introduce it in a way that merely clawed back higher up the income scale and, that in that case, it would not be a genuine tax cut. That is the point that I have been making while the right hon. Gentleman has not been listening. The right hon. Gentleman should get his interventions right and ensure that he is on sounder ground than he has been so far.

The Government were elected on the basis of the most solemn pledges not to raise taxes, but they say one thing and do another. Before the election, the Chancellor said that he wanted to encourage investment, yet he is siphoning £5 billion a year from Britain's biggest source of investment capital. The Prime Minister said that he wanted pensioners to be cherished and valued to the end of their days. If so, why is he plundering their pension schemes? So much for the giving age; it is more like the give and take age: they take and we give.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): Is it not precisely those people on low income who will be hit by the changes in advance corporation tax credits? Their pensions will be lower and their savings in the form of PEPs and TESSAs, on which they were relying for their old age, will be less, so they will become a greater burden on the state.

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The Government have actually reduced the reliefs available to low-income savers and reduced the system that we set up so that it is attractive only to upper rate income tax payers.

The one thing of which we can be sure is that Labour Budgets mean higher taxes. When the former right hon. and learned Member for Putney, David Mellor, said that he did not just mean old Labour. Old Labour was honest about raising taxes. New Labour introduces hidden taxes. Old Labour taxed wealth. New Labour taxes by stealth, and it is a racing certainty that there will be more taxes in the next Budget.

"dogs bark, cats miaow and Labour puts up taxes",

In just 10 months we have had a pensions tax, a savings tax, a student tax, more business tax, higher petrol tax, higher tobacco tax, higher mortgage tax and the highest ever council tax. The Government have broken their promises, abandoned their vows and cast aside their covenants, but they cannot escape the judgment of the British people. Labour cannot be trusted on taxes.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Alistair Darling): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"commends the Government for honouring its election promises not to increase the top or basic rate of income tax, to reduce VAT on domestic fuel to five per cent. and to introduce the levy on the windfall profits of the privatised utilities; approves the Government's determination to put in place a fair tax system, to encourage investment and long-term sustainable growth; believes that Britain's interests lie in the pursuit of sound economic policies that will benefit the many and not just the few, and which are in the long-term interests of the whole country; and urges the Government to reject any return to the boom and bust policies of the past which resulted in the 22 tax rises imposed by the previous administration.".

As regards the judgment of the British people, within recent memory the British people have shown which party they trust to form the Government of this country.

The Labour Government are delighted to be having this debate, even if to a large—

Mr. Lilley: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Darling: I shall certainly give way a little later.

The Labour Government are delighted to be having this debate, even if it is, to a large extent, a re-run of the general election. That is not surprising because, in many ways, the Conservative party has still not come to terms with its defeat. It cannot accept that it lost the last election because it lost the trust of the country. No one believed the Conservatives then, and no one believes them now: nothing has changed.

I shall demonstrate that proposition by looking at two winning manifestos. No doubt Conservatives will remember the first one—

Mr. Lilley rose—

Mr. Darling: I shall give way because I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman remembers what was in the Tory manifesto of 1992. It said that the Conservative party wanted to continue to reduce taxes as fast as it could. But during the last Government's term of office a typical family—this afternoon Conservative Members have been professing concern about families and people on lower incomes—paid an extra £2,000 in tax. How does the right hon. Gentleman justify that?

Mr. Lilley: Is the right hon. Gentleman going to apologise to the British people for what he said before the election, which has been rebutted and refuted since?

Mr. Darling: I shall come to our manifesto in just a minute.

The Conservatives fought the 1992 election explicitly on tax, and they won. We all remember the pollsters and the so-called double whammy. The Conservatives won the election because they fought it on tax; indeed, they tried to fight the last election in 1997 on exactly the same grounds, but they failed because they had been condemned by their very own actions.

We also remember the then Prime Minister saying in March 1992:

"Low tax opens doors . . . High tax slams the doors on the hopes that are common to all."

There have been a lot of slamming doors in the course of the last few years.

Mr. Sayeed rose—

Mr. Darling: How does the hon. Gentleman justify that? He should know because he lost his seat in 1992.

Mr. Sayeed: The right hon. Gentleman said that an average family paid £2,000 more tax during the previous Parliament, from 1992 to 1997. Will he remind the House by how much the income of an average family increased during that period?

Mr. Darling: Incomes have been rising over many years. The hon. Gentleman and his colleagues fought the 1992 general election on an explicit promise of reducing taxes—[Interruption.] They said:

"Conservatives have an 'allergy to tax'", and that they were

"fighting for low taxation"—

[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. We can hear only one speech at a time.

Mr. Darling: Memories of 1992 seem to be painful for Conservative Members—although they are perhaps rather less painful than memories of 1997. So I shall turn to that manifesto. Labour's 1997 general election manifesto made it clear that we would not increase the top or the basic income tax rates. That was our promise—which we kept in our first Budget, last year, and which we will keep in every single year of this Parliament.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): If the Chief Secretary says that the Labour party did not rule out tax rises before the Budget, does he deny also that, on 8 January 1997, on "The World at One", the Prime Minister said:

"What I have said is the programme of the Labour party does not imply any tax increases at all"?

Mr. Darling: The charge that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was referring to was one that had been made by the previous Government—that we had all sorts of hidden spending plans, which we did not have. We are sticking to the previous Government's spending plans, as we said we would.

As for hidden taxes, our manifesto was absolutely clear about what we would do. Moreover, we were repeatedly questioned on our pledge on the top and basic income tax rates. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor were questioned on that pledge, as was everyone else. The only ones who might not have noticed our pledge were Conservative Members—but that does not surprise me. On most days of the general election campaign, they were not fighting us so much as they were fighting each other. It is therefore not surprising that they did not notice what was in our manifesto.

Everyone who went to the polls on 1 May 1997 would have been very aware of our statements, and of our explicit promise on the top and basic income tax rates. I remember my right hon. Friend the Chancellor saying that no prudent Chancellor or shadow Chancellor could ever exclude examining other aspects of the tax system—which was the same point that was made, to his credit, by the former Chancellor, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who is in the Chamber. No Chancellor would want to box himself in in such a manner.

We have kept our promises on the top and basic rates of income tax, and we have kept two other tax promises. First, we delivered on our promise to reduce to 5 per cent. VAT on domestic fuel. Secondly—yes, we will plead guilty to a tax rise—we delivered on our promise to impose a windfall tax on the privatised utilities. We implemented that tax, and the new deal—which that tax is largely financing—is about to be rolled out across the country.

The shadow Chancellor said that we inherited a "golden legacy"—but we inherited a situation in which the national debt had doubled in six years. We are now paying £26 billion annually on servicing that debt, which is more than we spend on schools.

Again in 1992, the Conservative party presented itself as the party of sound finance—which was one of the many reasons why it lost the 1997 general election. People did not believe Conservatives on tax, or in their ability to control public spending. People remembered what the Conservative party said in 1992—that it would not increase taxes. In March 1992, Norman Lamont said that he could not "see any circumstances in which that would be necessary."

Yet, a year later, he was piling on taxes at every opportunity.

What about VAT? Let us recall what the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), said about that. In March 1992, he said:

"We have no plans and no need to increase the impact of VAT."

Two days later, he said:

"There will be no VAT increase."—[Official Report, 28 January 1992; Vol. 202, c. 808.]

He said that he had

"made it clear. We have no need and no plans to extend the scope of VAT."

Yet, on 16 March 1993, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer increased VAT on domestic fuel.

The VAT increase did not come as a surprise to Labour Members. We remember that, in 1979, we were accused of telling lies when we said that the Tories, if they were elected to government, would double VAT. The first thing that they did in government was to increase VAT from 8 per cent. to 15 per cent.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Will the Chief Secretary explain why he and the Chancellor of the Exchequer continue alleging that the previous Government left such a terrible debt legacy, whereas only three countries in Europe meet the Maastricht debt criteria—Britain being one of them, ahead of France, Germany and Italy, all of which will not meet those criteria? How can we have left such a terrible debt legacy?

Mr. Darling: It is a pleasure to hear Conservative Members praying in aid, rather than abusing, other European countries. I repeat that the situation that we inherited was one in which debt was being added annually. We cannot sustain a situation in which the country spends more on servicing those debt levels than on education. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made clear in his Budget last year, and again when he introduced last year's pre-Budget report, our strategy has been to ensure that we have sustainable and sound public finances—which the Conservative party did not see to during its 18 years in government.

Mr. Geraint Davies: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, between November 1996 and November 1997, the forecast for net public sector debt towards the end of the century decreased by £16 billion, which will be a £1 billion annual saving in interest costs?

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): Because of Conservative policies.

Mr. Davies: That decrease is not a hidden tax cost but a hidden tax reduction—which we would not have achieved with a Conservative Government.

Mr. Darling: The hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) said that the saving was achieved by

[Mr. Darling]

Conservative policies, but it was achieved by the action taken by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in ensuring that debt levels are reduced, so that our public finances are sustainable.

Mr. Sayeed: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way on that?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) rose—

Mr. Darling: No, I will not. I am very conscious that this is an Opposition debate, and I should not wish to intrude on the speeches that Opposition Members would like to make. However, I shall certainly give way to the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe.

Mr. Clarke: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will agree that I have been fairly patient while listening to his bizarre interpretation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's inheritance. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the Government took over a situation in which I had underestimated the rate at which the public sector borrowing requirement was falling and in which we were on course for a balanced Budget before the end of the century—with the inevitable consequence that we were on course to reduce the national debt as a percentage of gross domestic product?

Will the Chief Secretary also recall that, when we fought the general election, our only economic debate was on Labour's plans to increase taxation? The then Chief Secretary and I stated possible ways in which we thought that the Labour party would raise taxation for various reasons—including its spending commitments to allow local authorities to spend capital receipts and to ease capping limits, which the Government have implemented.

The Chief Secretary and the Chancellor denied any intention of raising taxes. During the general election campaign, we were accused of scaremongering, as the Chancellor denied in terms that he would touch PEPs or TESSAs, or that he would tackle the tax treatment of pension funds. As the Chief Secretary looks back to the general election, he should look back with shame.

Mr. Darling: Last night, when I wrote to the right hon. and learned Gentleman stating that I might refer to him in the debate, I knew that he would probably turn up just to hear what I said about him. I shall deal with some of those points—[Interruption.] My letter merely demonstrates that we observe the courtesies of the House.

I shall deal now with some of the points made by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe, and return to one or two of them later in my speech. I was particularly struck by his point that, in November 1996, he and the then Chief Secretary launched an allegation that Labour had 89 spending promises. I remember that very well, and was very grateful that the Conservative party should tell us about those promises several months before the general election. As he knows, most of those allegations simply did not stand up. One or two of them—such as a reduction in class sizes—formed part of our manifesto. However, the point is that the Conservative party accused us of having all sorts of quite fantastic spending commitments that were simply not true. Privately, the right hon. and learned Gentleman might accept that. I shall return to the subject of company taxation shortly.

Mr. Sayeed: Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Darling: No, I will not. This is an Opposition day debate, and no doubt the hon. Gentleman and others will try to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Darling: I have made it clear that I am not giving way for the moment.

The right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) did not mention national insurance. Hon. Members will recall that the then Prime Minister said explicitly that he had no plans to raise the top rate of tax, but a year later the Conservatives increased it from 9 per cent. to 10 per cent. Reference has been made to mortgage interest tax relief. It was said that we had done a terrible thing. The 1992 manifesto stated explicitly:

"We will maintain mortgage tax relief"—

but listen to this, a year later:

"Luckily we didn't say at what rate."

That was the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe, who, in his candid and appealing way, was quite frank about what had happened.

This is the essential point about the Conservatives. First, they made promises that they did not keep. Secondly, they raised taxes because of economic failure and misjudgment of economic signals in the late 1980s. Thirdly, it was not tax reform that was driving the increases; tax increases were necessary because of the Conservatives' failed policies. There was no long-term vision, and no strategy. It was simply a matter of rushing around with a biscuit tin trying to gather money—a series of short-term fixes that ended in economic and, certainly, political failure.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Darling: I will do so in a moment. The right hon. and learned Gentleman may wish to deal with the point that I am about to make.

One thing that illustrates the short-term nature of the last Government is what they did to the corporate sector. We have been criticised for removing major distortions of the company tax regime by scrapping the payable tax credits and ACT, but the point is that businesses gain in the long term, after the transitional period. We took that action because we believed that managers or investors, not the tax system, should decide on companies' strategy—whether they should retain or invest profits. We think that that decision is right in principle.

When I looked back to see why the Tories had cut ACT in 1993, and to see what issue of principle obtained then, I found it quite revealing. The then Financial Secretary, the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), gave this explanation of why the Tories had cut ACT. They needed to raise revenue

"from a group of people with taxable capacity, but who are not taxpayers, in a way that does minimum economic damage".—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 15 June 1993; c. 377.]

No principle was involved. The Tories cut ACT because they needed the money. Norman Lamont, who was then Chancellor, was quite up front about that. No issue of principle drove the Tories' company tax reforms.

Mr. Jenkin: Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Darling: No, I will not.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke rose—

Mr. Darling: Yes, I was going to give way to the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mr. Clarke: I thank the Chief Secretary for being kinder to me than to my hon. Friend the Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin). I genuinely appreciate his courtesy.

The Chief Secretary ignores the fact that Norman Lamont's change brought ACT into line with the 20 per cent. rate. That has already been pointed out. Subsequently, we did not increase corporate taxation—although the Labour party made tremendous play of the tax increases that we made—because we wanted to look after the industrial recovery that was getting under way, which brought about the falls in unemployment that we eventually produced.

Does the Chief Secretary concede that his Government have loaded £22 billion on to the corporate sector over the lifetime of the current Parliament? Combined with high interest rates and a high pound, that is already bringing what is left of our manufacturing base near to a state of recession. Industrial production is falling because of the Government's tax policies, which were not announced at the time of the last election.

Mr. Darling: I do not accept any of that. Had the right hon. and learned Gentleman taken the appropriate action on interest rates before the election, some of our difficulties might have been avoided.

When it comes to making long-term judgments, whether on tax increases or on anything else, the Government's whole record leaves much to be desired. In the late 1980s, which many Conservatives now try to disown as if that period was nothing to do with them, they completely misread the economic signals. They did what the Liberal Democrats want us to do—looked at optimistic figures, and started spending money as if everything was sorted out. That is precisely what the Liberal Democrats' amendment calls on us to do.

In the late 1980s, the last Government went on a spending spree, with the result that inflation nearly doubled in the space of two years and interest rates went up to 14 per cent. That legacy resulted in one of the deepest recessions that the country has ever seen. When it came down to it, the last Government were always looking for the short-term advantage rather than the long-term interests of the country.

We are committed to a strategy that is fair and seen to be fair. That is why we reduced VAT. We want to encourage work, and to make work pay. That is why we are examining the whole question of tax and benefits. We have cut the main rate of corporation tax. The Conservatives ask what we have done for business. We have cut the rate of corporation tax, and indicated a further cut to come. That helps the profitability of companies.

We introduced a windfall tax on the privatised utilities, which had made colossal profits because of the way in which they were privatised. That money is now being used to get the young and the long-term unemployed back into work. We have taken the necessary action to prevent overheating in the housing market—just as the Conservatives did, to give them credit, although they do not like to admit it now. Norman Lamont, whom many of them now pretend never to have known, recognised that there are circumstances in which a Government must take the necessary action to ensure that house prices do not escalate as they did in the late 1980s, when Nigel Lawson completely relaxed any sensible and prudent control.

We set in place a long-term framework for interest rate decisions, to keep inflation down. We are committed to the golden rule for prudence in public spending. We have set out a tough five-year deficit reduction plan, to which the Government will rigorously adhere. We will not make the mistakes of earlier Governments, Conservative or Labour, who failed to control public spending and then had to cut back as a consequence of that failure.

We have learnt the lessons of the late 1980s, when public finances and the economy's ability to sustain growth were completely misjudged by the last Government, plunging us into the longest recession since the war. Next Tuesday's Budget will not be a Budget for quick fixes in the short term; it will be a Budget for investment in the long term. We will continue to lay the foundations to build a more dynamic and successful economy, but we will not sacrifice our spending discipline and our commitment to prudence. Instead, there will be consistency to ensure long-term prosperity.

We have inherited a £400 billion national debt. As I have said, we have inherited £26 billion a year in interest payments, and a borrowing requirement last year of £23 billion, with the deficit due to continue into next year. We need to get that under control, and to ensure prudence in our public finances. That is our priority, not just in one year but in every year across the economic cycle. Just as there will be no return to boom and bust in the economy, there will be no return to soft options in public spending.

We were elected because we said that we would take the long-term view. We said that we would make tough decisions, because that is the only way in which to guarantee our future in the long term. That is the difference between this Government and the last. We are prepared to look to the long term. We are prepared to make the decisions that we need to make. But, above all, we look to the long term. Encouraging enterprise and work, and making work pay, are at the top of our agenda.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Darling: No, I will not.

Today's debate has shown that the Opposition have learnt absolutely nothing from their defeat. When they were asked a simple question about whether they would reinstate payable tax credits, they could not answer. The truth is that, nearly a year after the election, they still do not know where they are—which is why they have called a debate today to fight the battles of more than a year ago.

In contrast, this Government are looking to the long term for the good of the whole country. We are laying the foundations for the future. That is why we enjoy the trust of the people of this country, and the Conservative party does not.

5.9 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I was astonished to see the Conservatives' motion on broken tax promises. It shows that, despite all the disappointment after the general election, someone at the Conservative party still has a sense of humour. It may be normal for politicians to try to change their spots, but we have never seen such an absurd attempt to re-brand after so short a period of penance.

Do the Conservatives honestly believe that we have forgotten their record and the broken promises on value added tax, mortgage interest tax relief and general taxation? Have they forgotten their hidden taxes and the way in which they forced council tax up to shuffle off the responsibility to local government?

Mr. Jenkin: That is what Labour is doing.

Mr. Bruce: If the Conservative party's complaint is that the Labour Government are playing tricks on the taxpayer, we might ask who taught them those tricks. The Conservative Government had an 18-year history of deception over tax. Did they tell people in manifestos over those years that, when they promised to cut income tax, they intended to finance it by more than doubling the rate of VAT? Of course not.

Mr. Jenkin: When they were opposing VAT on fuel, did the Liberal Democrats ever explain to the electorate the consequences of a carbon tax?

Mr. Bruce: We most certainly did. The former Chancellor, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), said that any responsible Opposition party would present a draft alternative Budget, which the Liberal Democrats have done every year. Does the shadow Chancellor intend to produce an alternative Budget this week to tell us what the Conservative party would do, rather than simply attacking the Government for pursuing many of the policies and approaches set in train by the previous Government?

I asked the Library to look at the effects of both Tory and Labour Budgets since 1992. If the tax rises in the Tories' 1993–94 Budgets were continued, on automatic indexing, to the end of the century, they would amount to £109 billion. That is an extraordinary increase for a party that came to power on a pledge to reduce taxation. After 18 years, the Conservatives presided over higher taxes than they inherited in 1979.

It is not at all clear from the motion what the Conservative party is opposed to or, indeed, what it is in favour of. It has a record of constantly introducing hidden, deceptive taxes, yet it complains when the new Government do exactly the same.

Mr. Lilley: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that it is his thesis that neither the Labour party nor the Conservative party raised taxes as high as his party would raise them?

Mr. Bruce: We have stated clearly our objectives and priorities and what extra taxation would be involved. The other two parties have said that they can deliver, implying that one can have more for less. That has never added up. The Tories could never deliver, and Labour cannot do so now.

That is the fundamental reason why we set out in both our manifesto and our alternative Budget the cost difference in our policies compared with those of the Government of the day. This weekend, as we have always done, we shall produce our own alternative Budget. Are the Conservatives prepared to do that? The former Chancellor said that any responsible Opposition party would. I think that it has been confirmed that the Conservatives are not such a party.

The Tories have experienced 10 months of total shell shock in which they have been all over the place. They have now decided that perhaps they ought to do a little bit of opposing, but when asked what they are in favour of, they do not know. They have not come to terms with that part of opposition, because what they are in favour of is, presumably, what they were doing in government, which the people so firmly rejected. That leaves them in some understandable difficulty.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green): The Liberal Democrats are in favour of everything and nothing.

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman may make abusive remarks, but he knows perfectly well that we are a party that does not merely rhetorically state that we are in favour of "education, education, education" but specifically states which elements of education we would invest in, how much it would cost and where the money would come from. In our view, that is how responsible politics should be conducted.

It is no wonder that the electorate are disillusioned by politicians who tell them only a quarter of the story. The good news is up front, but the price is hidden.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North–East Hertfordshire): When the hon. Gentleman says that politicians say only a quarter of what they mean, does that apply to his penny extra on income tax?

Mr. Bruce: That extra penny has been clearly costed. At the time of the general election, the Institute for Fiscal Studies said that our costed proposals were broadly in line with the outcome. [Interruption.] If Conservative Members are implying that the institute is in some way not independent or responsible, so be it.

The Labour Government may argue, as the Chief Secretary said, that all that they specifically pledged in the general election campaign was that they would not increase the basic or higher rates of tax, but they gave the impression, because they were sticking to Tory spending plans, that there would be no significant additional tax requirements other than the windfall tax. Indeed, the Prime Minister, as Leader of the Opposition, seems to have said that in so many words, and that is certainly what the electorate understood.

The reality is that the Government have introduced massive tax increases, almost exactly comparable to those of the Tories when they were in government. The present Chancellor, as shadow Chancellor, said that he was determined to build a new trust on tax with the British people and to get tax rates down for ordinary families, but that is hardly what has been happening.

The Library confirms that, since the general election, the Chancellor has raised taxes by £30 billion, excluding the huge rise in council tax that is now taking place. The Government did not want to publish those facts, but they have been calculated by the Library.

Those tax rises—fuel and tobacco duties, mortgage interest tax relief, taxes on pensions, business taxes, council taxes and many more—affect all parts of society, and the Labour party has been in power for less than a year. Our point is certainly not that all those tax rises were unnecessary or undesirable.

Mr. Darling: What exactly is the Liberal Democrats' position on tobacco duties? Do they think that they should go down or up?

Mr. Bruce: Our position is entirely clear. Our manifesto said that we would increase tobacco duties in order to abolish dental and eye test charges. The Labour and Conservative parties are not getting the message. It is a question not of whether one is in favour of taxes but of whether one is prepared to tell the electorate honestly the costs of one's programme and how one intends to raise the money.

We said frequently before the general election that the state of public finances meant that any pre-election tax cuts would be unsustainable. We had the honesty to say on the record that taxes could not be cut and would have to rise somewhat after the election.

Before the election, the Labour party voted in favour of tax cuts. Afterwards, it piled the taxes back on, just as we predicted. How does that strategy help to avoid boom and bust? Such chopping and changing creates uncertainty among voters and businesses and in the economy in general.

The Conservative and Labour parties are acting like a pair of pickpockets: the quickness of the hand deceives the eye, and the taxpayers' pockets are lighter.

Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): Not as light as they would be under the hon. Gentleman's party.

Mr. Bruce: The tax rises that are now in place, combined with the Conservative tax rises feeding through—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Woodward) is out of order, and has a very bad habit of interrupting when other hon. Members are speaking.

Mr. Bruce: If the tax rises that are in place are fed through, without any change of Government policy, the highest taxes in British history will be achieved at about the turn of the century. Not all the tax rises that have been put in place are necessary, and I do not believe that the Government believe that they are necessary.

The Government are getting their tax rises in now so that they can build up a war chest which may be used to boost spending in the run-up to the general election. That would give the appearance of cutting taxes just before the election and the Government could say how generous they were, but the Government would only be giving back to taxpayers the money that they took from them four years previously.

Labour Back Benchers should be aware of the implications of what is happening: if reports in today's press are anything to go by, and departmental spending limits are to be frozen for the next three years, control of the war chest will rest entirely in the hands of the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, not in those of departmental Ministers and certainly not those of Labour Members. The Chief Secretary laughs, so I suspect that I have hit the right button, and that will happen.

It is evident from the projected size of the Government's cyclically adjusted current balance, and from their reluctance to reveal the figures in black and white, that a war chest is being built up. Again, I had to ask the Library to do the calculations. I look forward to the Government passing a fiscal responsibility Act that requires them to publish the figures and put them on the record, so that people are not forced to work them out from the information available.

The Chief Secretary implied that Liberal Democrats take the view that the Government should be irresponsible. Our view is that the Government are deliberately being extremely cautious. Andrew Dilnot told the Treasury Select Committee:

"The Treasury and the Government are publishing forecasts"—

on public finances—

"which are based on their view of what the worst case is".

Although the Government are being relatively cautious overall, the forecasts for a number of areas, in particular value added tax, are very cautious. The Government's cash flow gain from the proposed changes to advance corporation tax is not in the forecast, because it is a proposal. Andrew Dilnot continued:

"At every possible point, I think the Government has . . . taken a cautious stance".

A projection of incomes for this Parliament shows a massive surplus which will enable the Government to reduce national debt, and to do a great deal more besides. One can therefore assume that there will be a spending objective, and probably a tax-cutting objective, in the second half of the Parliament. There is nothing necessarily wrong with that, except that it is inconsistent with the rhetoric used when the election was fought, which is the opposite of what the Chief Secretary claims. The Government's squeezing of public services now, and any throwing of money at them later in the Parliament, will create a bust-boom cycle in those services just when they are trying to squeeze such cycles out of macro-economic management. That is crazy and destructive.

[Mr. Bruce]

It is impossible for the Government to fulfil their early pledges against that background: they have abandoned any pretence that they will cut hospital waiting lists, and class sizes are still rising.

Mr. Ivan Lewis (Bury, South): Why does the hon. Gentleman persist in peddling the myth that maintaining the spending limits of the previous Government is the same as pursuing their spending priorities? Before the general election, people in my locality faced £5 million of cuts in our school budgets and 70 teacher redundancies. As a result of the extra money that has been provided by the Government for schools, there will be no cuts or teacher redundancies, and 95 per cent. of our five, six and seven-year-olds will be taught in classes of 30 pupils or fewer from September. In addition, bed blocking, where perhaps 70 or 80 elderly people blocked beds in our local hospitals, is no longer a problem as a direct result of extra money going into the national health service. Will the hon. Gentleman stop peddling the myth that we are not spending money on public services?

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman might be vindicated if his 409 colleagues were able to tell the same story for every constituency, but he knows that Government objectives—for example, cutting hospital waiting lists—have effectively been abandoned for the time being, which is the logical consequence of sticking to the previous Government's spending targets. I did not specifically say that sticking to Conservative spending plans necessarily meant that the Government were sticking to every detail of Conservative spending policy, but where did the cut in single parent benefits come from if it was not a Conservative proposal that the Government were forced to adopt to meet departmental spending totals? The shadow Chancellor could probably confirm that. Unless the Government are prepared to find the resources, it will be impossible for them to deliver their early pledges. Taxes have gone up, but public services continue to be squeezed, which is an irresponsible and unjustified way to manage the public sector that will seriously damage health and education.

We must change the way in which financial information is presented. If a fiscal responsibility Act had been passed, a statement of fiscal and economic priorities would have had to be put before the people before the general election, and there would not have been an emergency Budget after it. We could have debated the issues during the general election campaign on the basis of objective facts, rather than having the previous Government suppress information and the new Government alter figures to justify tax rises for building up a war chest to deploy later in the Parliament.

The cynical way in which voters have been treated will lead to a breakdown of trust. The Conservatives were thrown out of office after 18 years because they claimed that theirs was a tax-cutting party, but put overall tax levels up. Labour came into office with a pledge on taxes, but broke it within a year. The Government are manipulating the tax system to secure short-term political gain, but I must warn them that people will become cynical about that process. The Government are doing serious damage to the public services in the short term, which may take more than a Parliament to put right. The voters will make their own judgment on that.

Mr. Ivan Lewis (Bury, South): The Government's record on taxation is a curious topic for the Opposition to choose for a Supply day debate. Most people accept that general elections are determined by two predominant issues—economic competence and the record of the Government of the day on taxation—and the record general election landslide of only 10 months ago was largely a judgment of the previous Government's record on those issues. When I read the title of today's motion, I wondered whether Conservative Members would finally let the Government into the secret of how they introduced hidden taxes and got away with it for at least 13 years.

Everyone accepts that, for years, the Tories cynically and unashamedly conned the British people on taxation. They claimed the mantle of being the party of low taxation and economic competence for election after election, but history shows that we had a boom and bust economy. When the Tories left office, the tax burden on the British people was greater than when Labour left office in 1979.

As the Tories systematically set about reducing income tax, other taxes were increased and introduced. We need only consider commitments and promises that were made by senior Conservatives while they were in government. Before the 1992 general election, the then Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), said:

"In the next Parliament we will go on tax cutting. We will make that our aim year after year".

What happened during the last Parliament? We had 22 hidden Tory tax rises, costing a typical family more than £2,000 extra in tax.

Before the 1992 general election, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon said:

"We have no need and no plans to extend the scope of VAT."

What actually happened? VAT was imposed on fuel at 8 per cent., which is regarded by most people as one of the most disgraceful taxes imposed by any Government. We should not forget that they would have increased that 8 per cent. to 17.5 per cent., had it not been for the combined opposition of Labour Members and Tory Members representing marginal seats, such as my predecessor, who regarded it as the "nail in the coffin" tax. Little did he know that there were many more nails to come.

The Tories' tax record might have been defendable if it had contributed to economic and social renewal, but the legacy of their 18 years in government is underfunded and underperforming schools and hospitals, record expenditure on welfare, not work, and a crumbling infrastructure. I find it strange when Conservative Members talk about the decline in manufacturing industry, which was one the greatest legacies of Thatcher years, but choose to blame us for that after only 10 months in office. They presided over a second-rate economy and deteriorating public services, despite the fact that they had the proceeds from North sea oil revenues and the income generated by the privatisation of public utilities. No better windfall has been available to any Government in history than the one the Tory Governments had at their disposal.

The British people are entitled to ask, "Where did all our money go during those years?" The answer is relatively straightforward: the Conservative party chose disproportionate tax cuts for the few at the expense of the many; they chose to pay the bill of economic failure, funding unemployment instead of investing in jobs; they chose to steal from the taxpayer, as demonstrated by the scandalous sell-off of some of our public assets—flogged off at knockdown prices to fat cats with share options and excessive salaries.

Let us compare and contrast that record with the Labour Government's mere 10 months in office. In our election manifesto, the current Government made some clear promises. We promised to reduce VAT on fuel to 5 per cent. and we have delivered on that commitment. We promised a windfall tax on the excess profits of the privatised utilities in order to fund the most ambitious welfare-to-work scheme in our history. Despite being told before the election that the windfall tax would be illegal and unfeasible, we have done it and young people, the long-term unemployed, disabled people and single parents are all to be given opportunities denied to them during the years of Conservative government. We have kept our promise not to put up the basic or top rate of income tax. We have kept our promises not to extend VAT to food, children's clothes, books, newspapers or public transport fares. It is true that we hid the fact that we would reduce corporation tax to the lowest level ever seen in this country; we did not say that before the election, so if we are to be accused of a hidden tax, we shall accept that one.

Conservative Members accuse the Government of 17 tax rises, but they fail to say that, of those 17, seven are the closure of tax loopholes. Does the Conservative party support the closure of tax loopholes? Would the Conservatives reinstate those loopholes if they were ever to regain power? They will not answer those questions. The truth is that the rationale behind the debate is straightforward: Conservative Members know that the British people will neither forgive nor forget their tax record. They know the true meaning and long-term political implications of the statement made by the former Chancellor, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), before the last election. Conservative Members should remember what he said, because it will come back to haunt them time and again. He said:

"The public will be deeply suspicious of any tax cuts because they remember we promised tax cuts last time and unfortunately weren't able to deliver them."

In contrast, the Labour Government will continue to keep their promises on tax. A fair tax system will encourage and reward those who work hard and play by the rules. It will be designed to benefit the many, not the few. It will underpin the Government's belief that economic prosperity and social justice are inextricably linked. The Conservatives should understand that our record in government will once and for all undermine their smears about Labour and tax. Theirs is no longer the party of law and order, no longer the party of business and now no longer the party of low taxation or economic competence. I sincerely hope that they can find a new niche in British politics—after all, a healthy democracy requires a credible Opposition.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): It has been 10 months since the general election, yet what an insidious record the Government have on tax.

The Labour Government hit the home owner by reducing mortgage interest relief at source, but one of the worst aspects of the tax changes introduced by the Labour Government is that most of them hit the poorest in society hardest. Let us take the cut in MIRAS. The maximum tax relief available under MIRAS is about £340 a year which, to someone on the top rate of tax, is not a huge sum, but to someone on the basic or lower rate of tax, who would not even get that amount, it is a considerable sum.

The tax changes will hit all our constituents, including the elderly. One of the most insidious changes of all was the abolition of ACT. The Association of Consulting Actuaries has worked out that someone aged 30 saving £100 a month would have to increase his or her pension by 12 per cent. to maintain the same level of pension. The abolition of ACT has other consequences: companies will have to pay out higher dividends because they will be pressured by pension funds and other investing companies that want the same level of return, so the yield on gilts will fall. That has a knock-on impact on other savers.

The tax changes hit the young, by reducing the grants paid to students. Poor parents are hit by the abolition of the assisted places scheme. Above all, the Government have shifted money away from rural areas to urban areas. [Interruption.] If Labour Members listen, they may learn something. To increase taxes on petrol is discriminatory against rural dwellers, whose cars are essential. Many of them cannot get to the doctor or to the post office to claim their benefits without use of a car. Labour Members will say that that is our fault for deregulating the buses, but it would never be economic to run a bus service in many places. In my constituency, the hamlets are too small for a bus service to run, so the residents have to rely on their cars for day-to-day living.

We have already had a 6p increase in petrol in the November Budget and, no doubt, there will be a huge whack put on petrol next week. Rural dwellers will not forgive the Government for those increases in petrol duty, nor will they forgive the huge increases in council tax that they will have to pay. Under the local government support settlement, urban areas were given good settlements—for example, the increase in Sedgefield was a staggering 13 per cent., whereas we in rural Gloucestershire received an increase of only 5 per cent. I ask the Chief Secretary, who has just left the Chamber, whether that sort of gerrymandering of funds away from rural areas is fair.

We are seeing the same in the national health service. The national increase in NHS funding was 2 per cent., but rural Gloucestershire got only 1.4 per cent. The result is that each day in the health service in Gloucestershire, 100 people who, clinically speaking, should not be there block beds and, as a result, operations are cancelled and waiting lists get longer. The Financial Secretary should listen to these points. It costs about £150 a day to keep someone in hospital, whereas it costs between £30 and £50 a day to give them a proper domiciliary care, residential care or nursing care package and so get them out of hospital. Nationally, such policies make no sense whatsoever.

The Budget is coming up next week. I have already alluded to the road tax increase that it is likely to introduce, but I have no doubt that it will contain further tax increases. Savers have already been penalised by the abolition of personal equity plans and tax-exempt special savings accounts. It would be interesting to know from the Financial Secretary whether the report in today's Financial Times that she is thinking of scrapping the £50,000 limit is true.

[Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown]

The Financial Secretary has, I hope, listened to the savings industry, which reckons that it would be almost impossible to police that lifetime limit. In any case, it would set a dangerous precedent of a retrospective tax. I hope that she will be able to give at least my middle-England, middle-income and low-income constituents some cheer, if not this evening, then in the Budget, by saying that the £50,000 limit will be scrapped.

The Conservative party left this Government the golden legacy of the best-performing economy in Europe. We had the golden scenario, which has been achieved only twice since the war, of growth outstripping inflation. This evening, we have heard much about Government expenditure and taxation, but, as any economist knows, the only way in which to go on satisfactorily putting more money into public services is by achieving growth that is higher than inflation. The sad fact is that, because of the economic changes that the Government have brought about, growth is beginning to slow and inflation is beginning to rise.

The five interest rate rises since the election keep the pound far too high. Unfortunately, that is having a disastrous effect on our manufacturing industry. Today's business news page in The Daily Telegraph reports that the British Retail Consortium reckons that

"annual sales growth fell from 6.1 per cent. in January to 3.4 per cent. in February".

Much more important, the article says:

"Separate figures yesterday reveal that output of British-made goods stagnated in January for the second month in a row and has fallen by 0.6 per cent. over the past three months. Simon Briscoe of Nikko Europe said: 'The message is clear—industry is on the brink of recession.'"

It would be sad if this Government, who inherited one of the best economic circumstances since the war, by economic mismanagement put this great economy and this great country, which had such superb prospects, into recession in two and a half years' time.

The Government have not taken into account the damage that the strength of the pound is having on manufacturing industry, the deflationary effect throughout Europe that meeting the Maastricht criteria will have, the deflationary effect of the situation in the far east and, above all, the deflationary effect of the structural problems with the American economy. I will hold the Government to account, as will my constituents, if we run into a recession in two and a half to three years' time. Sadly, that is what may happen.

5.42 pm

Mr. Bill Rammell (Harlow): We have had an interesting debate, but unfortunately it has generated much heat and not much light. We heard the accusation from the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer, that, during the general election campaign, the Labour party made a commitment that it would never raise any taxes. Yet, as my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury has rightly pointed out, during that campaign, every time interviewers said, "You have said that you will not raise the top and standard rate of income tax. What about all those other indirect taxes?", the then Chancellor and then Prime Minister said that no responsible Chancellor would give a commitment on the 200 or so indirect taxes and tax reliefs. Therefore, to claim that we have acted differently from that is extraordinarily misleading.

We have heard accusations over tuition fees and the response to Dearing. During the general election campaign, we said clearly that we would accept the outcome of the Dearing report and that is broadly what we have done, with the exception that we have protected the poorest students, which should be the Government's absolute priority.

Mr. Heald: Where does the Dearing report mention scrapping maintenance grants? While the hon. Gentleman is talking about taxes, by how much is his council tax going up in Harlow?

Mr. Rammell: Our clear commitment during the general election campaign was that we would move from a system of maintenance grants to one of student loans. We said that we would accept the rest of the Dearing package, which is what we have done, with the exception that we have protected the poorest students.

The right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden had the audacity to lecture us about decent pension provision. When the Tories were in office, they encouraged people to opt out of decent company schemes—which was never going to be in their interests—and millions of pensions were mis-sold, from which many people are still suffering. On that issue, a period of silence from the Opposition would be appropriate.

The right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden said that Labour was bad for business and that the Conservative party would defend business. What is bad for business is the refusal of a once-great party to judge the issue of economic and monetary union on its merits. Instead, it digs in with an extreme ideological position, which leaves business despairing about the Conservatives' attitude towards one of the most crucial issues that we face as we head towards the 21st century.

I had to check my notes when I was listening to the shadow Chancellor. I heard him say that any tax reduction by the Government would be welcome. This Government have made it clear that they will not raise the top rate of income tax, but, presumably, from what the right hon. Gentleman has said today, he would welcome a cut in the top rate of income tax. Nothing could demonstrate more clearly the Conservative party's fundamentally misplaced sense of priorities, given the problems that we face in public services and the need for any tax reductions to be targeted at people on low incomes. I would welcome confirmation from the Opposition Treasury Front-Bench team that that is what the right hon. Gentleman was saying.

The hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) spoke about the reduction in MIRAS. Has he conveniently forgotten, just 10 months after the general election, that it was the Tory Government who cut MIRAS year on year? He went on completely to dismiss the impact of bus deregulation on the provision of public transport in rural communities. It is convenient to forget that impact. We will not let Conservative Members forget the fact that they introduced bus deregulation, since when bus services in rural and urban areas alike have decreased by 25 per cent. They need to remind people in rural areas about that as well.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The point that I was making about MIRAS is that the cuts that have been imposed by this Government are regressive. We restricted MIRAS to the basic rate of tax because we felt that we were being too generous. Therefore, my point is entirely valid. The effect on low-paid people is much more severe if MIRAS is abolished altogether.

Mr. Rammell: The hon. Gentleman is conveniently trying to correct history after what happened, year on year, under the Conservative Government.

It speaks volumes that, as usual, the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), the Liberal Democrat Treasury spokesperson, has walked into the Chamber, made a speech and then walked out. Nothing undermines the case for constructive tax-and-spend policies more than dishonest and irresponsible opposition that is based on plans that simply do not add up. The Labour party had 18 years to learn that fact. Unfortunately, it will take the Liberal Democrats much longer to learn it.

Liberal Democrats support the new deal, yet do not support the windfall tax to fund it. They say that they want council tax capping to be lifted, but they oppose every council tax increase that is introduced. They have committed themselves to raising £6 billion in extra taxation and £23 billion in extra borrowing, all to be funded from the famous penny on the standard rate of income tax. That is irresponsible gesture politics.

The heart of this debate serves as a smokescreen for the Conservative party on a range of issues. It is trying to claim that it may have been wrong and dishonest during its last period in office, but that all politicians are much the same. The reason why it makes that claim is that, at the general election, it was convicted by the British electorate of dishonesty in public life, with the cash-for-questions affair, and of abusing and misusing the power of patronage, with the appointment to public bodies only of people who carried Conservative party cards. Most importantly, the Conservatives were convicted of breaking key and specific pledges given before the 1992 election. Let us examine what happened under the Conservative Government.

The charge against the Conservative party was not based on statements that we took out of context—words which, as the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) once infamously and disingenuously claimed, were said off the cuff on a wet night in Dudley. The charge was that the Conservatives broke specific commitments given in answer to specific questions. They knew exactly what they were saying and why those statements and claims were false. It has been a long history. It goes back as far as 1979, when Lord Howe said:

> "We have absolutely no intention of doubling VAT."

Yet as soon as the general election was over, that was exactly what he did.

In 1992 the Conservatives said that they would not increase the scope or rate of VAT or increase national insurance contributions. The right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) said at the time:

> "Unlike the Labour party, we have published our spending plans and there is no need for us to raise VAT to meet them. Neither, so there is no doubt, do we plan to raise the level of National Insurance contributions."

Yet that was exactly what the Conservative Government did in their first Budget after the general election.

The Conservatives claimed that they would cut taxes year on year yet, as Labour Members know, during 18 years of Tory government, the tax take as a proportion of GDP went up from 34.3 per cent. in 1979 to 35.8 per cent. in 1996. It was higher than in 1979 in every year bar one of the 18 Tory years.

No party in a general election campaign can or will give a commitment on every tax measure. It would give up its ability to govern and react to circumstances if it did. If one does not want to give a commitment, one does not respond to specific questions on that commitment, but that is what the Tory party did. It was challenged repeatedly on specific commitments and gave answers that were subsequently found to be false. That is what this debate is all about.

We have made it clear that the debate about tax is about trust. We gave a central commitment in the election campaign not on all the issues that have been discussed today, but on the standard and top rates of taxation. I do not deny that that has given us problems within the Government in that we cannot increase public expenditure as quickly as we would wish, but we made a commitment. We made a promise to the electorate. That is the fundamental difference between the Labour party in government and the party that is now in opposition.

I spent every year of my adult life until 1 May last year under a Conservative Government, and I find astonishing the degree to which the Conservatives have lost touch on tax and do not make their arguments with clarity. This is about faith and trust in politics. Those are the issues on which we convinced the people on 1 May last year and nothing has changed since then.

5.53 pm

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): In rising to support the motion tabled by my right hon. and hon. Friends, I am reminded of a conversation that I had during the general election campaign. An elderly voter remarked on a performance by the then Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). That elderly voter, now my constituent, said that the right hon. Gentleman resembled nothing so much as an American-style, fake and phoney television evangelist pushing a dodgy creed. We all know what that dodgy creed was. It was the notion that a Labour Government would not increase taxes. It was a preposterous and incredible proposition. My elderly gentleman saw through that ridiculous claim. He saw it for what it was—a fake and phoney promise—but others were not so lucky. They succumbed to the blandishments of the right hon. Member for Sedgefield.

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Was the elderly gentleman one of the 11 per cent. of people in this country who say that the present Leader of the Opposition would make a suitable Prime Minister?

Mr. Ruffley: Let us have sensible interventions on the point, which is the Government's record of breaking their tax promises.

My constituents saw through the phoney and fake promises. Others were not so lucky. Let me remind the House what manner of litany it was that took in so many people before the election. The right hon. Member for Sedgefield was reported in the Financial Times as saying to Birmingham business men on 21 September 1996:

"We have no plans to increase tax at all."

On "Breakfast with Frost" on 12 January 1997, he said:

"There are no hidden spending commitments and therefore, no hidden tax rises".

Mr. Geraint Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ruffley: In a moment. The hon. Gentleman may not like the truth, but the House is going to hear it. Do Labour Members deny that the right hon. Member for Sedgefield said on 8 January:

"Any spending commitment that we have is properly financed, that means there are no tax increases implied by the programme"?

I give way to the hon. Gentleman. Did the right hon. Member for Sedgefield say it? Yes or no?

Mr. Davies: Talking of hidden taxes, may I ask for your view of tax in relation to the privatisation of British industry, in which public assets were sold at a net cost of £5.7 billion, if you compare the sale price with the value of the shares the following day? Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the give-away of £5.7 billion of public money was a hidden cost?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must be careful about using the word "you". It applies to the Chair.

Mr. Ruffley: We are talking about hidden taxes. The intervention was not even worth waiting for.

Perhaps I could continue by talking about the assistance lent by the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), now the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was at it as well before the election. He is the self-styled iron Chancellor, but before the election, he said on 20 January 1997 on "Newsnight":

"It's my aim to get the burden down for ordinary people".

On Channel 4 on 27 April, he said:

"I want to see tax cut for the ordinary family".

At a Labour press conference on 16 April, the right hon. Gentleman said:

"we have always said that we want to reduce the tax burden for ordinary families."

Those were words spoken by Ministers in the Labour Government. We should draw attention to that fact because they have broken their promises.

Those taken in by those words will not be fooled again because they know that following the so-called emergency Budget last July, the average household is paying some £650 more. In my region of East Anglia, the average family is losing slightly less—about £630. That is because the Government have introduced 17 new taxes. I do not have time to go through the new Labour, new tax litany. We all know what those taxes are. Four in particular have struck my constituents. We have the mortgage tax—the cut in MIRAS and several increases in mortgage rates which are hammering home owners in my constituency and throughout the country. We have the pensions tax arising a result of the abolition of advance corporation tax. We have high council taxes—something that the Labour party did not tell us about before 1 May. We have higher petrol duty. The increases are greater than any announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). They are 6 per cent. per annum, and they were brought forward by five months last year. That is a double whammy for rural drivers, for whom a car is not a luxury but a necessity.

The shire counties, particularly my county of Suffolk, are discomfited by the prospect of a 27p a gallon tax increase in the coming Budget. We know of the increase because one of the Chancellor's special advisers leaked it to the Evening Standard. We can only hope that, by protesting on behalf of the shire counties, many of which Conservative Members are proud to represent, we shall shame the Chancellor into not going ahead with such exorbitant tax hikes. We hope that he will keep the petrol increase down to a sensible amount.

Many of my constituents are amazed by the way in which Labour pretends to listen to the rural areas and the shire counties. Only this morning, we heard a report on the "Today" programme to the effect that the shire counties faced average council tax increases for the coming year of 11 per cent.—far more than the increases in Labour-dominated urban areas.

These are all tax hikes which Labour said it would never inflict on ordinary people. But they will not be hidden tax increases for much longer. The public are beginning to see them for what they are—and the Labour party for what it is: politicians, men and women, without principles, without scruple and without any sense of shame, who deceived the British public before the election about the true nature of their tax policies.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington): This debate is about credibility, and it was audacious, not to say foolhardy, of the Conservative party to choose tax as the topic for debate. Perhaps it was a form of aversion therapy, given its record and the electorate's recent judgment on it. I should have thought that a period of silent contemplation might be more appropriate. Instead, we have an attempt to create a smokescreen, as one or two colleagues have called it, to blot out the Tories' abysmal record.

Starting off the debate, the shadow Chancellor spoke for 23 minutes, in which he failed to mention value added tax once. I wonder why. Labour Members recall the Tory party's 1992 election pledge that it had

"no need and no plans to extend VAT".

What a worthless pledge that was. No wonder the shadow Chancellor omitted to remind us of it during his 23 minutes.

The fact is that the Tories are the VAT party. They introduced it in 1973; it was the subsequent Labour Government who reduced it. When the Tories returned to office, they increased VAT twice, more than doubling the rate, and they extended its scope time and again. In so doing, they broke every pledge on VAT that the party had ever given.

The history of VAT between 1992 and 1997 speaks for itself. VAT raised £35 billion in 1992 but £50 billion by 1997—a 43 per cent. increase in VAT revenue, which was much greater than the overall growth in revenue. The picture between 1979 and 1997 was even more dramatic. Over that period, real GDP grew by 49 per cent. but VAT revenue, in real terms, grew by 123 per cent.—this from the party that had to extend the tax.

"no need and no plans"

Moreover, the Tory party continually widened the scope of VAT, to include: hot takeaway food and drinks, building alterations, civil engineering works, newspaper advertisements, cereal bars, iced tea, non-residential construction and property development, news services, incontinence pads, fairground rides, airport car parking, protective boots and helmets, fuel and power to businesses, water and sewerage services to industry, domestic fuel and power, travel and car hire insurance. Hardly an aspect of life escaped the Tory mania for imposing VAT. That is why I say that this is a debate about credibility on tax.

Mr. Woodward: Given the hon. Gentleman's clear instinct for avoiding any attempts at responsible taxation, if his party decides to increase VAT or widen its scope, will he give an undertaking to vote against his party?

Mr. Plaskitt: I was just going on to contrast the record of the Tory party on VAT with my party's record. My party has never increased the general rate of VAT. In fact, once before, we cut it; and in the lifetime of this new Government, we have already cut the rate on fuel and power.

The inescapable conclusion is that only Labour Governments can be trusted on VAT. We deliver on our VAT election pledges. We pledged to reduce it on domestic fuel and power, and we have already honoured that. We also made other pledges before the election—for instance, not to extend VAT to food, children's clothes, books, newspapers or public transport. We can confidently expect those pledges to be honoured, too.

Conservative Members may reluctantly accept that VAT is their Achilles' heel—perhaps they would like our attention to be focused elsewhere in an attempt to find any evidence of what the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) described at the election as the Tories' "aversion" to tax. We can look in vain. Over their 18 years in power, there were reductions in income tax rates, but they were not the whole story.

The increase in national insurance rates clawed back 3.5p in the pound from the reductions in income tax rates. Taking VAT from 8 per cent. to 17.5 per cent. more than clawed back the rest, certainly for families on lower incomes. On top of that came the Government-engineered council tax hikes during the last six years of the Tory Administration.

While we are at it, we should recall all the other new taxes that the Tories implemented after promising at the 1992 election to cut taxes year on year. Tax allowances were trimmed: the cut in the married couple's allowance meant a tax increase for the average family of £500; and the cut in the personal tax allowance cost the average family an extra £145.

We were told at the 1992 election that MIRAS would be maintained; it was subsequently restricted, at a cost of £600 a year to the average family. There were also new taxes on top of that: a tax on contents and buildings insurance, a tax on vehicle insurance and mortgage protection policies, and the airport tax. Taken together, the changes meant a tax increase of more than £2,000 for the average family.

The tax record of the Conservative party is well known. The percentage of GDP taken in tax did not fall during its 18 years in power. The tax burden on people earning more than £64,000 fell, but it rose for everyone else.

The most remarkable aspect of the Tories' tax record is the fact that, despite imposing all this extra taxation year on year, despite the extraordinary bonus of North sea oil and gas revenues totalling £80 billion, and despite the even greater boost to the Government's coffers from the endless privatisations, miraculously the Conservatives bequeathed the new Labour Government an appalling record of public debt. They managed that despite a 48 per cent. real-terms increase in tax revenues over their 18 years in office. In fact, they displayed an extraordinary fecklessness with the national finances; it has no modern parallel. Over 18 years, the national debt increased from £91 billion to £400 billion—by more than 300 per cent., in other words. When they left office last year, there was a £23 billion hole in the Government's finances.

Over 18 years, the Conservatives chalked up public spending annual deficits of more than £300 billion—almost the equivalent of a full year's public spending. As a result, the average British taxpayer now contributes £1,000 a year just to meeting the cost of the Tories' legacy of debt.

This record of debt and taxation cannot be hidden behind the smokescreen of today's motion. It is a record of broken pledges, tax increases and mountainous debts. Little wonder that, at the end of it all, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke)—I am sorry to see that he has left the Chamber—admitted in the run-up to the election that voters would be "suspicious" of further Tory tax promises. No wonder the electorate called an end last May to that orgy of tax and debt, now replaced by our Government's deficit reduction programme, prudent fiscal management, clear and consistent principles of fair taxation, and pledges on tax that are being honoured. The House will be suspicious of the Opposition motion.

6.9 pm

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): This is a Government who told the British people that they had no need to raise taxes, that their programme was fully funded, and that they had abandoned their past and become a low-tax party. It is interesting that the Chief Secretary is now so keen to narrow the commitment given during the election so that it applies to rates only, thereby admitting that taxes generally have risen under his Government.

The Labour manifesto said that the principles underlying its tax policy were, first, to encourage employment opportunities and work incentives; secondly, to promote savings and investment; and thirdly, to be fair and to be seen to be fair. Within 10 months—indeed, within two months of coming to office—the Government have breached all those pledges.

The Government have introduced measures that discourage employment and reduce work incentives. They have damaged the savings industry, and last July's Budget damaged business investment in this country to the tune of a £5 billion windfall tax, as well as £5 billion a year from the pension funds. Labour's tax measures have not been fair, and are certainly not seen to be fair. They discriminate against middle England, penalise thrift, and do nothing to help the less well-off.

Mr. Ivan Lewis rose—

Mr. Gibb: There is a shortage of time, so I shall plough on, if I may.

Labour's manifesto also states that it is "pledged not to raise the basic or top rates of income tax throughout the next Parliament."

Posters throughout the country trumpeted that pledge, lulling the electorate into a false sense of security. Elected on that pledge in May, two months later, in July, the Government abolished the repayment of tax credits on dividends paid to non-taxpayers.

Non-taxpayers include two thirds of all pensioners. Many retired people in my constituency have a small portfolio of shares, the income from which they use to supplement their pension income. Before 2 July, they could claim back from the Inland Revenue the tax credits, which amounted to a quarter of the dividend that they had received. Now they cannot. The non-taxpaying pensioners whom Labour said they wanted to help are the very people who have suffered most from that measure. Age Concern has called on the Government to continue to pay tax credits on dividends to individual non-taxpayers.

Non-taxpayers include pension funds, which own £650 billion of assets on behalf of 19 million working people and 6 million retired people. The prospect of taxing such a pot of gold was too tempting for the Labour Government: £5 billion a year was too large a sum to avoid taking. Preventing pension funds from reclaiming tax credit on their dividend income will cost the funds £5 billion a year. According to the Association of Consulting Actuaries, the average 30-year-old working person will have to pay an extra £12 a month to keep his pension at the same rate. Chantrey Vellacott has said that, on average, the 19 million members of company or personal pension schemes will require an increase in contributions of £190 a year.

Dr. George Turner: Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that the figures regularly quoted from the Conservative Benches are based on all other things being equal, and that the point of a Chancellor's Budget is to make sure that all other things are not equal? Will he therefore explain to the House how much the average pension fund has increased since the Government took office?

Mr. Gibb: If the hon. Gentleman had waited a few more seconds, I would have come to that.

The extra £190 a year is equivalent to a 1 per cent. rise in income tax. Is that not a clear breach of Labour's pledge not to raise the basic rate of income tax? It is worse than that, however. It is a hidden tax, levied in a deceitful way—a back-door method of raising the rate of income tax in a way that the Government hoped few would notice.

How will the measure help investment? How will it encourage savings? Both questions were manifesto pledges. When the measure was debated in Committee on the Floor of the House, the Economic Secretary said:

"Many pension funds are in surplus by as much as £50 billion. In combination with the current high level of the stock market, that means that there is a much greater opportunity for funds to absorb the change without any great difficulty."—[Official Report, 16 July 1997; Vol. 298, c. 487.]

That has been the Government's line all along, and I assume that it is also the line of the hon. Member for North–West Norfolk (Dr. Turner): the £5 billion tax will be easily paid by the pension funds because of a soaring stock market, all other things being equal, as the hon. Gentleman says—no need for higher contributions or for increased rebates for opting out of SERPS.

That was the Government's claim. The reality is that the Government Actuary has had to recommend higher rebates. He stated:

"As a result of the tax changes announced in the July 1997 Budget. . . the amount of dividend income from UK equities reduces by just under 20 per cent."

That will reduce dividend yields from about 3.5 per cent. to about 2.8 per cent.

There is no mention by the Government Actuary of dividend yields rising to absorb the pensions tax. He says that the yield has fallen. So, too, do the consulting actuaries Bacon and Woodrow in the Financial Times today. They say that one in four UK companies could be forced to put more into their pension schemes, following the abolition of tax credits on dividends. The shortfall, they say, could be as much as £5 billion—a familiar figure, and an answer to the hon. Gentleman's question.

Not only is the tax hidden; it will cost UK business money to put right the shortfall—money that could have gone into investment. The measure will reduce savings and damage pensions, both of which the Government said they wanted to boost.

The tax rise has caused many other problems. Abolishing the tax credit also meant that the Government had to abolish foreign income dividends at the same time, to avoid a flood of FID payments to absorb the £7 billion of unrelieved surplus advance corporation tax. That would have meant £7 billion of lost corporation tax receipts for the Treasury. However, the announced abolition of FIDs sent shock waves through British industry, particularly through companies with large overseas interests.

Little thought had been given to the consequences of the announcement, so in the Financial Times every other day from July to November were proposed solutions to the great FID problem that the Government had created. During the Report stage of the Bill, the Paymaster General even mooted four possible solutions of his own, all of which turned out to be non-starters. Finally, in November, having given up hope of finding a solution, the Government simply proposed the wholesale abolition of ACT. However, that would cause a huge cash-flow dip for the Government.

The solution was to restructure the entire corporation tax system and introduce quarterly corporation tax payments on account. That gave the Government the opportunity to raise further hidden taxes, to the tune of £2 billion a year for the next four years, as companies have to pay their corporation tax bills significantly earlier.

Is that a fair tax, in line with the principles set out in Labour's manifesto? Is it transparent? How will taking £2 billion a year from the corporate sector increase investment? In its green Budget, the Institute for Fiscal Studies states:

"The cashflow impact is unlikely to encourage investment, particularly in the short term."

The most extraordinary decision of all in the tax context is the Government's proposal to abolish PEPs and TESSAs, the most successful savings vehicles yet devised, and to replace them with ISAs. The measure was purportedly introduced to help to encourage savings by those on lower incomes, but the truth is that there is absolutely no advantage for any lower rate or even basic rate taxpayers to hold equity investments through an ISA. Few are likely to generate capital gains in excess of their own annual capital gains tax allowance, and the tax credit now reduced to 10 per cent. by the Government is unlikely to cover any management expenses.

Indeed, the Association of Unit Trusts and Investment Funds said:

"We believe that the administrative and regulatory issues raised by the proposals would render the ISA complex, costly and, possibly, unworkable."

The association went on to say:

"We believe the ISA will discourage people from raising their level of long-term savings."

The most iniquitous aspect of ISAs is the retrospection, penalising those who have saved, particularly the self-employed, who may not have an occupational pension but would have used PEPs to save capital, out of which their retirement income can be paid. The £50,000 limit is unfair to those people, as it generates an income of just £1,500 a year after tax, according to the Government's own figures. Age Concern has attacked the limit, saying:

"Before deciding on an overall limit, the Government should look further into the circumstances of those with over £50,000 invested in PEPs".

On every other day, the FT index is treated to an informal leak mooting various proposed solutions to this fiasco. Here is another tax that is widely regarded as unfair, which discourages savings and penalises those in or approaching retirement.

Will the Financial Secretary confirm that next week's Budget will include fewer ill-thought-through proposals and fewer decisions such as the one to abolish FIDs without any thought about the consequences? We want to see fewer decisions such as the one to abolish PEPs and TESSAs without any thought about the consequences for the self-employed and the decision to introduce quarterly corporation tax payments without any thought for its cash-flow problems and practicalities, including on what profit figure to base the payments.

The Government have sneaked through tax rises that are anti-thrift, damaging to investment and anti-middle England. They talk about increasing investment and then raise taxes on companies and investment funds so that those bodies must reduce investment. The Government talk softly about lone parents, and then remove their benefits. They promise to protect pensioners, and then take £5 billion a year out of pension funds. The Government claim to care for disabled people, but then propose to tax the disability living allowance. In opposition, the Labour party opposed tuition fees, but, in government, it has introduced them. The Government claim that they want to protect the monarchy, yet they do all they can to undermine it. The Government attack the countryside, and then send the Minister for the Environment to join a march against his Government.

This Government seek to be all things to all people. Their message to the people is: "We will be whatever you want us to be." In reality, the Government are what everybody does not want them to be. The Government have increased taxes, attacked middle England and told people what they can and cannot eat, and what they can and cannot do. The Government think that they can get away with a wholesale agenda of hidden tax rises. In short, this is an arrogant Government, who have let power go to their head.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): The basic question that we must ask this evening is: what would be the tax situation in the nightmare scenario of another Tory Government? In such a scenario, the plans that Labour has made to reduce debt, increase productivity and skill, and translate welfare into work—all of which reduce future tax liability for this country—would not go ahead. That is the real question for the British public.

The Government inherited a legacy of millions on the dole who were unable to pay tax while others paid higher tax to support them. Britain had slipped down the skills league and we had witnessed the emergence of social exclusion and rising crime—all the symptoms of economic failure and a cost to future taxpayers. The challenge for Labour was to tackle that vicious downward spiral and the high tax-low success economy of the Conservatives. We have met that challenge.

Immediately upon taking office, we granted independence to the Bank of England. We do not know what Conservative Members think about that, but the impact was to reduce overnight long-term borrowing costs by 0.29 per cent.—a saving of £1 billion a year. That reduction has grown to represent a saving for the taxpayer of about £6 billion a year, which is equivalent to 3p on tax. What would Opposition Members have done? They do not know. I guess that, in an even-steven situation, they would raise tax by 3p—which is another hidden tax.

I said earlier that national debt forecasts have decreased by £16 billion in the past year, which will save the taxpayer £1 billion a year. That would not happen under the Tories, so there would be another hidden tax. What about the new deal? The essence of the new deal is to translate claimants into taxpayers. The Conservatives had no plans to introduce that programme, so there would be another hidden tax.

[Mr. Geraint Davies]

We have heard that advance corporation tax and pensions will make the Government £5 billion. Where would the Conservatives get that £5 billion—perhaps from value-added tax? That is another hidden tax. I shall not go into great detail about the pensions issue, which has been discussed already—we know that there is an actuarial difference of view. Pension funds are rising in value as share values increase along with market confidence. Setting interest rates outside the political control of the Chancellor means that there is no risk premium on investment in British jobs, and therefore industry can move forward. That is the reality.

What about Europe? The right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) has said that we should be at the heart of Europe, but the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) says in his book—I know that no one has read it, but never mind—that we should block the euro and derail the legislation, although 60 per cent. of our trade is with Europe. Would that be in the interests of the British economy? Would it translate into high hidden taxes? Of course it would.

Recent Tory history is a sad catalogue of waste and cost. The previous Government's failure to act decisively on bovine spongiform encephalopathy cost £3.7 billion—the equivalent of 2p on income tax in a given year. What about privatisation? As I said, the previous Government sold off British assets at £5.7 billion less than their valuation by the market the next day. That amounts to 3p on income tax in one year, so it is another hidden tax.

Mr. Richard Page (South-West Hertfordshire): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I am sorry, but I do not have time.

What is the real cost of the 300,000 repossessions—there were 3,000 in 1979—that took place under the Tories? That is another hidden tax resulting from the bungling failure of discredited Tory Members.

The reality of the increases in council tax—the need for an extra £4 billion in local tax in the following three years—was disclosed in the Red Book by the previous Chancellor in November 1996. I could continue: we are talking about billions and billions, which is the equivalent of 10p on the standard rate of tax.

We do not want to hear any more lectures from Conservative Members about hidden taxes because we are dealing with enough of them now. Thank goodness we are getting Britain back to work, recovering our debt and putting the country on a good long-term footing.

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): Labour Members are living in a completely unrealistic world. The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the International Monetary Fund and the World bank will confirm—as we well know—that the Labour party inherited the soundest economy in Europe, with the lowest unemployment of 5 per cent., the best fiscal record of improvement and the lowest debt. This debate is about the Labour Government's taxation policy: it is silly to seek to claim that the new Labour Government had to resolve major economic problems. That is a most unconvincing argument.

I suggest that the Chief Secretary and other Labour Members take a walk in Britain's leafy suburbs. The Labour party convinced many members of the middle class that they would be safe with Labour, as it was no longer a socially redistributive party pledged to increase taxes for the middle classes. As has been admitted in debate, Labour has not increased taxes but has followed a clear agenda, led by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of finding other ways to tax the middle classes more.

Most of those measures have been described in the debate. I remind hon. Members that advance corporation tax has reduced the pensions that people will receive in future, and that those with personal pensions will have to pay about £20 week more to maintain their pensions.

Reference has been made to the charging of tuition fees to students attending university. Do Labour Members realise that the payment of £1,000 per annum by an ordinary middle-class family in middle England is equivalent to a 10 per cent. rise in income tax? Student loans were perfectly fair—students repaid them when they could afford it. I am sure that my colleagues will agree that it was a necessary reform in line with Dearing. However, tuition fees are quite different: they are a hidden tax on the middle class.

Mr. Rammell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Flight: No. There are only five minutes left.

When I asked about the community tax, it was pointed out to me that, because my constituency has, allegedly, a higher income per capita than other parts of Britain, it is fair and just that the gerrymandering with central Government money should result in the community tax in West Sussex going up by some 11 per cent. There is a clear agenda to increase the taxes of shire middle England by devious means.

The Government have boasted that the abolition of the assisted places scheme is a measure of redistribution. I spoke recently to the headmistress of an excellent school in the state sector, and was interested to note that the number of applications to her school had doubled, led in part by the Prime Minister's wife, as it is a school of academic excellence. The headmistress complained that so many parents could not afford to pay for academic excellence, and that they are going into debt so to do. As the Government well know, the abolition of assisted places hit the members of the middle class who aspired to give their children a better education.

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Flight: No. There is not much time.

Many Government Members made the point that the Conservatives let down the middle classes similarly when we were in government between 1992 and 1997. I personally take quite a degree of blame for that. Middle-class families paid more tax when they should not have, but I remind the Government why, because they are about to fall into the same trap. It was because—for which my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has apologised—we locked into the exchange rate mechanism and were stuck with rising interest rates when they needed to fall, and we had an uncompetitive currency. Those who wish to do the same when our own and Europe's economic cycles are so out of kilter will have the same future.

Where will the middle class be taxed more in the forthcoming Budget? Will it be in an increase of petrol tax; the abolition of mortgage interest relief at source; means-testing state pensions; limiting personal allowance to the standard rate of tax; taxing child benefit; and higher national insurance contributions? The Government know as well as I do that it will be some of those, and that all of them amount to the higher taxation of middle England.

Middle England is not deceived. It is well aware of what is happening. The crucial point is that it is not necessary. The reason for it is, as the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) pointed out, to build up a war chest to try to bribe the electorate when the next election comes, but they will not be deceived. It is time the Prime Minister kept his pledge to middle England and started to reduce taxation on middle-class families, and not to increase it yet further.

6.32 pm

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): It was striking how hon. Members on the Government Benches kept almost entirely off the subject of the debate. They talked about everything except the Government's tax record. Perhaps they are embarrassed about it. Perhaps they implicitly accept the points that we have made: that the Labour party has consistently broken its tax promises, and is, perhaps, afraid of what the future may hold.

Although this has been a short debate, it has confirmed beyond doubt that the Labour party explicitly promised before the election not to increase taxes and then immediately did so in a Budget some two months later. We are not really surprised by that, as it is one of the laws of nature that Labour Governments increase taxation, but we were all somewhat taken aback by the speed with which they broke their tax promises.

The Prime Minister could hardly have been more explicit in a speech that he made to business men in Birmingham when Leader of the Opposition—a speech to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), who is shadow Chancellor, and my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) referred—when he said:

"We have no plans to increase tax at all."

That is one of the few really clear statements about tax made by the previous Leader of the Opposition. At the end of that speech, he did not say, "Well, that's not really what I meant. When I just told you I have no plans to increase taxation, I meant that I do have plans to increase taxation." Nor, when he was reported the next day in the Financial Times, did he or anyone else write to the paper to say, "That was a pack of lies and does not accurately reflect my intentions if we win the general election." So it remained on the record as a clear statement of the Labour party's intentions.

However, within two months of winning the election, the Labour Government produced a Budget that reversed all that. Pages 40 and 41 of the Budget statement, published on Budget day in July, contains lists and columns of taxes that were increased. Even if one leaves out the windfall tax, which we agree that we were warned about, it adds up to a tax increase in the current financial year of £3.5 billion, rising by the end of the third year to more than £5 billion a year. There we have it. The Prime Minister promised before the election that he would not raise taxes at all, and in the first Budget he did exactly that. If that is what no increases at all means, I hate to think what the Government will do when they get really serious.

There is an explanation, advanced by my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor. He pointed out that, when referring to the £5 billion-a-year raid on pension funds, the Financial Secretary—I am glad that she is to reply to the debate—said:

"The measure is good for pensions and pensioners, not bad for them."—[Official Report, 3 July 1997; Vol. 297, c. 507.]

Again, she did not qualify that statement. I suppose that, if one really believes that taxing people is good for them, one feels rather less inhibited about doing so in successive Budgets, but it hardly explains the 17 tax rises in the first Budget. We have calculated them in exactly the same way that Labour did when it alleged that we put up taxes 22 times when we were in government. If the present Government continue at this rate, they will introduce four times as many tax increases during a full term in office. The 17 tax rises in the first Budget do not include many of the taxes to which my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) quite rightly referred, because that figure excludes the student tax and the double-figure council tax rises in place in most of our rural constituencies, which are a direct result of the Government piling on to local authorities obligations without matching them with the necessary funding.

To be fair, we were warned about one or two taxes. We were told about the windfall tax. We were also warned about the withdrawal of tax relief on medical insurance, but its withdrawal was not clever. Causing people to cancel their medical insurance policies and switching to the NHS has contributed directly to the breach of another Labour election promise: that it would get NHS waiting lists down. Instead, they have gone up by 100,000 since the election.

The central feature of the debate has been not only the number and scale of the tax increases but the fact that the full impact of the increases was hidden from the electorate. They are indeed stealth taxes. Old Labour, let us be fair, used to be fairly open about its tax plans. New Labour does it by the back door.

Take the pension tax. Labour thought that it would not be noticed because the damage was long term. The Chancellor said that the Budget would be for the long term, and in that sense he was right because the damage done to pension funds and people's savings will evolve over a long period. Labour went further than that. It tried to disguise the fact that it was raising taxes on pension funds at all. In the pocket Budget, produced at taxpayers' expense and circulated to the public, the only reference to that £5 billion-a-year tax raid on people's pension funds was the sentence:

"The Budget makes other tax changes to encourage companies to invest profits in the future."

That is the only reference to the biggest raid on people's savings that Britain has ever seen in a Budget.

The point is that that was not just wrong and deceitful; it was stupid. If the economy was in danger of overheating last year, as the Chancellor said that it was, the last thing that he should have done was to tax savings because, by doing so, by taxing institutional savings rather than people, he transferred the burden of controlling inflation on to interest rates. That is why we have seen five interest rate rises since the general election. That has hit investment, the strong pound has hit manufacturing—output from manufacturing industry fell again last month—and we are on the brink of a technical recession.

We know that the Chancellor has shuffled off responsibility—at least for the decision about interest rates—on to the Bank of England, but he cannot escape responsibility for a tax policy which went for disguise of his measures rather than economic effectiveness.

Taxing savings was stupid for another reason. The Government say that they are trying to reform welfare and cut welfare expenditure, but the only realistic alternative to the welfare state is for people to be reliant on private savings and private pension provision. That is precisely what the Chancellor hit in his last Budget, so taxing savings does not even make sense from that point of view.

The damage has already started. The National Association of Pension Funds is already reporting that many pension funds are reducing their prospective benefits, increasing the contributions demanded from their members, or switching from final salary schemes to money purchase schemes, which are less generous.

That was well set out by my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb). It is all right for Labour Members to do this because they, like us, enjoy a generous parliamentary final salary scheme. The Conservative Government's policy was to extend those benefits to as many people as possible. Labour's policy has been to retain those benefits for itself, but everyone else's benefits will be cut. Labour has done exactly the same with PEPs and TESSAs. Labour Members may have generous pension funds. In a debate last week, it was pointed out that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who, sadly, is not in his place today, has pension entitlements worth a capital sum of £356,000; the Financial Secretary to the Treasury has been in the House for only 11 years, but she will be pleased to know that, already, her pension entitlement has a capital value of £140,000. It is all right for them, but the small business man, self-employed, trying to build up a modest pension entitlement to see him through hard times or his old age, is thought to be rich if he has £50,000 in a PEP or TESSA. That is new Labour—we are all right, Jack, but everyone else must pay the high taxes.

There is a rumour in the air of a U-turn on PEPs and TESSAs and the individual savings account, but we know where Labour's instincts lie. It tries to cut everyone down to £50,000. If there is a U-turn, as I believe there may be next week, it will be because of the taxpayers' revolt and our debate last week in which we explained to the Government what they were walking into.

What about the other stealth taxes? We have heard quite a bit in the debate about the reduction in VAT on fuel from 8 to 5 per cent. Leaving aside the obvious point that by far and away the biggest benefit enjoyed by users of fuel was the price reductions consequential on privatisations, all of which were opposed by the Labour party, and leaving aside the fact that the benefit increases that we brought in when we put VAT on fuel ensured that all pensioner households were at least as well off as they would have been without it, the real story on VAT and indirect taxation is that the Government have not only increased the rates on fuel, tobacco and alcohol, but—this is a stealth point—brought forward the increases and made them more frequent in that we have had three Budgets in 16 months. Therefore, not only are the increases higher; they are more frequent.

For example, this year, 1997-98, the extra fuel duty amounts to £730 million as a result of the increase brought forward in the July Budget. We were not told that during the election either. My hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) was right to draw attention to the fact that that hits rural areas disproportionately.

Then we have the stealth tax on companies—the corporation tax changes. When the Chancellor announced the changes, he claimed that they had been welcomed by business; that business had accepted that it was necessary to move to the abolition of advance corporation tax and had welcomed the cut in corporation tax.

The Paymaster General, who, sadly, is not here—he is famously well informed about business matters—said that the statement had been welcomed by the Confederation of British Industry. That was not true. In a press release, the CBI said:

"The proposals in the November pre-Budget report, together with the measures in the July 1997 Budget, could increase taxation on business by almost £22 billion during this Parliament."

If that is so, it is a pretty funny way of expressing support for the Chancellor.

Industry faces further falls in manufacturing output—that has just been confirmed by statistics released yesterday—higher interest rates, a higher pound and £22 billion of extra taxation in this Parliament. The Chancellor said that he wanted to rebalance the economy. Is that really the way that he intended to do it?

Some people who have not seen taxes go up are still waiting for the Budget next week. We wonder whether that includes the Paymaster General. To quote the Chancellor, those with "millions in offshore tax havens" have not so far been touched. We had a panic slamming of the tax avoidance door last Friday, but that does not seem to have affected the Paymaster General. The Labour Government have failed to tax those whom they promised before the election they would tax, and have taxed those whom they promised before the election they would not tax. Those are the priorities of new Labour and that is the reality of a new Labour Government.

6.49 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Dawn Primarolo): In the few minutes left in the debate, I want to reply to a number of questions. I must tell the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) that I would not buy a second-hand pension from him and I certainly would not rely on any pension advice from him or any of his hon. Friends. As my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell) reminded the House, 500,000 cases of pension mis-selling have already been recorded in phase 1 and more information is to be announced on Thursday. That is a direct result of the policies of the previous Government.

It was a predictable speech from the shadow Chancellor but, in fairness to him, he said that he did not expect us to give him the Budget announcements today. Unfortunately, I am not sure that the shadow Chief Secretary understood that. I am sure that all hon. Members will understand that for many of the answers they will have to wait for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to announce the Budget next week.

The debate revolved around false promises and comparing records. It was a debate about therapy for the Opposition. They need the help of Labour Members if they are to come to terms with what happened when they were in government and why they lost the trust of the electorate.

Before dealing specifically with the previous Government's record, I shall respond to some of the points made by the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce). For 45 minutes, there were no Liberal Democrats in the Chamber to take part in the debate. However, the hon. Member for Gordon did take part in the debate and accused the Government of being cautious. As ever, he wants to spend money everywhere, but cannot say where it is to come from. Apparently, the 1p on tax is now not only for education but is to be used to write off everything that the Government inherited from the Tories. Presumably, he is urging the Government to be incautious. We shall not respond to that proposition.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis) reminded the House that the Conservative Government gave away the zero rate on VAT on domestic fuel and then tried to raise it to 17.5 per cent. He pointed out that they squandered billions of pounds of North sea oil revenues and that the list of accusations that they make against this Government includes the closure of tax loopholes. My hon. Friend challenged Conservative Members to say whether they were in favour of allowing those loopholes to continue. Of course, they did not want to respond. They do not want to have a policy for themselves, but simply want to create amnesia in the Chamber and among the electorate about what their Government did over 18 years.

We then had the incredible contribution from the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) who professed concern for the low-paid. I do not know where he was when his Government were in office. He complained about the attack on MIRAS. What did he say to his Government when they cut MIRAS from 25 to 20 per cent. and then to 15 per cent.? Perhaps he can tell us what he thought about VAT on fuel. What did he say when his Government destroyed bus services with deregulation? What did he say to the then Prime Minister about the poll tax when the then Prime Minister said that he believed that, once the poll tax was fully understood, it would be seen to be very much fairer and more acceptable? A total of £14 billion later, plus all the attacks on the low-paid, and the Conservatives now say that they care about what happens to people on low incomes. What a load of rubbish.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does the Financial Secretary recall saying in the Standing Committee on the Finance Bill, on which we both served, that the withdrawal of ACT credits was good for pensioners? How can the withdrawal of £22 billion-worth of tax credits be good for pensioners? Will she tell my constituents that?

Dawn Primarolo: I told the House and the Committee that we believed that it was for companies, not the tax man, to take the decisions, and that we were withdrawing a distortion in the system, as the hon. Gentleman well knows.

What is all this about keeping promises? When the Conservative Government were in office, they could not spell the word "promise". In March 1992, the then Prime Minister said that the Conservatives have an allergy to tax. In fact, they have an allergy to telling the truth about tax, except for the hapless then Chief Secretary, William Waldegrave—he is no longer in the House—who said on the Dimbleby programme in 1996 that it was no secret that the Conservative Government, right back to 1979, had always said that they preferred to take tax off direct taxation and put it on to indirect tax and "all those other taxes". By that, he meant VAT.

What did the Conservative party say about that? How did it mislead the electorate? In January 1992, the then Conservative Prime Minister said that there would be no VAT increase. In March 1992, he said that his Government had no need to increase VAT and no plans to extend its scope.

In the normal candid fashion that we have come to expect from the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), he said, when defending the imposition of VAT on fuel that it was "a perfectly fair tax". He also said that he had always thought that VAT had a narrow base and that it was worthy of reform. At one time he said—women were very pleased to hear this—that there were exemptions for children's clothes so that every woman with small feet would not have to pay tax on her shoes. Thank goodness for small mercies. I suppose that women felt secure with that statement.

However, by November 1993, the right hon. and learned Gentleman was saying that one of his options must be to extend the VAT base, and that the main candidates for that were food, children's clothing, transport, sewerage and newspapers, for all of which a powerful case could be made, but no amount of lobbying should put the Government off. The Conservative Government told the electorate one thing and did another.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am glad that the hon. Lady still reads my speeches. If she reads on, she will see why I rejected that case in my Budget speech. While she is going back in history, will she explain to the House why, when we said at the last election that a Labour Government would raise taxation, it was so vehemently denied and why the Chief Secretary expressly denied that there was any intention of changing the tax relief for PEPs or TESSAs or for the pensions industry?

Dawn Primarolo: I am glad that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is in the Chamber, because I have another point to put to him. Perhaps when it comes to honesty and answering questions, he can explain why the 1992 Conservative manifesto said that the party would maintain mortgage tax relief, when, in December 1993, he said that, luckily, it had not said at what rate. What is that if it is not misleading the country? [Interruption.] Conservative Members do not like the truth. They want to make accusations, but they will not listen to their own record.

The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe had it well sussed when he said in September 1996 that the public would be deeply suspicious of any tax cuts because they would remember that the Conservative party had promised tax cuts and had not been able to deliver them. Instead, it delivered tax rises—£2,000 per family over the period of that Government.

Mr. Clarke: Will the Minister give way?

Dawn Primarolo: The debate has to finish at 7 o'clock—I am sorry. The right hon. and learned Gentleman—[Interruption.] The Government have cut taxes. We reduced VAT on fuel.

Hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. The House must hear the Minister.

Dawn Primarolo: The Conservatives are hoping that the country will not be able to hear about their record. The Government have made tax promises and kept them: a winter fuel package for pensioners, a cut in corporation tax, help for small companies and a promise on energy-saving materials. We are helping the young and the long-term unemployed. We are about keeping promises and not breaking them. Next week, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will be presenting to the House how the Government will continue to defend jobs, to invest in our economy and to ensure that our promises are kept—however much Opposition Members choose to heckle.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House commends the Government for honouring its election promises not to increase the top or basic rate of income tax, to reduce VAT on domestic fuel to five per cent. and to introduce the levy on the windfall profits of the privatised utilities; approves the Government's determination to put in place a fair tax system, to encourage investment and long-term sustainable growth; believes that Britain's interests lie in the pursuit of sound economic policies that will benefit the many and not just the few, and which are in the long-term interests of the whole country; and urges the Government to reject any return to the boom and bust policies of the past which resulted in the 22 tax rises imposed by the previous administration.

Pensioners' Incomes

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): I have to tell the House that Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

7.14 pm

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green): I beg to move,

That this House notes with concern the Government's refusal to rule out means testing the basic state pension; believes the Government Actuary's advice to change the National Insurance rebates for those contracting out of SERPS is a direct result of the Chancellor's decision to abolish the ACT dividend tax credit in his July Budget, placing a huge burden on future pensioners, creating turmoil in the pensions market and confusion over pension reform; and calls upon the Government to apologise for devaluing long-term savings and creating fear amongst the most vulnerable members of society.

In the next few days, we shall have a chance to look at the Budget, so I do not intend today to trail our ideas about what it should contain. This debate is timely because it is important to consider what has happened in the past 10 months. The Secretary of State for Social Security and her hon. Friends have constantly told us that we cannot discuss matters in the Budget, but the national newspapers contain a series of leaks and discussions that will doubtless be denied as scurrilous rumours, but which seem to have a Government source.

Today, we must focus on pensions and the Government's record of the past 10 months—the impact that their policies have had and the changes that have been made—and ask whether pensions are safe in the Government's hands. The Government came to power giving mixed messages on pensions. On one hand, they said that they would protect pensions, while attacking the serious proposals that my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) made at the last election for pension reform; on the other, they vaguely talked about a system of reform while allowing it to be suggested that they would means-test the basic state pension without denial.

It is therefore ironic that the first step that the Chancellor took on arrival at No. 11 Downing street was to put together an unnecessary Budget that aimed a blow directly at pensions and future pensioners.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on bringing this important debate to the Floor of the House. Does he agree that a decent society is to be judged by how it treats its very poorest pensioners?

Mr. Duncan Smith: A decent society is to be judged by the way in which the Government in power treat all members of society, including those who are considered most in need. If the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford) wants to know how that will be achieved, she should ask the Secretary of State how that chimes with leaks and suggestions that the basic state pension will be means-tested.

The attitude of mind behind the Budget is the same as that which has prevailed in the Labour party since time immemorial. Labour Governments have always believed that company profits are evil and unnecessary. As a result, they equate pension funds with profits and seek to redistribute them as they see fit because they are of no use whatever. It is a case of new Labour, new redistribution; and new Labour, new tax.

Mr. Phil Hope (Corby): The hon. Gentleman said that this is an important debate. Will he explain why the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) is not going to wind up this evening's debate? Is it because he is not good enough, or because is he too good and the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) has dumped him because he is frightened that he will take his place on the Front Bench?

Mr. Duncan Smith: I know from that intervention that there is one person in the Chamber who is clearly not good enough. That was such a ludicrous, idiotic intervention that I shall not even bother to deal with it.

We have discussed endlessly the Government's position on pension funds and ACT dividend tax credits. Although the Government hoped and believed that they could somehow slip through the attack on pension funds unnoticed, it is significant that an increasing number of people are beginning to notice how damaging their actions were. A measure that raises £2.3 billion in 1997–98, £3.9 billion in 1998–99 and £5.4 billion in 1999–2000 from pension funds will have a huge negative effect on what pensioners will receive in future.

It is ironic that contrasts with what is in the Labour manifesto, which states:

"We will support and strengthen the framework for occupational pensions."

The Labour Government have actually done a complete turn around and have attacked personal pensions and occupational pensions. A measure that is equivalent to putting 2p, 3p and 4p on income tax over the same period is hardly likely to protect those most in need, to whom the hon. Member for Colne Valley referred.

The effect has been to force schemes to increase the contribution rates payable—

Mr. Hope: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Duncan Smith: I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman. His absurd and idiotic intervention was not worth dealing with then; it is not worth dealing with him now.

Some schemes have already had to pass on those increases to their members. Many in the industry say that that practice will increase dramatically as they continue to pass on the effects. A number of schemes have also already cancelled benefit improvements; as we have heard, some schemes have even switched from final salary to money purchase. That point has not gone unnoticed and the Government have tried to deal with it by dealing with the SERPS rebate.

Let us consider one important example of the effects of the Government's changes to ACT dividend tax credits and their attack on the funds. A 30-year-old whose fund would have been worth £260,000 at age 65 would have to pay £1,000 a year to make up the shortfall that is a direct result of what the Government did in the last Budget.

Today, a report commissioned by the BBC showed that council tax will rise by twice the level of inflation—when in opposition the Labour party promised that would not happen. I ask the House to reflect on what will happen in the next two to three years, as the effects of what has happened to pensions run by councils will begin to be felt. The effect will be to force council taxes to rise again and again. All that will occur as a result of the policies of a Government who, when in opposition, said that they would keep those taxes down.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal): Does my hon. Friend agree that those who are having to pay the extra £1,000 to put their own pension into proper funds will be the same people who are having to pay for other people—those who work for local authorities—to put their pensions into funds? Many employees will find that their employers are not prepared to make the extra money available for their pensions, but they will still be charged for the pensions of local government employees.

Mr. Duncan Smith: My right hon. Friend makes the point very powerfully. Either all those consequences went completely unnoticed by the Government at the time of the Budget or the Government hoped that they would go unnoticed by everyone who will have to make the extra contributions that my right hon. Friend has mentioned.

The cost will be passed on to local taxpayers. There is no such thing as a tax or a charge made on a company that does not go through to the consumer or taxpayer. The extra costs to businesses will flow as payroll taxes. On top of that, as we have heard today, the Government have got themselves into a bind over individual savings accounts. The Government's proposals for ISAs will compete directly with the same funds that people will want to put into pensions for long-term savings. There will be direct competition between short-term saving and long-term saving—that goes against the very reason the Government gave for introducing the new measure.

Mr. Desmond Browne (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that Bill Robinson, a director of the consultancy, London Economics, who was an adviser to Norman Lamont when he employed the same tactic of reducing ACT credit in his Budget, wrote an article entitled,"Taxing pension funds could be good for our health", which appeared in The Independent on 21 April 1997? That article stated:

"There is room for argument as to the proper scale of the fiscal privileges accorded to the pension funds, but what is potentially damaging is that the privilege is limited to distributed profits."

Mr. Duncan Smith: We resisted the temptation to do that. While we are on this point, I must quote Hansard from 1993, in which the then Chancellor, Norman Lamont, said:

"I propose to reduce the rate of tax on dividends from the current basic rate of 25 to the lower rate of 20 per cent. The effect of this, combined with the change to the tax credits, is to leave basic rate taxpayers neither better off nor worse off than they are now."—[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 186.]

I think and I hope that that quotation will end the whole ridiculous argument so that Labour Members will leave the subject.

Mr. Chris Pond (Gravesham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Duncan Smith: No, I wish to move on.

[Mr. Duncan Smith]

The key and the cornerstone to the issue—the biggest problem—involves SERPS. As the Government will remember, back in July Conservative Back Benchers warned the Government that their hasty consideration of such matters in the Budget would have a serious knock-on effect on those who had opted out or who were thinking of opting out of SERPS. I said that it was necessary to have an immediate out-of-sequence review to adjust the rebate, otherwise it would be devalued and people, particularly those in personal pensions, would eventually pull back into SERPS, increasing the Government's expenditure and exposure.

Mr. Pond: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Duncan Smith: No, I am making progress on this point.

The Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), who is to wind up tonight's debate, will recall those comments because they were part of my winding-up speech in that earlier debate. I should be grateful if he would deal with the way in which he dismissed the points that I made and then, in November, was forced to call in the Government Actuary and ask for a review.

The Government Actuary's report is an absolutely damning indictment of Labour's first Budget for nearly 20 years. He said:

"As a result of the proposed tax changes announced in the July 1997 Budget occupational and personal pension schemes (including appropriate personal pension schemes) are no longer able to reclaim tax credits on dividends payable by UK companies on equities which are held as scheme assets. This reduces the amount of dividend income from UK equities by just under 20 per cent. relative to the previous tax position".

The Government Actuary went on to make a number of points affecting personal pensions and occupational pensions, both salary related and money purchase. It is clear that, in his report, he assumes, quite rightly, a reduction of a quarter of 1 per cent. in the income from investments. That was obvious when the Chancellor sat down after giving his Budget speech.

I note that in today's Financial Times the leading actuarial consultant, Bacon and Woodrow, has said that the shortfall to those funds could be as much as £5 billion. That shortfall will be passed on directly to the companies and their pensioners. Bacon and Woodrow said:

"It said the problem stemmed from lower than expected dividends, pushing many schemes below the minimum funding requirements (MFR) set out in last year's Pensions Act. Returns have been cut by the abolition of tax credits in last July's Budget and by soaring equity markets".

The point about the Financial Times article is clear: at the last Budget the Chancellor assumed that the funds were all in surplus and so were easy to raid. The Financial Times is now demonstrating that the Government's assumption that there was a never-ending gravy train of improving dividends was wrong. The returns are now lower; they are becoming closer to the minimum funding requirement, so decisions will have to be made on whether to stay inside salary-related schemes or to get out and move into either personal pensions or contracted-out money purchase schemes. The Government have forced pension funds, on which they said they were keen, to make changes that are likely to be for the worse.

When they were given the options by the Government Actuary, the Government chose to increase the personal pensions rebate and freeze the rebates on contracted-out occupational salary-related schemes. It is clear that the one area that got badly hit was occupational money purchase schemes. We know that the Government Actuary assumed—I hope that the Secretary of State will focus on this—that there was a reduction in the return on investment of a quarter of 1 per cent., which had a huge effect on the way in which those funds would be managed. When the Secretary of State accepted the Government Actuary's report and said that she would raise the rebate on personal pensions, she accepted that position. She accepted that, as a result of the Budget, there was a fall-off in the amount of money that the funds would receive from their investments.

The Secretary of State then took a decision to freeze the salary-related rebate. At the same time, she has accepted that there was a shortfall to income from investments. However, in her rationale for reducing the rebate amount for money purchase schemes, the Secretary of State has executed a complete about-turn. Her rationale for lowering the rebate on those schemes has simply been that there has been no change in the amount of investment income that they were receiving, and that they would have lower expenses. In the table that she has accepted, she has therefore done a complete about-turn.

I should like the Secretary of State to tell the House why she has hit so hard contracted-out money purchase schemes and those who have pensions in such arrangements. Why has she dealt them such a blow—for what specific purpose? Clearly, it has been done to save money for the Exchequer and from the national insurance fund. Her rationale in the report is extremely unclear.

Mr. Pond: A few minutes ago, the hon. Gentleman mentioned the Government Actuary, and he now mentions the cost to the Exchequer. Is he aware that, according to experts in the industry, the basic pension-plus scheme—which I believe he supported—would have cost the Exchequer very large amounts without providing any form of sustainable income for pensioners? Will he tell the House whether, as the Opposition spokesman, that is still his position? I see that the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) is shaking his head. I therefore assume that you are not in favour of that scheme. So this intervention—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is not using correct parliamentary language.

Mr. Pond: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Duncan Smith: The hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond) really should wake himself up in the morning and remind himself that his party is now in government, not in opposition. I know that those points—that Labour is in government, and that those decisions have to be made—are very hard to bear, but the Government have been elected on the basis not only of protecting pension incomes but of developing reform proposals, with which we shall deal in a moment, but which are almost non-existent. The point that I was making—on which I thought he wished to intervene—was that my policy is to get into government at the next general election to sort out the mess that the Government have created.

The real issue is the extent to which the Government, after 10 months in office, already fear the likelihood of us getting back into government. I do not know whether my right hon. and hon. Friends have noticed it, but both in our earlier debate and in this one, Labour Members have spent their time asking what we will do when we are back in government. I certainly did not expect such fear after only 10 months in government—but never mind. We will now hear the reasons for their fear.

Ministers fear that they have been rumbled, and that the basis of the Government Actuary's report is an absolute indictment of the Government's Budget. The report demonstrates that the changes to the ACT dividend tax credit forced the Government to make an emergency call to the Government Actuary, who has had to examine and adjust the rebates. Ministers now say, "We cannot accept part of those recommendations, because what we really need to do is to save ourselves some money."

The Government have therefore done an about-turn, and basically accepted the logic of those who shouted the loudest—all the financial advisers on personal pensions, who said, "If you don't make this change, we'll drive them all back into SERPS." The Secretary of State has therefore bowed before that group. However, because others in the industry did not make such a noise, she has clawed back the money from those sources. That is the type of Government we have. The main blow to contracted-out money purchase and other schemes will fall directly on employers, and will subsequently be shuffled down to employees.

I see that the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Mr. Hughes) is yawning. I know that he finds it difficult to stay awake for the Government. It is remarkable that, although he does not understand what is going on, he votes for it.

The Secretary of State made a reply to the actuarial report. When she said that she would have to raise rebates for personal pensions, she was asked whether she took a measure of the blame for her actions and those of the Chancellor. She said:

"For individuals who have pensions with providers who take a rather less optimistic view of future investment returns there was a short term risk that they would be advised to contract back into SERPS."

Now she is blaming the advisers for being pessimistic, although they are bound by law to tell those investing in personal pensions, when the changes are made, that they should go back into SERPS. However, the Secretary of State wants to blame them for making those comments.

The Secretary of State went on to say:

"This would not necessarily have been in the long-term interests of the individuals involved."

What she is really saying is that the Government panicked. She was saying, "It wasn't in our long-term interests. They were going to bust our Budget; so we had to do something about it." That is the reality.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Duncan Smith: We can now move on.

Mr. Hope: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Duncan Smith: No, I will move on. I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman.

Despite the much-vaunted statement that the Government will support and strengthen the occupational pension framework, Ministers have simply dealt a body blow to pensions generally. The significant part of the Actuary's report makes it quite clear that the Chancellor has proceeded, with stealth and in secret, to redistribute money from one part of the economy to another. However, without realising it, he has dealt a blow to the overall pension reform process. By creating the problem at the heart of the debate on SERPS, he has made it almost impossible for the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security to make progress in his reform programme. The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but we are now 10 months into the welfare reform programme, and there is still no report on it.

Before the July Budget, I think that most hon. Members would have expected to hear more from the Minister for Welfare Reform, who had already examined the matter—I know, as I took great pleasure in reading many of his publications, as I am sure that the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security did; or perhaps did not—and, regardless of whether we liked them, we would have expected him to come up with a set of schemes that might have focused the Government on pension reform, getting them off to a flying start. If he had, perhaps we would have had something to debate by now. Instead, he was taken off the review, and his colleague was put on it.

At the heart of that ministerial change was the Budget's effects on SERPS. The Minister for Welfare Reform—who is on record as saying endlessly that SERPS has to go—suddenly discovered that the Chancellor had said in the Budget that SERPS must stay. He was subsequently taken off the review, and we will have to find some other way round the problem.

The Under-Secretary initiated a review that received 2,000 responses from industry. Although he closed that review, he almost immediately started another type of review—which received 171 responses by the time he closed it—because the responses to the initial review did not say want he wanted to hear.

There is therefore massive review fatigue in the industry. Every time industry answers a question from Ministers, it is asked another question. Ministers hope that, if they ask the industry ever more questions, they will eventually receive the answer that they wanted to hear initially. However, that should not really be surprising. The Government spent their time in opposition scurrilously attacking all aspects of pensions reform, and consequently did no thinking on the subject.

Across the country, Ministers have been scaring men and women not only about the basic state pension but about the state of their pension when it is time for them to retire.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that this debate is rather academic for millions of pensioners across the country? I am talking about pensioners—thousands of whom live in my constituency—who are drawing the basic state pension. Does he accept that the basic pensioner is £22 a week worse off today than when the Conservatives were elected to government in 1979—after which they decoupled pensions from earnings and coupled them with prices?

Mr. Duncan Smith: I hope that the hon. Gentleman tells all those—not wealthy—people in his constituency who made the effort to save money for their future and pensions that they are academic and irrelevant. They thought that their pensions—which the Government said that they would protect—were safe. I thought I heard him say—I wonder whether he is speaking on behalf of the Government—that the Government might be thinking about linking the basic state pension to earnings instead of to prices. Is he saying that the Government will do that?

The point is that the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) should be discussing everyone's savings and everyone's future—not trying to divide and attack one group. That is what the Government's actions amount to and what has happened since Labour has been in power. The Government have scared working men and women across the country.

Mr. Hope: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Duncan Smith: I tell the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Hope) and other Labour Members that they have been asked the question that was at the heart of what the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East asked: what will happen to the basic state pension? There has been leak after leak about whether the Government will means-test it, or claw it back. We have even seen a report in a newspaper—I think it was The Sunday Times—that said that the Government would claw back a basic minimum income of £100 via a means test.

Mr. Browne: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Duncan Smith: No. I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman, and I want to make progress.

When the Secretary of State was challenged on the matter—I think that it was at Question Time—she said:

"The hon. Gentleman should read our manifesto, which says that the basic state pension will continue to be paid universally, as it is now".—[Official Report, 15 December 1997; Vol. 303, c. 5.]

I checked the manifesto, which, funnily enough, did not say that at all. It said:

"The basic state pension will be retained as the foundation of pension provision. It will be increased at least in line with prices."

I do not know what my right hon. and hon. Friends think about that, but it does not sound to me like an absolute guarantee in regard to the basic state pension. It sounds a little like "Read my lips."

Mr. Browne: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Duncan Smith: I have given way to the hon. Gentleman already. He has had his moment in the sun.

We simply offer the Secretary of State an opportunity to support her hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East in her very first words. Perhaps she will be able to answer his question, and even answer the question supported by the Liberal Democrat amendment. What will happen to the basic state pension? I think that that is a fair question: the Government can give a guarantee about that. If the Secretary of State does not want to rule out means testing, perhaps she would prefer to say that the Government are thinking about it. I am sure that every hon. Member will understand that she is caught against the Budget, and cannot make commitments in one sense; but she can certainly rule out actions that the Government are not going to take.

So far, the Government have made a real mess of pensions. There has been chaos from the word go. Much of it started in the ridiculous position adopted by the Government during the last election, when they attacked any proposal for the reform of pensions. That continued into the Budget statement, when the Chancellor, in a moment of frenzy, attacked pension funds and drove a wedge into pension reform. He made it almost impossible for the Government to tackle the issue. That has created a problem right across the state earnings-related pension scheme. It has meant that the Government have had to arrange a special out-of-sequence review; it has meant that they have had to change policy in the space of 10 months. It has left people out there scared about their basic state pensions, scared about their pension funds and scared about what will happen to the pledges that were made at the time of the election.

The Prime Minister endlessly said that the Government would not raise taxes, but, since the Government took office, we have seen one tax raid after another. The most significant tax raid is the one that the Government have made on pension funds. That is the key. In 10 months, all that we have had is a record of broken promises and taxes increased by stealth. I can only say this to Labour Members: it is one sort of record to come to power and, in 10 months, to be tacking and weaving as though they were on their way out of power.

Perhaps that is what should happen. Perhaps that is why Labour Members are so scared. Perhaps that is why, throughout the last debate and, I dare say, during this debate, they have been more interested in knowing what we will do than in finding out what they have done themselves—which is to break promise after promise.

The Secretary of State for Social Security and Minister for Women (Ms Harriet Harman): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"welcomes the Government's commitment to maintain the basic state pension as the foundation of pension provision and to uprate it at least in line with prices; welcomes the tough action which is being taken to ensure that victims of pension mis-selling are compensated; welcomes the action the Government has already taken in giving a Winter Fuel Payment to all pensioners with fuel bills to pay and fulfilling its promise to Britain's pensioners by cutting VAT on fuel to five per cent.; welcomes the Government's progress in developing pensions policy which will benefit today's and tomorrow's pensioners; welcomes the widespread consultation the Government is undertaking and notes that the Government's Pension Review has received over 2,000 submissions from pension providers, employers, trade unions, pension experts and pensioners' organisations; notes the widespread support for the Government's proposals for Stakeholder Pensions; and deplores the previous administration's policies on pensions, their imposition of VAT on fuel and their attempt to increase VAT on fuel to 17.5 per cent."

Labour Members always welcome the opportunity to debate pensions, and I commend the Opposition on their choice of debate, but I cannot extend that commendation to the speech of the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith). He had no positive proposals to make on pensions policy. Let me say in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton,

South–East (Dr. Iddon) that the Opposition's current pensions policy is that they will be in government next time: that seems to be the extent of their policy.

The hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green said nothing about his Government's record, because they let pensioners down. Although that Government were comprehensively rejected by the British people—partly because of their record on pensions—all that the hon. Gentleman did was criticise the present Government for implementing the manifesto on which we were elected. Let me make the last Government's record clear, because it is the challenge that we now face. They failed pensioners: too many people in retirement are poor, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South–East made clear in his intervention. It is a scandal that, after a lifetime of work or caring for their families, pensioners are among the poorest people in Britain today. One in four pensioners must live on or below income support levels; 1.7 million must depend on income support; and a further 1 million who do not even claim the income support to which they are entitled live only on the basic state pension.

Inequality between pensioners has grown. The income of the bottom 20 per cent. of pensioner couples has risen by just £25 per week over the past 20 years, while the incomes of those at the top have risen by more than £160 a week.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove): Is that wrong?

Ms Harman: The hon. Lady asks, from a sedentary position, whether that is wrong. We want to narrow the gap between the pensioners at the bottom and all the others by ensuring a better standard of living for pensioners at the bottom. Without action, that inequality is set to grow.

All pensioners were hit by the notorious Tory VAT on fuel. Pensioners' fuel bills soared when it was introduced at 8 per cent.; only the Labour party, the Liberal Democrats and pensioners themselves stood together to stop the Tories from raising it to 17.5 per cent. That is the last Government's record on pensioners. Nor did they establish a proper framework for pensions for the future; indeed, they made matters worse.

Mr. Browne: In a Budget debate, the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) said:

"The most important part of the Budget speech was the part that dealt with VAT on fuel. All hon. Members should welcome that announcement."—[Official Report, 30 November 1993; Vol. 233, c. 975.]

Ms Harman: The hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green has gone a bit quiet now. He has lowered his head, and is looking at his papers. Perhaps he can hardly believe that he said that.

It is clear that the key to security in retirement is a good second pension on top of the basic state pension. Now, however, millions of people have no such provision of their own, as they have had no chance to build up a good second pension. Many who did have good occupational pensions lost out when they were wrongly encouraged to opt out of those pensions into poor-value private personal pensions under the last Government.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): Why has the Secretary of State decided to reduce rebates for contracted-out money purchase schemes on the basis of an assumed 2.25 percent. rate of return on assets, when the Government Actuary recommends an assumed 2 per cent. rate of return?

Ms Harman: We have made our position clear, but I will deal with it further in my speech. We sought the advice of the Government Actuary. The hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green makes much of the review being out of sequence, but we are entitled to ask for the Government Actuary's advice when we consider it right. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that we should not have done that? I am sure he agrees that it was right for us to seek the advice. We did so, we acted on it and we published our draft statutory instruments.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Will the Secretary of State now tell us why the Government asked for the Government Actuary's advice?

Ms Harman: We asked for the Government Actuary's advice because we thought it proper to do so; that is what he is there for. We sought his advice and took appropriate action. [Interruption.] Conservative Members are engaged in diversionary tactics because they know that I am about to deal with the issue of pensions mis-selling. We were right to seek the Government Actuary's advice. We took appropriate action and published draft regulations.

Many people in good occupational pensions opted out, which proved disastrous. Hundreds of thousands of people who had previously had an index-linked pension to which they and their employer contributed were landed instead with a poor-value private pension that ate up £1 in every £4 of their hard-earned savings.

That had a terrible effect on those people's prospects for retirement. People on half average earnings who previously contributed to their company pensions, along with their employer, would have seen their pensions in retirement slashed from more than £130 a week to only £58 a week.

Having caused the scandal of pensions mis-selling, the Tories failed to take action to compensate those who lost out. The hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green asked us to account for what we have been doing on pensions in government. My Department and the Treasury have been sorting out the scandal of those who were mis-sold personal pensions and whom the Tories failed to compensate. By the time of the general election, fewer than 2 per cent. of those who had been mis-sold personal pensions had been compensated, and 18,000 people died before getting any form of redress. It has been left to this Government to ensure that people are properly compensated.

My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary has pressurised the companies that mis-sold personal pensions; that pressure continues and is paying off. Figures published today by the Personal Investment Authority show a respectable increase in the effort to get compensation to the victims of pensions mis-selling, with a thirteenfold increase in the number of people compensated compared with this time last year. I want to thank my hon. Friend for that progress.

[Ms Harman]

We will press on, bringing justice to those whose pensions were ripped off by the Conservative Government.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): The Secretary of State has made comments about whether people were wise to come out of the state earnings-related pension scheme. The Minister for Welfare Reform said, at column 197 on 11 December 1997, that SERPS was "a pay-as-you-go scheme" and that he proposed to give people a better stake in their pensions by using the private sector.

Ms Harman: Indeed, we made it clear in the manifesto that we want people to have a stake in their pensions. That is why we are introducing and consulting on the stakeholder pension in addition to the basic state pension.

Despite the Conservative Government's record, the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green criticised this Government's record on pensions, and in particular the effect of last year's Budget. He spoke at length about the Budget, but said absolutely nothing new. He has made his sole point—it is not a good one—many times before, in written and oral questions, and he will continue to get the same answer. Let me try once again to explain the position to him.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made it clear that he believes that we must take action to strengthen the economy for the longer term. The only way in which to build an economy that can pay decent pensions in the future is by providing stability and growth, today and in the future. That requires high levels of long-term, high-quality investment, such as we have not seen before.

The Budget was designed to create the right conditions. It committed us to prudent spending, sound fiscal policies and cuts in corporation tax. We removed a bias in the tax system that discouraged long-term investment. Because the Budget was good for investment, good for companies and good for the economy it will be good for the ability of the economy to sustain pensions in the long term.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ms Harman: I did not know that the hon. Gentleman was allowed to speak in this debate. If I give way to him, he can explain why he is not winding up tonight's debate.

Mr. Burns: As always, I am extremely grateful to the Secretary of State. I want to ask her one simple question. Will she do me the courtesy of giving me a straightforward yes or no answer? As she develops her theme, will she please tell the House, and the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon), whether the Government will restore the link of the basic state pension to earnings or keep it linked to prices?

Ms Harman: I will deal with the value of the basic state pension later. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can give a yes or no answer to the question why he is not winding up this debate—yes or no?

Mr. Burns: Before the situation gets out of hand, let me explain that, as the Secretary of State knows from Question Time and from numerous debates, I have concentrated on welfare reform, while my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) has done a great deal of work on pensions, so it is only right that he should wind up this important debate tonight.

Ms Harman: If the hon. Gentleman listens to the debate, he may learn more.

We are increasing the rebates for appropriate personal pensions to ensure that contracting out remains attractive. The hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green asked about the advice of the Government Actuary. As I have already said, we sought and considered that advice, and last Wednesday we laid orders to increase the rebates.

The Government are taking, and are determined to continue taking, the long-term view of the economy and of pensions. That is the right approach to developing a pensions policy that can provide a secure retirement for all tomorrow's pensioners as well as today's.

The future of pensions policy is at the heart of the reform of the welfare state. When we set out the case for reform at the beginning of the year, we said that a welfare state fit for the 21st century had to extend opportunity and security to all. We said that individuals have a responsibility to provide for themselves when they can do so and that society has a responsibility to help those who cannot.

Those are the principles that underpin our pensions reform. We are determined to build a pensions system that provides a secure retirement for all pensioners: for today's pensioners as well as tomorrow's; for people on low or modest incomes as well as those on good salaries; and for women and carers as well as male breadwinners.

The system must balance fairly the responsibilities of the state and the individual, and the public and private sectors. In the past 10 months, we have made substantial progress in both providing for today's pensioners and developing a framework for pensions provision.

Pensions policy has to provide long-term security; people may contribute to their pensions for 40 years and be in retirement for more than 20 years. Pensions reform has to begin with debate, unlike the previous Government's pension plus scheme, which began on the back of an envelope. Our reform will begin with a wide-ranging debate, as it must be the product of consultation and build on broad support, because pensions reform has to last.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ms Harman: I want to make some progress, so I may give way to the hon. Gentleman later.

Only two months after coming into government, I announced a wide-ranging review, led by my ministerial colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), fulfilling another manifesto promise, to build a sustainable consensus on the future of pensions policy. We set out 10 challenges that the review needed to address. We have not heard one word from the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green about whether he thinks that they are the right challenges or how we should meet them. He has nothing to say on the subject.

We have a pensions system that serves some people extremely well, but fails too many, so we have to find ways of enabling those who lose out to get a better income in retirement. We must tackle the growth in pensioner inequality, including the growing inequality between men's and women's incomes in retirement. We have encouraged debate, and have consulted widely. We have received more than 2,000 responses to the pensions review from pension providers, the Confederation of British Industry and employers, trade unions, pensions experts and pensioners, and we have given the National Pensioners Convention, led by Jack Jones, a specific and central role in our review.

Officials, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State and I have met the National Pensioners Convention a number of times to ensure that the views of pensioners are heard at the heart of government. But the debate about the future of pensions must be better informed than it can be with the current available information. That is why, as part of the pensions review, we have set up for the first time an independent pension provision group, which is chaired by Tom Ross, to whom we are grateful, to provide an authoritative analysis of the current state of pension provision and likely trends. The group will report shortly, and will make an important contribution to the debate on pension reform.

Some of the fundamentals are already clear. Our pensions system has not kept up with the social and economic changes that have transformed the working and family lives of men and women over the past 50 years. The world of work has changed; it is no longer characterised by large numbers of men working for large employers, secure in the knowledge that their jobs are for life and bring with them a family wage and a pension for them and their wives when they retire.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk): The Secretary of State is describing the problem.

Ms Harman: It is a problem that we inherited from the previous Government. The world has changed, but pensions policy failed to respond, and those changes clearly passed the hon. Gentleman by.

Mrs. Gorman: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ms Harman: I have already given way to the hon. Lady.

Occupational schemes provide, and will continue to provide, the best form of second pension, particularly because in most cases the employer, as well as the employee, contributes towards the pension.

We want further to strengthen the framework of occupational pension provision, and encourage more people to join an occupational scheme when one is available. However, more and more working men and women do not have access to an occupational pension, because the best employer schemes are generally in the parts of the economy where employment has been shrinking—large private sector companies and the public sector. More people work for small and medium firms which are less likely to offer an occupational pension.

In the modern world of work, more men and women change jobs regularly, and are employed on temporary or short-term contracts. That is the background against which we have to work. More people are on the borders between employment and self-employment, and have no guarantee of regular work. Nowadays, two out of three women work, and it is expected that women will account for three quarters of the increase in the work force by 2006.

Mothers form a growing proportion of the work force, and many of them want more flexible working patterns, which is one reason why one in five employed people work part time. Over the past 50 years, there have been profound changes in work and family patterns, but while the world of work has changed dramatically, the pensions system has not.

Mrs. Gorman: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ms Harman: I have already given way to the hon. Lady; I shall not give way to her again.

Millions of people work in ways that are not catered for by the existing pensions system: their employer does not provide an occupational pension; their income is not high or stable enough to make personal pensions a good deal; and some of them, mainly women, may not even contribute to their basic state pension because, although they work, their earnings fall below the national insurance lower earnings limit.

Without action being taken on pensions, those millions of people will face the prospect of dependence on means-tested benefits in retirement, and the gap between those who have access to a good occupational or personal second pension and the millions who do not will widen. That is unacceptable.

Our welfare-to-work reforms will help people into work, and our pensions reforms will help people in work to save for their retirement. We are working on plans for stakeholder pensions, and consulting on the technical detail to which the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green referred, to help people who do not have access to an occupational pension for whom there was no provision under the previous Government.

We want secure, flexible, value-for-money pensions for people on low or intermittent incomes, many of whom are women. Not only is consensus growing about the nature of the problem, but there is increasingly broad agreement about the solution. I have been encouraged by the consensus about the need for and shape of new, value-for-money second pensions which has emerged from our recent consultations on stakeholder pensions.

Stakeholder pensions must offer excellent value for money, and can do so by making economies of scale through pooling savings in multi-member schemes and adopting low-charging regimes. They must be simple to regulate and easy to understand, and they must be available to the self-employed. Our pensions policy is starting to fill some of the gaps left behind by the previous Government who left people heading for their retirement without a good second pension.

We must provide security in retirement for people who are contributing to society, not through paid work but through their caring responsibilities. Carers, most of whom are women, are unable to save for their pension, and if pensions that are designed to meet their needs are not available—under the previous Government, there was none—they face poverty and dependence on means-tested benefits in retirement. For example, a woman from West Yorkshire contacted the Carers National Association.

Mr. Gibb: Will the Secretary of State say, once and for all, whether the Government will means-test the basic state pension—yes or no?

Ms Harman: I am dealing with the citizenship pension for carers, and will address the hon. Gentleman's point when I come to the basic state pension.

A woman from West Yorkshire contacted the Carers National Association. She had worked in a supermarket since she was 20, and had an occupational pension into which she and her employer had paid. When the woman was 50, her mother, who was in her 70s, had a stroke, so the woman gave up her job to care for her. She has lost 10 years of her and her employer's pension contributions, and fears that in retirement she will end up like her mother—on income support.

That woman, and people like her, deserve a secure and dignified retirement, and a pension in their own right on top of the basic state pension, so we are exploring plans for a citizenship pension to enable all carers to enjoy a decent and dignified retirement.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): I have been studying the Government's pension reforms, and stakeholder pensions have received huge attention. There has been a massive consultation exercise on them, but citizenship pensions, rather like the people they are provided for, are the poor relation. The Secretary of State was questioned by the Social Security Select Committee on citizenship pensions, and her answer was hesitant and unclear. Does she accept that no progress has been made on the issue?

Ms Harman: There has been extensive consultation. The hon. Gentleman and his party have been consistent advocates of such pensions. I assure him that we are making progress, and that citizenship pensions have by no means dropped off our pension reform agenda.

The Government are already tackling key issues in developing a fair and lasting pensions policy for the future, but we are also taking immediate action to fulfil our commitment to help today's pensioners. Our manifesto made it clear that we would maintain the basic state pension as the foundation for pension provision, and that we would uprate it at least in line with prices. We have fulfilled our commitment and have increased the basic state pension for all pensioners, so that from next month the basic state pension for a couple will exceed £100 for the first time.

Pensioners spend a greater proportion of their income on fuel than other households, so we have taken a wide range of action to help them to afford to keep warm during the winter. We have cut pensioners' fuel bills by cutting VAT on fuel to 5 per cent., and have reduced the gas levy to zero. For the first time—

Mrs. Gorman: None of them has been paid.

Ms Harman: The hon. Lady says that none of them has been paid. What we are talking about is the cut in VAT on gas and electricity, which certainly has happened and which would not have happened had we not been in government.

For the first time, all pensioners are getting help with their fuel bills through winter fuel payments.

Mr. Burns: Some are still waiting.

Ms Harman: We made it clear that we would pay out first to the poorest pensioners—those on income support. All the poorest pensioners have been paid.

Mr. Burns: Will the right hon. Lady clarify the phrase "all the poorest pensioners", which she keeps using? Nobody who becomes a pensioner from 6 January this year will receive a penny this year.

Ms Harman: For 18 years, nobody, whenever he or she retired, got a winter fuel payment. The hon. Gentleman knows that, when a payment is provided, there has to be a cut-off point somewhere. The difference is that this Government are paying money to help pensioners with their fuel bills, whereas under the previous Government pensioners had to pay money to the Government to help them with their financial problems.

Mr. Burns: Will the right hon. Lady tell the House the cut-off date for the Christmas bonus?

Ms Harman: That is a routine payment, which is paid every year.

The Minister for Welfare Reform (Mr. Frank Field): Christmas is 25 December.

Ms Harman: My right hon. Friend says that Christmas is 25 December. The hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) wants to make a huge point about the administration, but the fact is that we are paying every single pensioner extra money to help with his or her fuel bills. For the first time, all pensioners are getting help with their fuel bills through winter fuel payments. Some of Britain's poorest pensioners—the 1.5 million pensioners who are on income support—received their winter fuel payment of £50 in January. They have all been paid.

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, during the 18 years of the Conservative Government, 9.5 million people retired and every single one was worse off as a result of the policies of that Government?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend makes a good point.

Last week, the first of more than 8 million pensioners received their winter fuel payment, as we started to pay £20 to all other pensioner households. All pensioners should receive a payment by the end of the month. Conservative Members may deride that policy, but people think that it is fair and just that one of our priorities, as promised in our manifesto, is to get help to all of today's pensioners, especially the poorest. We said that, as a priority, we would get help to today's poorest pensioners and we are delivering on our promise.

We are concerned about the very poorest—the people who are not claiming income support even though they are entitled to it. We are carrying out research to establish why up to 1 million pensioners do not claim the income support to which they are entitled. We have made it clear that the Government believe that people who are not entitled to benefit should not get it, but we also believe that those who are entitled to benefit should get it.

When we were in opposition and when the House debated what became the Social Security Administration (Fraud) Act 1997, I repeatedly pressed the Tory Government to use the new computers and data-matching powers not only to catch fraudsters—important though that is—but to identify pensioners who were falling through the net.

Mr. Field: They would not do so.

Ms Harman: My right hon. Friend is right. The previous Secretary of State for Social Security, the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), refused to do that. He said that the poorest pensioners chose not to claim the money, because they did not want it. He said that, if the Government attempted to identify them, they would be found guilty by the European Court of Human Rights, so they could not possibly do it. We are not that frail. The right hon. Gentleman refused to recognise that, although those pensioners might need the money, they might not know that they were entitled to it, or that they might know that they were entitled to it, but be too proud to claim it.

That was wrong and now that we are in government we are taking action to carry out our manifesto promise of getting help to the poorest pensioners. Today, I can announce that we are investing £15 million in nine new pilot exercises to find the best ways of getting help to pensioners who do not claim their income support. Those pilots will start next month in Glasgow, Preston, York, Lambeth, Torbay, Stroud, South Staffordshire, Torfaen and East Renfrewshire.

We already hold numerous records and data on the people whom we are trying to help. Most are on record at the Contributions Agency as being entitled to the basic state pension and many are on record at the Benefits Agency because they receive other social security benefits such as attendance allowance, housing benefit and council tax benefit. At the moment, that information is just lying there, on different computer systems, but we will use that information and our data-matching powers to identify those pensioners who are missing out. Under those pilots the Benefits Agency, the Contributions Agency and local authorities in the nine areas will work together to find the best ways of getting the money to those poorest pensioners.

Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on that announcement. May I ask her to do as much as she can to accelerate the pilot projects and get them finished quickly, so that what is learned from them can be extended to the rest of the country as soon as possible?

Ms Harman: We shall report back to the House on how the projects work, but we can all agree that those who have gone without are the poorest people in society. The information on how to help them has never been used before, so this pioneering and innovative measure is long overdue.

We are modernising the social security system to tackle social and economic inequality and to tackle poverty. That is a promise on which we were elected. Not only do the new Labour Government take a different approach to the objectives of pensions policy from their predecessors; they take a different approach to developing that policy so that we get it right.

That is why we shall publish our proposals on pensions and the conclusions of our pensions review, so as to enable a full and well-informed debate and to get it right. That is why our proposals on pension sharing on divorce will be set out in draft Bill clauses, which will be published in advance of introducing them into the House, so that they can be examined by, among others, the Select Committee on Social Security. In that way, we can consult with and draw on the advice of others and so get it right.

Our principles are clearly established and now we have established the practice of open consultation in order to improve the quality of the draft legislation that comes before the House for consideration. Reforming pensions provision is at the centre of reforming welfare and we have already made substantial progress along the path of pensions reform.

8.17 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): I was delighted when the Secretary of State said that we had to proceed by consent. In my brief contribution, I shall echo that point of view. Pensions are far too serious a subject to be the plaything of party politics.

The parties on both sides of the House have apologies to make. I shall start by making an apology on behalf of the Conservative party: there undoubtedly was a serious problem of pension mis-selling in the 1980s. I doubt whether that was the fault of Conservative Ministers or Back Benchers, but the problem occurred and the Labour Government are right to address it. In turn, the Government should make an apology for their abolition of ACT which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) made clear, will cost pensioners up to £5 billion. That sends entirely the wrong message. As I have said, if we are going to make any headway at all, we have to proceed by way of consent and cross-party support.

The Secretary of State for Social Security is right to say that the pension system is failing many people. It has become almost a cliché, but work patterns are changing and, for the first time, there has been a worrying dip in the number of people who take out occupational pensions. Our pension industry faces a serious crisis.

Since the second world war, we have had a record second to none in persuading people to take out occupational pensions. A total of £600 billion is invested, but work patterns are changing. The Secretary of State is right to say that there is a particularly worrying trend with women workers, whose contributions are often not sufficient.

All that leads me to suggest that there must be cross-party consensus that, with the end of the link with earnings, the basic state pension, which for 50 years has been the pride of the welfare state, is no longer adequate. It is no longer adequate in our age; it will certainly not be adequate by the middle of the next century. That is a worrying development because people have been taught to rely on the basic state pension. They can no longer do so.

There is no point in hurling insults across the Chamber. The fact is that neither party, whichever is in government, is going to restore the link with earnings because we simply cannot afford to do so. Therefore, the basic state pension is going to decline, is declining in terms of real value, is not sufficient and will be even less sufficient for our elderly population.

Two nations are emerging. Many of us enjoy an excellent occupational pension in the House, if we are fortunate to survive for enough years. One nation enjoys first-rate occupational pensions; another does not and is condemned to an old age of poverty and reliance on income support. That is not acceptable in a civilised society.

Surely that point is, or should be, accepted by hon. Members on both sides of the House, but what do we do then? Obviously the Secretary of State is right. We have to create a stakeholder society, to use her jargon. There is nothing wrong with the phrase. She coined it, but there is no reason why we should not adopt it. That was precisely what my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), the former Secretary of State for Social Security, now the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer, was trying to do before the general election. He was trying to encourage people to make provision for their old age.

Mr. Hope: The hon. Gentleman gives the impression that there is cross-party consensus. Does he agree that the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, said nothing about pensioner poverty, about extra payments to pensioners or about the Conservative Government's failure to do anything to assist pensioners who live on or below the poverty line? Does the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) agree that we have inherited a legacy of pensioner poverty, which has caused millions of people throughout this country enormous distress?

Mr. Leigh: It is precisely that sort of pointless party political intervention that does not help pensioners one bit. The hon. Gentleman made an utterly ludicrous intervention at the beginning of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green. What is the point in saying that? How will that help pensioners?

Let us return to the real debate. The fact is that the basic state pension is not adequate. What are we going to do about it? Before the general election, my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden proposed an idea, a concept. The trouble is that it was launched almost exactly a year ago, on 6 March 1997, when we were in the midst of pre-electoral tension. Frankly, there was no proper debate about his sensible proposals. All he was saying was that people—all people—should be encouraged and required under the basic pension plus system to put a proportion of their income into a private insurance company to provide for their old age.

That idea clearly was not acceptable to the Labour party in that pre-election period. Perhaps it is not acceptable now. However, there is a compromise that hon. Members on both sides of the House may be able to accept. I know that Chile is a dirty word to many Labour Members, so I do not want to go on and on about it, but I could mention Singapore if that makes life easier for them. Consensus is surely emerging throughout the world that, if we are to provide sensibly for all old people, we must proceed not down the pay-as-you-go route, but down the stakeholder pension route.

Whether we support the Chilean model, by which people are required to put 10 per cent. of their income into a highly regulated, albeit private, insurance system, or the Singaporean model, where people do the same, but pension funds are effectively controlled and run by the Government, all we can do is give pensioners the choice. We have to require them to put a proportion of their income into a pension plan.

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): There is a crucial difference between the two models. The returns achieved by Singapore have totalled only some 2.5 per cent. because the investment has been state controlled, whereas the returns achieved by the Chile funds have been substantially larger. If it is a compulsory state-run system, there is a huge issue as to how the money is used.

Mr. Leigh: I fully accept my hon. Friend's point. The initial enthusiasm of the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport—when he was the social security shadow spokesman—for the Singaporean system was tempered by the relatively low rate of return that the Singaporean Government managed to achieve, even though it is a successful and highly regulated society, so my hon. Friend makes a fair point.

All I say is that I fear, because we are not at present in government, that there is no enthusiasm on the Treasury Front Bench to proceed down the Chilean route. When the Select Committee on Social Security visited Chile before the last election, led by its then Chairman, now the Minister for Welfare Reform, it took some interesting evidence. Generally, we were impressed by the Chilean experience. We were particularly impressed by the rate of return and by the fact that, because the system is so highly regulated, there has been little abuse, although there has been a certain amount of abuse with people chopping and changing between different pension schemes. However, as it is highly regulated, they do not personally lose out.

The Government are not going to move down that road immediately because that would go against all their instincts. I understand that, but surely we can give people at least the choice, either to invest in private pension plans or, if that is unacceptable to them, to invest in pension schemes that are run by mutual or friendly societies.

I understand that pension schemes that are run by mutual or friendly societies may be more acceptable to the Government than private insurance schemes, but, whatever system we adopt, we cannot dictate to people how they should plan for their retirement. We have to give them the choice. What we surely have to do as a nation is find some way—this will take not one or two Parliaments, but perhaps five, 10, 15 or 20 Parliaments to achieve—that hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber can support, to encourage and require everyone, whatever the nature of their work pattern, however many times they change jobs, and whether they are men or women, to provide adequately for their old age. If we do not, we are storing up for this country the most profound and agonising social turmoil that it has encountered for many years.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley): This has been an intriguing debate so far. At the beginning of the debate, I thought, "This is typical. It exemplifies the difference between Labour and Opposition Members." Following the speech by the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), I am even more intrigued. We continue to talk about the second pension route, but I was intrigued especially by the hon. Gentleman's remarks about pensioner poverty. I want to concentrate today on pensioner poverty, and stability and security in old age. I agree that we need a second pension, but that is for the future—the young people of today and how they supply the resources to provide security for themselves in their old age. One thing that will not give them security is a scheme that pulls the rug from under them by taking away the security of a basic state pension. Most of the suggestions from the Conservative party when it was in government gave the impression that it would pull the rug away from pensioners.

Mr. Flight: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Kali Mountford: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is going to illustrate that point.

Mr. Flight: The policy proposed before the general election involved a state guarantee equivalent to the state pension. The crucial issue was that the returns on private sector investment could be considerably greater than the returns within the state system. It was not proposed to remove the guarantee of the amount of the state pension.

Kali Mountford: We are going down an old path here. We have discussed this before in the debates on the Finance Bill and subsequent debates about social security. The perception of voters and my perception of basic pension plus was that once one was out of the system, there was no way back in. That created real fear for voters. We have to take that fear away.

Security in retirement is an absolute need. Another absolute need is freedom from poverty. I am delighted with what I have heard from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State this evening. The use of the technology of today to provide security for a new age has to be the right approach. Many people have an income below the level of income support. That is real and abject poverty. There is a generation gap which is important both to the provision of second pensions and to the provision of pensions today. The poorest people are those aged over 75, of whom 40 per cent. have an income below the level of income support. That generation of people is least likely to claim the benefits to which they are entitled. They live in the most real poverty of all. Whichever group of poor people we discuss, those are the people about whom I am most concerned. They are physically vulnerable and they are proud of their traditions. We have to find the right way in which to ensure that they claim that to which they are entitled. One way in which to do that, which is a correct way, is to ensure that they do not pay over the odds for basic needs. So let us have a look at VAT on fuel.

Pensioners will have been disappointed in Conservative Members, such as the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), who welcomed the previous Chancellor's proposal to increase VAT on fuel to 17.5 per cent. Let us remember that it was the Labour Opposition who beat down that proposal. The Chancellor at that time decided to fill the gap in his Budget, which was created when the House voted against his proposal, by reducing the increase in the state pension by 30p. How did that meet the expectation of proper state support through the basic state pension? That illustrates the difference in the priorities of the Labour Government and the Conservative party when it was in government.

Mr. Hope: Is my hon. Friend aware that the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) said in the House of the increase in the state pension age:

"The equalisation of the state pension age at 65—again a change that we proposed in August—is welcome, but the Government should look again at increasing it, in due course, to 67 because the average age is rising."?—[Official Report, 30 November 1993; Vol. 233, c. 978.]

If that had happened, some 2.4 million pensioners would have lost out.

Kali Mountford: Sadly, I am not surprised to hear that, although I am disappointed. The demographic changes in society present a problem and imagination has to be used to solve it. We have an aging population with growing needs, but a simplistic approach is not the answer. One simple answer that needs to be understood is that people who need benefits sometimes need to know the route to those benefits. That is why VAT on fuel is so important and why I welcome the reduction in VAT on fuel. I expect that Conservative Members were disappointed in it, given that they welcomed the opposite when their party was in government.

Let us consider the effect of reducing VAT on fuel, blunt instrument though it may be. It allows pensioners to keep their heating on in the winter. Help the Aged reported that pensioners were having to make decisions between food and fuel. That is why it welcomed the introduction of the £20 and the £50 for fuel this winter—another blunt instrument, but a blunt instrument that gets to the point. If pensioners have to wait for weeks on end to see how cold it gets to find out whether they will be entitled to extra support, it makes life very difficult for them, especially as the rules in relation to income support and cold weather payments were complicated. At least this winter—it has been a mild winter—pensioners have had the cash to pay their heating bills without all that rigmarole. That is important.

Our aging population faces some difficult issues and problems. A group of pensioners came to see me on Saturday. They brought me a letter from their pensioner action group about what they thought was most important. They wanted to see an increase in the basic state pension; there is no surprise in that. So they would have been disappointed by the previous Chancellor's reduction in the increase.

Mr. Gibb: Did those pensioners request that the hon. Lady's Government means-test the basic state pension? If not, why is the hon. Lady not asking the Secretary of State to confirm whether she intends to means-test it?

Kali Mountford: The issue of means-testing was not raised by that group of pensioners. They concentrated on some rather more interesting issues, such as why they had so much difficulty with care in the community, why they could not get into the private residential homes that used to be in local authority control and why they found it so difficult to get access to the national health service, which they felt that they had paid for and the previous Government had eroded.

Miss Kirkbride: I wonder whether the hon. Lady explained to her pensioners why her Labour Government, who pleaded so much on behalf of poor pensioners, were not prepared to restore the link with earnings.

Kali Mountford: The hon. Lady obviously has not been listening to the debate. After 18 years of Tory government and the erosion of the basic state pension, we have a long way to go from a low base. A great deal of imagination is needed. The most important people are those on incomes below income support level. The point of income support is that it marks the point of poverty. If people are below that point, they are making difficult choices in managing their families' budgets. To keep harping on this issue, which misses the point about pensioners, does them no favours at all.

We need to make decisions about our priorities. Conservative Members keep talking about actuaries and private pension funds—

Mr. Gibb: No, about SERPS.

Kali Mountford: The hon. Gentleman should allow me to finish. Conservative Members have missed the point about basic priorities. We must start with those in greatest need. The Secretary of State is absolutely right to look into providing second pensions and increased pensions. That process needs to be inclusive and consultative. The Conservative party bludgeoned people into decisions without properly consulting. At least at the end of our process of consultation, a consensus will emerge on how future pensions are to be provided. It is the pensioners of today who are not on income support who must be the main focus of our attention.

Under the Conservative Government, one quarter of all pensioners did not get an adequate second pension, and 12 million of them got no company pension. Then there was the diabolical tragedy of the mis-selling of pensions. There was also a growing gap between the poorest and richest pensioners. In 1979, the bottom 20 per cent. received £55.90 and the top 20 per cent. £169.60. Sixteen years on, the bottom 20 per cent. have had an increase of £15 but the top 20 per cent. have enjoyed an increase of £103. If that drift were allowed to continue, the poorest would become even poorer and the richest would continue to get richer. That is no way to proceed. The challenge for this Government is to provide for the poorest pensioners, which is why I commend my right hon. Friend's proposals to the House.

8.41 pm

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): I brought with me to the Chamber tonight a secret—a secret concerning how the Conservatives are planning to win the next general election—[Hon. Members: "Tell us."] I note a greater than usual attentiveness on the Conservative Benches. After close textual analysis of tonight's motion, it is clear to me that the Conservatives plan to sweep back to power on a tide of amnesia. They hope that we will all forget the past 18 years and concentrate only on the past eight months. They must think we have very short memories.

The Tories spent 18 years ripping the heart out of rural Britain, and they now pretend to be the friends of the countryside. They spent 18 years squeezing higher education, but now pretend to be the friends of the students. After spending 18 years slashing future spending on state pensions and creating a shambles over private pensions, they now claim to be the friends of pensioners. It just does not add up.

The motion claims to deal with the failings of the present Government. We shall assess those claims in a moment; meanwhile, it is important to remember that the real problems with pensioner incomes have arisen not just since 1 May but since 1979.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton): Before we all join the hon. Gentleman in suffering from amnesia, will he recognise that no Government will change the rules linking pensions to prices rather than earnings; and that, if Labour ever did that, the Government would be unable to provide the expenditure for health and education that they want to?

The Conservatives' proposals on pensions just before the election would have increased expenditure on them by £7 billion a year, at the peak, in order to bring our pension system under better long-term control. Why did not the hon. Gentleman welcome those measures—or perhaps he has not yet worked out what Liberal Democrat party policy is on the issue?

Mr. Webb: The hon. Gentleman is quite right to say that the Government will not link the basic state pension to earnings again. I would be most surprised if they did, but I am sure they will not. Nor would the official Opposition; and I would be greatly surprised if our party policy, as it is reviewed, came up with that idea, either. It is true that all the parties seem agreed on that.

The motion suggests that everything that is wrong with pensioners' incomes started to go wrong on 1 May. That is simply not true. Pensioners who retire in the new millennium will have far less to live on, not as a result of this Government's policies but as a result of Conservative policies. The basic state pension will have been eroded, by the breaking of the earnings link, to a level which Michael Portillo once famously described as nugatory. SERPS pensions will be worth less than half what they would have been under the pre-Conservative system.

How many billions did those Conservative measures take off pensioners? The answer is: not the £5 billion that the Government have taken from pension funds, but tens of billions of pounds. Yet now the Conservatives have the gall to criticise the Labour Government for taking £5 billion out of the system. That is small beer by Conservative standards.

It is not as if the private sector fared any better. Was it not a Conservative Chancellor, Mr. Lamont, who first spotted that tax credits were a wheeze for raising £1 billion? It seems that a few years ago that was right when the Conservatives did it; now, when the Labour party does its famous trick of following Conservative policies, the Opposition criticise it for doing so. How implausible it is when the Conservatives pretend to be outraged when the Labour Government follow their lead.

What about the debacle over personal pensions, which is still only slowly being unravelled? The Labour Government may not have done much for pensioners so far, but they have at least tackled this one scam with a great deal more energy and urgency than it ever received from the Conservatives. Indeed, I pay tribute to the Economic Secretary to the Treasury for all she has done and for the energy that she has devoted to that campaign. We wish her well with it.

What of the Government's record on pensions? For today's pensioners, they have cut VAT on fuel from 8 to 5 per cent.—no doubt a move welcomed by pensioners. But Labour Members should not get carried away into thinking that that will make a big difference to elderly people. The Government announced the cutting of VAT on fuel in July. That had the advantage of feeding into the September retail prices index, which meant that pensions next April will go up by less than they would have without the cut in VAT. Taking account of that, a recent written answer stated that a typical married pensioner will get about 25p a week from the cut in VAT on fuel—not unwelcome, but scarcely a king's ransom.

What about the other measure—winter fuel payments? That, too, is a welcome move, although there is no long-term strategy to deal with fuel poverty: it is to apply just this year and next. The payment is worth less than 40p to a typical pensioner. Added together, therefore, the two measures are worth less than £1 a week to the typical pensioner. That hardly constitutes a serious attack on pensioner poverty.

As regards changes to tax credits, it is disingenuous of the Government to pretend that they can take £5 billion from pension funds without affecting pensions—

Mr. Coaker: The hon. Gentleman is falling into the same trap as the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) fell into—equating a change in the tax regime with an effect on pension fund income. Pension funds operate in the total economy and depend on a range of factors, not just the tax regime. We cannot ignore the general health of the economy, investment returns and so on—they all affect pension funds as well.

Mr. Webb: The hon. Gentleman is right, to the extent that tax treatment is but one of a range of factors. I am not relying on my own opinion here, however. The Government Actuary must be preening himself—everyone seems to have been reading his report. Indeed, I can recommend it as a stonking good read. The Government Actuary has said that returns to pension funds, allowing for possible increases in dividends, will be lower because of the Government's tax changes. Presumably the Government Actuary has no political axe to grind; otherwise, he would not recommend changed rebates for personal pensions. Independent comment states that the changes will damage pensioners' incomes. That is why we have opposed them.

I accept that the Government will not reverse that policy now, but I want to raise with the Pensions Minister one group that will suffer through the change, and for which many of the arguments advanced by Labour Members do not stand up as a defence. I refer to members of closed pension schemes—people whose employers have gone out of business and for whom there is a pot of money in the pension fund. Where there is no sponsoring employer, if the tax credit is cut, the income from the fund goes down and there is no employer to make up the difference.

There is a danger that people such as my constituents in the DRG pension scheme will lose income. They will say, "A Labour Government cut my pension." I am sure that the Pensions Minister would not want them to say that. I ask him to look again at the position of people in closed pension schemes.

One fundamental point underlies the debate about pensioner incomes. The Government have taken a number of small but welcome measures to help pensioners with their fuel bills. They are also rumoured to be examining the cost of television licences and of public transport for pensioners. Those proposals would no doubt be well received by many pensioners.

Most of all, however, pensioners need, and I believe deserve, security and a decent income that they decide how to spend. Ultimately, what matters is not gimmicks or short-term sticking plaster. If pensioners cannot afford their fuel bills, television licence or bus fares, it is because their basic income is too low. Until that issue is addressed, neither of the two larger parties can claim to have taken seriously the concerns of pensioners.

8.51 pm

Mr. Phil Hope (Corby): I join my hon. Friends in welcoming the debate. Having listened to the opening remarks of the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), may I say how strange it is to welcome to the Chamber yet another representative from the planet Zarg. That is where I assume he is from: given the remarks that he made, he cannot be living on this planet.

Pension reform is one of the greatest challenges facing the Labour Government. Ensuring decent incomes in retirement is a key aim in the Government's wider strategy for tackling social exclusion and reducing poverty. Regrettably, we start with a Conservative inheritance that has failed today's pensioners, and would have devastated tomorrow's pensioners too.

A quarter of today's pensioners do not have an adequate second pension. Almost 2 million depend on income support. The Tories did not lift a finger to ensure that the poorest pensioners received the benefits to which they are entitled. They abandoned a million pensioners, mainly women, to live on incomes well below the poverty line.

We know that 12 million people do not have access to a company pension. For people on low or modest incomes, private personal pensions can be poor value for money. In some cases, £1 in every £4 of savings is eaten up by fees and charges. We know, too, that the Tories wrongly encouraged people to opt out of their company pension into private personal pensions, and then failed to take tough action on the disgraceful pension mis-selling that they encouraged. I wonder when those people will get an apology from the Conservative party.

Kali Mountford: Would my hon. Friend be surprised to hear that a pensioner in my constituency of Colne

[Kali Mountford]

Valley, who lost £21,000 because of wrong advice, was compensated by only a few hundred pounds when his case was eventually settled?

Mr. Hope: I am not at all surprised to hear that example. There are thousands of other similar examples—a devastating legacy of the appalling treatment that the Opposition, when in power, meted out to pensioners.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) rose—

Mr. Hope: The Conservatives in government not only targeted their attacks on vulnerable pensioners: they used a shotgun approach. They tried to attack every pensioner by raising VAT on fuel to 17.5 per cent., which the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green supported and voted for, even though his own Conservative constituency association urged him not to do so.

Mrs. Gorman rose—

Mr. Hope: I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Letwin: I tried to intervene before the hon. Gentleman left the subject of the mis-selling of pensions, as I have a genuine interest in the matter. Does he think that it will be one year or two, three, four or five years before the Labour party stops hiding behind that accusation to excuse every failing of the Government?

Mr. Hope: What an intriguing intervention. We are invited to suggest how many years it will be before the Conservatives come up with an apology for the way that they treated pensioners. The Labour Government understand that there is a crying need for reform of the pension system.

Over the past 20 years, the incomes of retired people as a whole have risen faster than those of the working population, but that statistic hides the reality of the Tory legacy—inequality among pensioners has risen dramatically over the same period.

Pensioners are among the poorest people in Britain today. Inequality has widened between rich and poor pensioners, and between older and younger pensioners. Unless things change, that inequality is set to widen. On the basis of reasonable assumptions, it is estimated that, over the next 30 years, the incomes of the poorest one fifth of pensioners will rise by about 20 per cent., but the incomes of the richest one fifth will rise by 80 per cent.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford) reminded the House, the poorest pensioners tend to be older, and they tend to be single and women. A quarter of pensioners are entitled to income support, yet nearly 40 per cent. of them—1 million pensioners—do not receive the income support they should get. It is vital that we give immediate help to the poorest pensioners. Like my colleagues, I am delighted at the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that £15 million is to be spent on pilot schemes throughout the country to ensure that the poorest pensioners, the people who have suffered the most, will get the benefits to which they are genuinely entitled.

On the wider priorities, there are many ways that pensioners can share fairly in the increasing prosperity of the nation, not just through state pensions but through state income-related benefits, non-state pensions, savings and earnings, concessionary schemes and the tax system. For many pensioners, the national health service—long-term health and community care—can be as important to their quality of life as their income. We must make sure in government that we make the most efficient and equitable use of all those resources to ensure that all pensioners share in the nation's rising prosperity, but we must give priority to the needs of the poorest.

The Labour Government have done much in that regard already. The cut in VAT on fuel benefited all pensioners, as did the winter fuel payment of £20 to every pensioner household. We made sure that the poorest pensioners, those on income support, received more—£50 per household—because they are most in need.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine): On the issue of cold weather payments, does the hon. Gentleman not think it perverse that the Government are willing to give a blanket payment to pensioners across the country, regardless of weather conditions, but refuse point blank to do what they called for in opposition and pay pensioners when they experience the cold, by allowing the wind-chill factor to be taken into account in calculating payments?

Mr. Hope: My hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley has already pointed out that the complicated and difficult assessment procedures for cold weather payments meant that many pensioners switched off their heating because they were not sure whether they would qualify for the payments. Labour has demonstrated its commitment to pensioners by allocating £200 million this year and next year to winter fuel payments—that is more in one decisive action than the Tories managed over 18 shameful years of inactivity.

It is not just about reversing the Tory legacy and tackling inequality: the Labour Government must build a sustainable framework for pensions for the future. A huge amount is spent on pensions throughout the country. More than £74 billion was paid in 1996 to pensioners from all types of pension schemes, of which £33 billion was paid out by the state on the basic state retirement pension and SERPS. From those basic figures, it is clear that a sustainable framework will always comprise a partnership between public and private provision, and be a balance between income sourced from tax and that from invested savings.

Unlike the Conservatives, who would have abolished the basic state pension and struck fear into the hearts of pensioners and working people across the country before the election, the Labour Government must keep their manifesto commitment to retaining the basic state pension as the foundation of pension provision, increasing it at least in line with inflation. We must also retain SERPS as an option for those who wish to remain within that scheme.

We have much more to do. Many people in this country are not able to save for a second pension. The Tory pension mis-selling scandal, which we are making decisive moves to settle, has made many people nervous about relying on invested second pension schemes. Tory dogma and the Tories' failure to regulate the industry and the market properly caused that personal pension scandal. It need not have happened.

We must develop a new framework of flexible, value-for-money, second stakeholder pensions in order to help to meet the needs of those on low and modest incomes with changing patterns of employment who cannot join a good-value second pension scheme. We must ensure that those schemes are large enough to enjoy economies of scale, are approved to meet high minimum standards, are run in the interests of the members and not the companies, and are run in a way that allows members to understand readily what they are paying and what they might expect to receive when they retire.

We must also remember that a significant number of people cannot be expected to save for their own retirement. Many carers are unable to work, or suffer greatly reduced earnings because of their caring responsibilities. I believe that the Government should credit carers, and perhaps others, into a citizenship pension that will provide a second pension for those years when they are unable to work. That will help to avoid poverty and dependence on means-tested benefits as a consequence.

Most of the poorest pensioners are women. Low pay during their working lives means that women are often less able than men to build a second pension. They may also experience disadvantage in their pension incomes if they are divorced. Many women are also badly served by SERPS at present. Stakeholder pensions, citizenship pensions and pension sharing on divorce are a combination of measures that will cut the routes to pensioner poverty and significantly narrow pension inequality between men and women in future.

The Government must develop a pensions strategy that can cope with a slowly aging society without heaping unsustainable costs on to our children. A sustainable policy for pensions in the next millennium must tackle inequality among pensioners today and create a robust framework to ensure effective and equitable support for the pensioners of tomorrow.

9.2 pm

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak in this very important debate.

I have listened to the speeches of Government Members and I believe that a travesty of justice has been done to the previous Government's policies and our pension achievements. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Hope) would listen, he might understand my points.

The hon. Gentleman admitted that, during 18 years of Conservative government, incomes rose more quickly for pensioners than for the general population. We welcome that fact: it is testimony to our successful pensions record. We recognise—as do the Government, for which we are grateful—that more must be done to ensure that everyone receives a pension. However, we wish to take some credit for what has occurred to create a secure future for many of our pensioner constituents who have fared extremely well.

During the 1980s, the Conservative Government recognised—

Mr. Coaker: Although it may be true that some pensioners have shared in the country's increasing prosperity, the reality is that the vast majority of pensioners are poor, and that a significant number are absolutely destitute. Is that not a damning indictment of the policies pursued by the previous Government?

Miss Kirkbride: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman will have to say what his Government will do—to answer the mock indignation coming from hon. Members on the Government Benches—before we on the Opposition Benches will take any lessons about what we should have done while we were in power.

The Government have failed to say that they will do anything significant to raise the basic state pension or add significantly to the benefits that are available to people on income support, or to increase income for the poorest pensioners. I have yet to hear anything from hon. Members on the Government Benches that would suggest that that is being contemplated, and until they do, there is no point in their continuing their mock indignation.

Mr. Letwin: My hon. Friend is making an important point. Does she agree that, importantly, we heard an admission this evening from the Secretary of State that the guaranteed income of £100, which was widely trailed in the newspapers, has disappeared without trace and been replaced by a £15 million pilot project to add to the pile of 150 reviews?

Miss Kirkbride: I could not agree more. It was the death knell for the minimum pension scheme. The Chancellor clearly won in the departmental spending wrangles, which we all know take place behind closed doors.

I want to return to the 1980s and my former Government's record on pensions.

Mr. Gibb: Wouldn't we all?

Miss Kirkbride: Quite. They recognised that the state could not continue to pay pensions in the way it had, as that was unsustainable, and it was necessary to encourage people to save more to sustain them in their old age. The House will be shocked to hear it, but even we on the Conservative Benches want pensioners to have a secure old age, one that they can enjoy in comfort, without fear for their financial future.

Recognising that we had to do more, we introduced private pensions and encouraged people to opt out of SERPS, so that they would no longer be an unsustainable liability on the state in future years. What did the present Government tell the population when they were in opposition? They said, "Don't trust this. You mustn't do this. These wicked private pension schemes will not pay out when you retire." They pretended that what the Conservative Government were trying to do was wicked and unsustainable.

Thank goodness the British population had the good sense not to believe the Labour party at the time, and pursued their private and occupational pension schemes with the SERPS opt-out, and they have been much better off as a result.

Kali Mountford: Would the hon. Lady like to join the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) and apologise for the pensions mis-selling fiasco and the real damage it did to confidence in pensions?

Miss Kirkbride: Again, it is a travesty of justice for the Government to pretend that we were responsible for pensions mis-selling. We regret it enormously, and welcome what the Government are doing to put the matter right.

The situation came to light in the mid-1990s, and we welcome what is being done to restore the contributions that people accrued. There is no question but that we deplore and condemn pensions mis-selling. We expect the pensions companies to put it right. For the Government continually to suggest that we encouraged it and wanted it to happen, and that we welcome it and do not regret it, is quite preposterous.

The Government also ignore the fact that what happened to the private pensions industry—if I may call it that—during the 1980s and 1990s has been a signal success for the British economy and the British people. Both those factors are important, as in future years there will be a crisis. At present, 3.4 people in the working population sustain one pensioner. In 40 years' time, 2.6 people will sustain a pensioner in his or her old age. We had to address those points. What we did on private pensions has been a massive bonus for the British economy and British pensioners. Those who have an occupational and private pension scheme can look forward to a secure old age.

Figures provided by the Library show what a magnificent success the private pensions industry has been. In 1995—one expects that the figure has gone up considerably since then—£750 billion, roughly equivalent to the nation's gross domestic product, was invested in private pensions. In 1991, when the United Kingdom's pension fund assets were around 73 per cent. of GDP, they were 66 per cent. in the United States and 10 per cent. in Japan, Germany and France.

When I am 90 years old, in 2050, when I shall still be taking a keen interest in the performance of the economy and the Government's tax rate, I am pleased to discover that the British economy's balance sheet will be even healthier. It will so exceed any other balance sheet in the western world that Conservative Members can truly take magnificent pride in what has happened.

In 2050, unfunded state pension liabilities in Britain will amount to just 15 per cent. of GDP—that amount of money which taxpayers will have to contribute in order to pay pensioners who have a legitimate expectation that the money they have salted away when they were working will be there when they retire. The sad fact is that many EU countries, instead of that money being invested privately and securely tucked up in some private bank account from which it can be released when needed, will be looking to their taxpayers, or will have to borrow the money to pay those liabilities.

The Japanese will find that their unfunded liabilities amount to 399 per cent. of their GDP; the Germans, 431 per cent.; the French, 370 per cent.—[Interruption]—the Italians, 338 per cent.; the Canadians 189 per cent.; and, as hon. Members making sedentary interventions may have forgotten, the British, only 15 per cent. That is a massive success story, which will transform the future British economy, and Conservative Members perceive it as a considerable obstacle to joining a single currency as and when that decision comes along.

Having put straight the Conservative Government's record—

Mr. Webb: The hon. Lady says how wonderful it is that all those future liabilities will have been reduced, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) has said, anyone can do that if they scrap the basic state pension, which is essentially what, in Michael Portillo's words, the Conservatives are planning to do. Is there anything particularly impressive about reducing future state liabilities by abolishing the benefit?

Miss Kirkbride: I think that the hon. Gentleman is a professor, and I cannot believe that he has made such a facile intervention when he knows that I am talking about private pension fund contributions which have transformed the balance sheet. That is reflected in the unfunded liabilities and the percentage share we then have.

During their 18 years in power, the Conservative Government did not abolish the state pension, and there is no question that Conservatives will do so in five years' time, when they are back in government. That is a preposterous suggestion. It is one which Liberal Democrat and Labour Members like to perpetrate, and it is nonsense. We have not done it, and will not do it. I shall not continue having a conversation with the hon. Gentleman when I am meant to be addressing the House.

I return to the Government's pension policy because they are in power, albeit that they often forget that when they ask Conservative Members for our views on the subject. The Government have severely let down many pensioners on the upper end of the pension earnings, who are nevertheless vulnerable in their incomes and feel insecure about how they will meet their liabilities in their old age. They are equally deserving of consideration.

Mr. Coaker: Does the hon. Lady agree that, in terms of insecurity and income in old age, the Government's decision to set up a royal commission to look into the cost of nursing home care for the elderly is of great significance to people in their old age, now and in the future? One of the most damaging feelings of insecurity experienced by people is how they will be able to afford to look after themselves and their relatives. That is a fundamental problem that the royal commission will address.

Miss Kirkbride: I recognise the issue that the hon. Gentleman has raised. It is equally important to my constituents. Although I welcome the quick recommendations of the commission, my constituents and those of the hon. Gentleman can take no comfort from the fact that, after 18 years in opposition, the Labour party could not come into office with proposals ready to do something about the problem, but has postponed any decisions until it hears the recommendations of the royal commission.

I do not wish to repeat what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) about how iniquitous the changes to ACT have been in reducing income available to future pensioners as well as existing pensioners. They may find that, as a result of the changes, they will receive a smaller increase in their pensions every year because their pension fund will no longer be as well off as it would have been had the ACT changes not taken place.

The figures are clear. The amount of tax raised is £5 billion, which is equivalent to about 2.5p on income tax. Had the Government been more honest and put that increase in revenue on to income tax bills, I would have had more respect for them. Instead, they have tried to introduce a sneaky, sleight-of-hand tax which they hope people will not notice.

In the interest of open government, of which Labour Members are so fond, I call upon the pensions industry to clarify what the loss in income has been as a result of the changes made to ACT. I am sure that it would come as a shock to many of my constituents to learn that the money they think they have been saving for their old age has now been reduced considerably as a result of that sleight of hand.

We have still had no clarification from the Government about whether they propose to means-test the state pension. That is now the real issue. As my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green pointed out, the manifesto commitment in 1997 does not rule out the fact that affluent pensioners might be facing the demise of their old-age pension, to which they are entitled as a result of their national insurance contributions. I would welcome the Government making clear their policies on that.

The Government's proposals for the stakeholder pension raise the biggest question that the Government will have to face as and when they introduce their proposals on the Floor of the House. As we have pointed out, many people do not have a second-tier pension because they are on low incomes. They might find it difficult to save for a pension, because they do not earn a great deal and because the day they reach 65 seems a long way off.

If the Government are to succeed in increasing the number of people who have a second-tier, funded pension, they will have to decide whether to make contributions to that stakeholder pension compulsory.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): The hon. Lady is making a good case for some sort of minimum wage. That would raise incomes sufficiently for people to be able to pay into a pension scheme.

Miss Kirkbride: We will have to see the level at which the minimum wage is introduced when the Government announce their plans. If it is introduced at £3.60—as has been widely speculated—it will not be enough in terms of weekly earnings to take the average man with two children, who is trying to keep a roof over his family's heads, above the level of family credit. Therefore, the state will still contribute to his earnings.

The preposterous nonsense that the Government are trying to perpetrate—that somehow the minimum wage will take people off state subsidy—is not true, unless the wage is set at such a level that it destroys jobs wholesale. I would be grateful if the Minister would speculate on the introduction of the stakeholder pension, and whether the lower-paid will have to make compulsory contributions to that pension.

9.21 pm

Mr. Desmond Browne (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): The hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) eulogised the private pensions industry. I do not want to be mean-spirited about the impressive statistics, but she did not give us the comparison of the public state pension as a percentage of GDP. While we may be at the top of any league table in terms of private pensions, we were near the bottom—in fact, we were second from bottom—of the EU league table in 1995 in terms of the state pension as a percentage of GDP.

Mr. Letwin: I am exceptionally grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way at such an early stage, but he has made an important point. Is that not exactly the position that his Government's policies will institutionalise for the future?

Mr. Browne: In my view, it is not.

As a result of those figures, we have heard from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, others of my hon. Friends and the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) examples of the growing problems of pensioner need—especially for the poorest pensioners—which were created by the previous Government's changes to the British state pension system. It is nothing short of breathtaking hypocrisy for the Conservative party, which had a deplorable record on pensions, to criticise this Government, who inherited that record of Tory failure.

It was interesting that, writing in The Times on 5 August, the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) said:

> "Countries across Europe have failed to encourage independence, private provision and reform of the state pension system. The Conservative Government achieved all three of these aims and bequeathed Labour a sound basis on which to build."

One can imagine my surprise, having read that, that a defence of that record was conspicuous by its absence from the hon. Gentleman's speech.

The view of the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green is not shared by the vast majority of pensioners in my constituency, where approximately 20 per cent. of the population are pensioners. Some are the poorest pensioners in the United Kingdom, and all need reassurance that they will have adequate income levels in their retirement. They certainly never received any such assurances from Conservative Members. Instead, the previous Government left a legacy of a Britain where 1.7 million pensioners are so poor that they have to depend on income support and, as we have heard, a further 1 million do not claim the income support to which they are entitled.

I am repeating the statistics, but they bear repetition. In addition, pensioner inequality is growing. The top 10 per cent. have seen their incomes growing steadily due to their share in the private pension industry boom, but the bottom 10 per cent. have become progressively poorer. In my constituency, prospects are no better for the pensioners of the future. Of those who are lucky enough to have work, the majority do not have access to a company pension scheme.

Social justice, the inadequate level of state pension and the predicted demographic changes—whether they turn out to be a demographic time bomb or not—which will see the ratio of people of working age to pensioners falling in the first half of the next century, demand that finding a way to deliver a decent income is a priority for the Government. It shall be found.

[Mr. Browne]

The Tories took steps to ensure that the aging of the population posed no great threat to public finances, but they failed to address the fundamental challenges of pension reform until their Government's dying days, and they did so for electoral purposes. Until then, they had turned their back on Britain's pensioners.

Mr. Hope: Not only did the Tories not take into account the needs of the poorest pensioners before the general election; they have continued to fail to do so since then. The motion before us is entitled "Effects of the Government' Policies on Pensioners' Incomes". Is my hon. Friend surprised to see that it does not mention pensioners living on income support or anyone who was mis-sold a pension by the previous Administration?

Mr. Browne: My hon. Friend makes a good point. Any mention of poor pensioners has been conspicuous by its absence from Conservative Members' speeches.

I was discussing electoral pension reform. True to their Thatcherite roots, in March 1997, the Conservatives responded to a call by Professor Patrick Minford and unveiled their plans to privatise the state pension. Had they had their way, the end of the previous Parliament would have seen the scrapping of the basic state pension and SERPS and their replacement by a private pension scheme, which, even in the most optimistic view, would have guaranteed a pension worth only £175 a week in 2040.

Mr. Letwin: At today's prices.

Mr. Browne: Assuming a real earnings growth of 1.5 per cent. a year, the new pension would have represented 23 per cent. of pay compared with 36 per cent., which men on average earnings were receiving in 1997. In calculating that optimistic sum, the Conservatives paid no regard to inflation or the cost of looking after the funds and, most culpably, they ignored completely the financial services industry's failure over the preceding decade.

Mr. Letwin: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Browne: No, I do not have time.

During that time, instead of making rigorous efforts to investigate the mishandling of 1.5 million pensions by the private sector, the Conservatives planned to hand over the management of any replacement of the state pension and SERPS to those same companies. So enamoured were they with the dogma of privatisation that they were prepared to hand over £320 billion of taxpayers' money to an industry whose credibility had reached rock bottom, as it had consistently failed to right the wrongs of the pensions mis-selling scandal. In many ways, it was hardly surprising that they should wish to do that, as they had ignored financial experts' warnings when they passed the Social Security Act in 1986 and happily endorsed the mass marketing of private pensions.

The Act was calculated to entice millions of people to switch from perfectly good pension arrangements for the promise of greater future security in the private sector. Between 1988 and 1994, insurance companies, independent financial advisers, banks and building societies sold more than 5 million private pensions. For the financial companies, it was a bonanza. For some of their customers it worked, but for a significant minority it did not. For them, pension advice was negligent and sometimes downright dishonest. As a result of the absence of effective regulation, hundreds of thousands of people were cheated by both cowboy companies and well-known firms. Each case was a personal tragedy and, instead of facing security in their retirement, hundreds of thousands faced uncertainty and poverty.

Bad as that was, it was made worse by the length of time those people had to wait for compensation. Had Labour not won the election in May 1997, many of them would still be waiting. The previous Government's history of cleaning up the mess that they created is a disgrace, to say the least. In 1994, the Securities and Investments Board went to the length of requiring firms to review the most urgent cases, but deadlines for those reviews just came and went and the Tory Government did nothing.

From 1994 to 1997, the Tory Government failed to tackle that problem effectively, but within 14 days in government my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury had met 24 firms responsible for three quarters of the cases and she left them in no uncertainty that she was determined to take firm action. The Tories did not get that far in three years.

To be fair to the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green, he has written that the Government were "right to demand that the mis-selling of pensions is fully resolved and reparations made."

However, he did not do that until August 1997, and he now wishes to portray himself as the champion of the pensioner. Where were those demands for remedial action between 1992 and 1997? Unlike the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), he does not even now, in 1998, have the courage to make a simple apology for that omission.

Results have been achieved because this Government have refused to let the issue rest on the back burner. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury has focused public concern and media attention on the firms responsible. The Tories' previous level of inaction did nothing to help pensioners and the victims of the scandal; it served only to highlight their own lack of concern for some of the most vulnerable groups in our society.

The Labour Government have quickly ended the misery of many hundreds of thousands of people who were in fear of their financial security in retirement. The Labour Government will also improve the lot of many millions of pensioners by making a winter fuel payment to them, as well as cutting VAT on gas and electricity. Those steps, along with the others that we have taken to help ensure that all pensioners who are entitled to income support receive it, make the Labour Government's record of achievement one of which I am already very proud.

9.30 pm

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): This has been a good debate; in particular, it has been an important debate. I do not think that I can recall in my time in the House of Commons—it must be true for much further back—a Government going in for such systematic evasion of basic questions and such shameless financial chicanery. Never before in my time have an Opposition had such an important task to perform in exposing the reality behind what the Government have been doing.

This has been a good debate. It was opened by my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), who asked all the pertinent questions and did not receive a single response. He was followed by attempts by my hon. Friends on the Back Benches, in interventions and excellent speeches, to prise out of the Government a few answers. They also failed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) made a speech with feeling, which was also extremely well informed. Having studied pension systems in many parts of the world, he made a particularly original contribution to the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) gave the House an extremely lucid defence of the previous Government's record and pointed out, not least, that the average earnings of pensioners increased faster than national income over the period of the Conservative Government. That is ultimately what counts. She also addressed the issue of the Government's behaviour since the Budget last July, which was fatal for pensioners, and asked a raft of questions. She did not receive a single answer. I hope that she may receive an answer from the Under-Secretary when he winds up.

There is nothing wrong with the Government's rhetoric. Indeed, there is unlikely to be anything wrong with their rhetoric as they stole most of it from the Conservative party. What is wrong and damaging—in this case damaging to the interests of pensioners—is the reality. The Government should be profoundly ashamed that, after only nine or 10 months in office, there should be such a wide gulf between rhetoric and reality.

Whole sections of our country were systematically deceived by the Labour party at the election. Single parents were entitled to believe the assurances that their special benefit regimes would be protected by a Labour Government. Students were entitled to believe the explicit promises that they received, even from the Prime Minister in April, in the middle of the election campaign—on the record—that a Labour Government would not introduce tuition fees. Savers were entitled to believe the promises that PEPs and TESSAs would be safe, but they have retrospectively found that they are not.

Mr. Hope: Will the hon. Gentleman now apologise on behalf of the Conservative party for the scandalous and appalling mis-selling of pensions, and for the fact that the Conservative party has failed to do anything about the million pensioners who continue to live on income support and below the United Kingdom poverty level?

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman makes my point for me. Everything that has been said in this debate not only by Ministers but by Labour Back Benchers relates to the past. They want to keep the electorate's attention away from the present and the future—away from the fatal impact of the Government's actions, in nine or 10 brief months, on pensions.

Pensioners comprise the largest group in our society who were systematically deceived at the general election. What were they told by the Labour party before the general election? Before voting in a general election, on whose words is one supposed to rely about the future pensions regime if not on those of a party's proposed Chancellor of the Exchequer? On 19 April 1997—on almost the eve of the election—the Chancellor said:

"All Labour's proposals will protect and improve the quality of life of pensioners".

That quotation bears repetition. He said:

"All Labour's proposals will protect and improve the quality of life of pensioners".

Pensioners therefore went to the voting booth believing that they would be protected. Only two months later, an unprecedented tax was introduced that, from 1999, will take £5 billion a year from the income of pension funds.

How can one possibly expect the British public to believe that pensioners will not be worse off if someone, each and every year, malversates £5 billion from their pension funds? It is an extraordinary state of affairs for a Government to have so little respect for the public's intelligence. Although the public fell for it during the general election, they will not fall for it if the Labour party does it again.

Every one of the Government's actions on pensions has undermined pensioners' standard of living and prospects for a secure retirement.

Mr. Coaker: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I cannot give way because of lack of time, but I may give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment.

Criminologists sometimes do studies and write learned articles on a strange phenomenon that they encounter in their work. It is the phenomenon of someone who has conducted such an appalling crime that he or she cannot quite face the fact that it has been committed. I believe that—in the trade—it is called a criminal who is "in denial". If the Labour party is not blatantly telling lies, it must be in denial.

After last year's Budget, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury said:

"The measure is good for pensions and pensioners, not bad for them . . . People should understand that our reforms will benefit pension funds.—[Official Report, 3 July 1997; Vol. 297, c. 507.]

If taking £5 billion out of pension funds benefits pension funds, what does one have to do to damage pension funds? No one other than Ministers, and perhaps a few of their more sycophantic Back-Bench supporters, could even begin to believe such nonsense.

The Government Actuary does not believe such nonsense, because he has just produced a large report mathematically proving that pension funds will have to receive higher funding levels to compensate for the abolition of the dividend tax credit. Independent financial advisers also do not believe that nonsense. On the contrary, they formed up to the Secretary of State and to the Treasury and threatened that unless something was done to protect the value of personal pensions, they would advise their clients to move back into SERPS.

Pension fund trustees—managers of British companies that have occupational schemes—do not believe that nonsense. The National Association of Pension Funds has carried out a survey of them, according to which almost 90 per cent. of employers claim that the abolition of dividend tax credit "will absorb increased costs, but many of them are planning to share the burden with their employees . . . One in seven employers also report that they are planning to reduce pension benefits".

[Mr. Davies]

So much for the Financial Secretary's words:

"The measure is good for pensions and pensioners, not bad for them . . . People should understand that our reforms will benefit pension funds."—[Official Report, 3 July 1997; Vol. 297, c. 507.]

Having been rumbled, the Labour party is seeking to retreat surreptitiously—piecemeal—hoping that no one will notice quite what is going on.

Let me ask the Under-Secretary—who has the difficult task of defending the Government this evening—six questions. I see that he is getting out his pen. The whole country will looking forward to the answers to my questions, and the whole country will know that, if there are no answers, the Government are continuing to avoid the facts. [Interruption.]

First, what is the cost of the additional rebates that the Government have decided to provide? Secondly, what would have been the cost if all the contracted-out pension schemes had been compensated at the rate accorded to appropriate personal pensions? Thirdly, what survey has been undertaken of the cost to local government pension funds over the remaining term of this Parliament—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman. May I say to the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Hope) that I think he has used up his ration of sedentary comments?

Mr. Davies: Thirdly—as I was saying—what study has been done of the cost to local government pension funds of the abolition of dividend tax credit over the remaining four years of the current Parliament? Would the Minister care to quantify that? If no such study has been done, the Minister and his Government are in dereliction of their duty.

Fourthly, what is the logic or fairness of not compensating the occupational schemes—the contracted-out salary-related schemes—on the same basis as the appropriate personal pensions? The loss to both sets of funds is exactly the same. Will the Minister give the same answer as the Financial Secretary gave in the earlier debate—that employers can pay, and make up the difference? Is he going to say that the Government are acknowledging the existence of a surreptitious additional tax on employers?

Fifthly, what is the logic of not compensating the contracted-out money purchase schemes? What would be the cost of compensating them according to appendix D rather than appendix E of the Government Actuary's paper? Finally and most important of all, there is the question that the Government have systematically avoided at every Social Security Question Time this year. Will they state clearly whether or not they intend to means-test the basic old-age pension?

Those questions are not at all esoteric or technical, however much the Government try to hide behind complicated mathematics. They are questions of genuine, immediate and often searing importance to older people or those approaching retirement age who do not know whether, in their retirement, they will be able to continue to afford their houses, gardens, cars and way of life.

We have not had a worse example of cynicism in the last nine or 10 months, from a profoundly cynical Government, than what has happened to pensions. If the Minister thinks that a single one of my strictures is unfair, he has the opportunity to put the record straight and provide us for the first time with some answers.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. John Denham): I welcome the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) to the Front Bench tonight. He gave the speech because, as the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) explained, the latter did not know much about the subject.

Let me start with the six completely unanswerable questions. The first has already been dealt with in a parliamentary answer. The second could, I am sure, be answered in response to an appropriately worded parliamentary question. The valuation of local authority pension funds will take place in March this year. The remaining three unanswerable questions I shall answer in the course of my speech. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford for posing such challenging questions.

It has become clear beyond doubt in the debate, as the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) said, why pensions reform is necessary and right. It is also clear why it is this Government who have the determination and vision to bring about the changes.

The Opposition have been generous to the House with their time tonight. We have heard time and again how the previous Government failed Britain's pensioners. Throughout the debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford), the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) and others have reminded the House of the previous Government's actions, describing how pension rights were reduced throughout their period of office and nothing was done to ensure that pensioners would share fairly in rising national prosperity.

Despite the views of the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride), it has been made clear how personal pensions were launched in an atmosphere of hype, fuelled by the then Government and exploited by poorly managed companies, so that more than 1 million people fell victim to mis-selling. I am afraid that my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Hope) failed on several occasions to extract an apology for that mis-selling from that Government's representatives.

I do not intend to argue that no changes were needed to the pensions system in the past 20 years, and I would certainly argue that radical improvements are needed to modernise the system and ensure that it can develop and evolve to meet society's needs in the new world of work in the next century. Change is needed, but the party that called this debate stands condemned by its own record: it made changes, but they made things worse.

The symptoms of failure are clear. There is widening inequality among pensioners. One in four are reliant on income support or are entitled to it and not getting it. The previous Government were totally uninterested in those pensioners' plight. They turned a deaf ear to the problems that pensioners faced with their winter heating bills. Millions of people in work today are unable to build up pension rights sufficient to bring them security in retirement.

Perhaps 1 million people were encouraged by the previous Government not to join their employer's occupational scheme, which would have given them the best chance of a secure retirement. Provisional figures show that membership by men of occupational pension schemes fell by more than 2 million while the previous Government were in office: that is 2 million more men no longer benefiting from what is usually the best pension scheme around.

Millions of people today cannot join an employer's scheme, and while personal pensions have been, and are, fine for some, many people who are in and out of work, the majority of them women, cannot maintain payments and find that the fees and charges can eat up a quarter or more—sometimes far more—of their savings by the time that they retire.

Mr. Gibb: Will the Minister confirm that, in view of the Secretary of State's announcement this evening of yet another pilot scheme, the mooted pensioners' guaranteed income scheme has been dropped?

Mr. Denham: We are committed to honouring our manifesto promise to try to find ways of getting more automatic help to the poorest pensioners, and the pilot schemes that we have launched today and the other research that we are conducting will give us the information that we need to design the best system to achieve that aim. The previous Government did not take such action in 18 years.

I have set out the legacy that the Government's pensions review will have to address, but return to the Opposition's claim that measures taken in last July's Budget, and measures which have followed in part the Budget changes, will damage pension provision. But all hon. Members know that any pension system depends on creating the wealth that will be needed to pay retirement pensions. Boom and bust economics, short-term fixes that throw people out of work and prevent them from saving, and uncertainty, which stops companies investing, all existed under the previous Government, and undermine the economy, investment, British companies and the ability to create the wealth on which our pension incomes depend.

Last July's Budget, which took place after the Chancellor gave the Bank of England greater power and independence, was intended to create conditions for steady, sustainable economic growth. We set out to put the economy on a solid foundation by scrapping measures that distorted investment decisions, by cutting corporation tax and, above all, by putting the country's finances on a sound footing. A Budget that is good for the economy is good for pensions.

There have been significant changes in the pattern of pension provision in recent years, which we needed to address. [Interruption.] I am happy to repeat that I believe that a Budget that is good for the economy is good for pensions. If Conservative Members do not believe that, I wonder what they believe is a good Budget.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I am listening carefully to the Minister, but does he accept that the Government Actuary's report makes it clear that the Government Actuary believes that income from investment fell by 0.25 per cent. directly as a result of the Budget?

Mr. Denham: I shall deal with the Government Actuary's report and our response to it. There have been significant changes in the pattern of pension provision in recent years. Some pension schemes have changed from salary-related schemes to money-purchase schemes. Other pension schemes have changed from employer's occupational schemes to group personal pensions. Those important trends were not caused by the Government, but were well established; indeed, the actions of the previous Government encouraged them.

We asked the Government Actuary to examine those trends, and issues arising from the Budget. The Budget was for the long term, pensions are a long-term business, and rebates are normally set for five years: in our judgment, no early action was needed at this stage in the quinquennium on salary-related schemes which are investing for the long term. However, some personal pensions providers might have advised members of personal pensions schemes to opt back into SERPS, which might not have been in their long-term interest. So, we have increased national insurance rebates to personal pensions to maintain the attractiveness of opting out.

We have acted to prevent the extra subsidy intended for small contracted-out money purchase schemes being enjoyed by larger schemes which have no need for it.

Mr. Gibb: Why have the Government decided to reduce rebates only for COMP schemes on the basis of an assumed rate of return of 2.25 per cent. when the Actuary has said that the rate of return for pension schemes is 2 per cent.?

Mr. Denham: The action taken on COMP schemes was foreshadowed by Lord MacKay of Ardbrecknish, Pensions Minister in the previous Administration, who said of the trend of moving from salary-related schemes to COMP schemes:

> "It appears that there are some schemes seeking to take advantage of these new flexibilities in order to maximise the national insurance rebate. There is obviously a great deal of money involved here, and the Government would be very concerned if this were to happen."

Lord MacKay made it clear that the previous Government would keep the effects of the contracting out changes under review, and the Government Actuary makes it clear in his report that if the trend for large schemes to change into COMP schemes continued, that would take funds from the national insurance fund. This Government have rightly acted to prevent that.

Mr. Duncan Smith: The Minister has just come up with a statement in answer to a straightforward question from my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb). My hon. Friend asked why the Government took a different settlement. The Government have missed the point. They did not allow for the fall-off in investment in COMPS. It has nothing to do with the fact that there may be some changes relating to those companies coming into COMPS and everything to do with the fact that the Government were trying to save money on the national insurance fund. That is the fact—savings to the Exchequer.

Mr. Denham: I made it perfectly clear: for occupational schemes there was no need to take action, whereas for personal pensions there was that need and we took the appropriate action. We recognise that, over the past 20 years—the past 10 in particular—

Mr. Quentin Davies: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Denham: No, I have given way generously. If the hon. Gentleman does not like the fact that we took the action to protect the national insurance fund that his predecessors said they would take when in government, that is his difficulty.

We recognise that the rebate structure that has evolved over the past 20 years has created inequalities. It does not necessarily match the needs of the different types of contracted-out pension provision now available. Although we have made the necessary short-term changes, we shall review the whole rebate structure in the light of the pensions review and the introduction of stakeholder pensions to ensure that it underpins the Government's new pensions policy.

The Government keep their promises and we have kept our promises to pensioners—both today's pensioners and those who will retire in future. We promised to maintain the basic state pension as the foundation for retirement and to uprate it at least in line with prices. We have kept that promise and we shall honour the manifesto on which we were elected. We have done more: we shall spend £200 million this year and next giving all pensioners help with their heating bills. We are doing more: we have cut VAT on fuel—

Mr. Burns: Prices or earnings?

Mr. Denham: If the hon. Gentleman, who is the Opposition spokesman on the subject, cannot be bothered to reply to the debate, he can at least do without making interventions from a sedentary position.

We are doing more: we have cut VAT on fuel after the Conservative party tried to raise it to 17.5 per cent. We are cutting other VAT, so that more pensioners' homes can be insulated. We are allowing local authorities to invest capital receipts to improve the homes of pensioners, among others.

We are doing more. For 18 years the Conservative party did nothing for those pensioners—mainly women, usually over 75, often living alone—who do not receive the income support to which they are entitled. Instead, the Conservatives blamed pensioners for their poverty. The Government have set out to find out why those pensioners do not claim and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has announced nine pilot schemes to find the best ways of identifying those pensioners and encouraging them to claim. We promised in our manifesto to find ways of giving more automatic help to the poorest pensioners and these early actions will help us to find the best way to do so.

The Government have taken action for today's pensioners already. In our pensions review, we are talking to and meeting today's pensioners and giving them a voice at the heart of government. While we tackle the problems faced by today's pensioners, we want to help the pensioners of the future too.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald): I thank the Minister for giving way. As we have only three minutes left, I did not want him to forget one very important question, which he promised to answer. Has his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State ruled out means-testing the state pension?

Mr. Denham: I have made it perfectly clear that we shall honour the manifesto on which we were elected. We shall increase and we have increased the basic state pension at least in line with prices. I am not surprised that Conservative Members scream and shout, because they did not do what my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury has done and set about tackling the problem of pension mis-selling. They did nothing about that problem for five years.

Undoing the damage done by the Conservatives is not enough. We do not want only some people to enjoy a good second pension; we want as many people as possible to do so. That is why we are looking at ways to support and strengthen the framework for occupational pensions. However, not everyone can join an occupational pension scheme, which is why we are consulting on our plans for low-cost, value-for-money, flexible stakeholder pensions. That is also why we want to make sure that those who cannot save for a second pension, such as carers, many of whom are women, can also enjoy security in retirement. We know the scale of the pensions challenge. We know that we must build consensus on a new pension framework that will last. That is why we are consulting so widely with pensioners, employers, trade unions and pension providers. It is a challenge that we must meet.

Tonight, it is the Conservative party that is condemned. For 18 years, it took away pension rights and gave people nothing in their place. It mis-sold personal pensions and did nothing to clear up the mess. For years, it fought against even pension fairness in divorce. It ignored pensioners living in poverty and blamed them for their lack of money. It put VAT on fuel and wanted to raise it to 17.5 per cent.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Clive Betts and
Mr. David Jamieson.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Government's commitment to maintain the basic state pension as the foundation of pension provision and to uprate it at least in line with prices; welcomes the tough action which is being taken to ensure that victims of pension mis-selling are compensated; welcomes the action the Government has already taken in giving a Winter Fuel Payment to all pensioners with fuel bills to pay and fulfilling its promise to Britain's pensioners by cutting VAT on fuel to five per cent.; welcomes the Government's progress in developing pensions policy which will benefit today's and tomorrow's pensioners; welcomes the widespread consultation the Government is undertaking and notes that the Government's Pension Review has received over 2,000 submissions from pension providers, employers, trade unions, pension experts and pensioners' organisations; notes the widespread support for the Government's proposals for Stakeholder Pensions; and deplores the previous administration's policies on pensions, their imposition of VAT on fuel and their attempt to increase VAT on fuel to 17.5 per cent.

It being after Ten o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Questions which he was directed to put at that hour, pursuant to Standing Order No. 55(1) (Questions on voting of estimates, &c.).

ESTIMATES, 1997–98 (NAVY) VOTE A

Resolved,

That during the year ending on 31st March 1998 an additional number not exceeding 975 all ranks be maintained for Service in the Reserve Naval Forces.

ESTIMATES, 1997–98 (ARMY) VOTE A

Resolved,

That during the year ending on 31st March 1998 an additional number not exceeding 460 all ranks be maintained for Army Service.

ESTIMATES, 1998–99 (NAVY) VOTE A

Resolved,

That during the year ending on 31st March 1999 a number not exceeding 49,965 all ranks be maintained for Naval Service, and a number not exceeding 17,755 for Service in the Reserve Naval and Marine Forces.

ESTIMATES, 1998–99 (ARMY) VOTE A

Resolved,

That during the year ending on 31st March 1999 a number not exceeding 132,060 all ranks be maintained for Army Service, a number not exceeding 97,800 for Service in the Reserve Land Forces, and a number not exceeding 6,000 for Service as Special Members of the Reserve Land Forces under Part V of the Reserve Forces Act 1996.

ESTIMATES, 1998–99 (AIR) VOTE A

Resolved,

That during the year ending on 31st March 1999 a number not exceeding 58,280 all ranks be maintained for Air Force Service, a number not exceeding 26,050 for Service in the Reserve Air Forces, and a number not exceeding 270 for Service as Special Members of the Reserve Air Forces under Part V of the Reserve Forces Act 1996.

ESTIMATES, EXCESSES 1996–97

Resolved,

That a sum not exceeding £195,333,507.98 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to make good excesses of certain grants for Defence Services for the year ended on 31st March 1997, as set out in House of Commons Paper No. 554.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1997–98

Resolved,

That a further supplementary sum not exceeding £2,442,361,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to complete or defray the charges for Defence and Civil Services for the year ending on 31st March 1998, as set out in House of Commons Paper No. 511.

Ordered,

That a Bill be brought in on the foregoing resolutions; And that the Chairman of Ways and Means, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Alistair Darling, Mr. Geoffrey Robinson, Mrs. Helen Liddell and Dawn Primarolo do prepare and bring it in.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 2) BILL

Dawn Primarolo accordingly presented a Bill to apply certain funds out of the Consolidated Fund to the service of the years ending on 31st March 1997 and 1998: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed [Bill 139].

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the Fossil Fuel Levy Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Jane Kennedy.]

Question agreed to.

Fossil Fuel Levy Bill [Lords]

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New clause 1

REGULATIONS AND ORDERS UNDER SECTION 33

'(1).—Section 106 of the Electricity Act 1989 (Regulations and orders) is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (2)(a) after "regulations" there is inserted "other than regulations under section 33 (10)".

(3) In subsection (2)(b) after "than" there is inserted "an order under section 33 (5B)".'.—[Mr. Redwood.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

10.15 pm

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 6, in clause 1, page 1, line 6, at end insert—

'(1A) After subsection (5) there is inserted—

"(5A) The aggregate of any amounts paid by way of levy under this section in any period of six months shall not exceed the average amount so paid in the previous two six month periods unless the Secretary of State by order so provides.

(5B) An order under subsection (5A) shall be by statutory instrument and shall be subject to approval by the Commons House of Parliament".'.

No. 3, in page 1, line 18, leave out from 'to' to end of line 21 and insert

'add further classes of electricity generation to the definition of "leviable electricity" contained in subsection (8) above.'

No. 2, in page 1, line 21, at end insert—

'(c) substitute for paragraph (a) of the definition of "leviable electricity" in subsection (8)—'is generated by a fossil fuel generating station other than a coal–fired generating station which the Secretary of State has certified is a coal–fired generating station using "clean–coal" technology'.

No. 4, in page 1, line 21, at end insert—

'(10) The levy imposed on a supplier of electricity generated in pursuance of qualifying arrangements under paragraph (c) of the definition of leviable electricity in subsection (8) above may not be greater than the aggregate payments received in respect of that electricity under this section.'.

No. 5, in page 1, line 21, at end insert—

'(10) Any extension of the levy by regulations made under subsection (9) above which results in the levy becoming chargeable in respect of electricity on which it was not previously chargeable shall not have effect until such regulations are approved by resolution of the Commons House of Parliament.'.

No. 8, in title, line 1, after '33', insert

'and in consequence section 106'.

Mr. Redwood: It is a pleasure to be back at the Dispatch Box after a brief interruption to Department of Trade and Industry business, which seems to dominate the House this week. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will wait a moment, and perhaps the interruption will be as brief as possible. Will right hon. and hon. Members please withdraw quickly and quietly?

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for getting the House to settle down. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), who has been particularly assiduous in studying this short but complex Bill and in helping with preparing the necessary amendments. I hope that he will catch your eye a little later, as I am sure that the House would benefit from his expertise in these matters.

I wonder whether Labour Members have access to a briefing document, rather like the one with which they were equipped for DTI questions. If only that had been issued to all Members of the House before DTI questions, we would not have needed the questions, because everything that Labour Members said during those questions had been written for them from Walworth road. I assume that they will operate tonight on a similar basis.

Whether Labour Members are briefed or not, it is our job to bring to the notice of the House this complex, muddled and difficult little Bill and to illuminate its fundamental aspects with a series of new clauses and amendments designed to probe, test and pin the Government down as they go about their nefarious ways.

The main purpose of our amendments will be to impose some control for the House of Commons—Labour Back Benchers as well as Opposition Members—over the tax-raising powers that the Bill represents; to put in a plea for the coal industry and for the renewable energy industry, which we do not think is properly protected by the provisions of the Bill; to give Labour Members an opportunity to voice their views on the necessary balance of energy policy between gas, coal and oil; and to use the Bill to help to fashion a policy that might produce a better energy mix than the one towards which Ministers are muddling by their actions, inactions and lack of concern for many of the important energy industries in this country.

This is a complex measure because of the way in which it is drafted, and the way in which the original legislation was drafted. I shall try to simplify it for the House. Once upon a time there was a fossil fuel levy. That was an extra charge on electricity generated from coal, oil and gas. The money from the levy was given to power generation from cleaner and greener means. It was given to renewables and to nuclear. It was a boost to a green strategy. On that basis, it was introduced and approved by the House—a limited but helpful measure for the greener and cleaner energies that Ministers then had in mind.

Then there was a Labour Government. After all the muddles which we have seen, it seems a long time ago that they were elected. They were elected both to generate more power from cleaner methods and to save the coal industry. So far, they have found that impossible to achieve, and we see them slipping and sliding into ever bigger difficulties with the Bill, as our amendments will expose tonight.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Is my right hon. Friend a little surprised to know that in Committee we had the greatest difficulty in getting any information from the Minister about what the Labour Government would do to the coal industry? The Electricity Act 1989, with the non-fossil fuel obligation, allows the Government to help the coal industry in any way they want, using the levy mechanism that was originally put in place to help the nuclear industry.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend has put his finger on a crucial point. I hope that it will be a matter for serious debate by hon. Members on both sides of the House. I know that there are good Labour Members who represent mining constituencies and who are deeply worried by the Government's approach to the coal industry. We have tabled an amendment that offers one partial solution to the problems of coal by offering opportunities to stimulate clean coal technology. We trust that debate on that subject will illuminate some important issues.

The Labour Government have not been able to make up their mind, so they have decided in the Bill to equalise the misery of the levy by proposing it for all, or most, electricity generation. The Bill is unclear because it gives an enabling power to impose the fossil fuel levy on—of all things—renewables. That is quite extraordinary. If the original measure had a single prime purpose, it was to impose a levy on fossil fuels to stimulate renewable energy. For that reason, it was very welcome to many elements of the green movement. Ministers are now taking the enabling power, which will mean that they could impose the levy on the very renewables that it was originally designed to help, as well as preserving the levy in part on the fossil fuels from which it originated.

The Labour Government clearly do not wish to call this new tax—which is what it would become—a fuel tax. However, that is what it is in effect. Under the legislation, the Government have decided to continue to call it the "fossil fuel levy", even though they intend it to apply to non-fossil fuels and perhaps to all fuels used in various types of power generation in this country.

At the same time as we have witnessed confusion, rows and disagreements in the DTI about whether to be more pro-coal, pro-gas, pro-renewable or pro-coal again, we have seen a rapacious Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his public capacity, acting entirely legally but undesirably in taking more money from business. We are worried that the open-ended powers of the Bill will give the Chancellor and his Government colleagues the opportunity to extend on that wider base an ever bigger fuel tax by the back door of the so-called fossil fuel levy.

Part of the purpose of our proposed new clause and amendments is to try to pin down the Government on the seriousness of their taxing ambitions and on whether some limits might be imposed—at least, the necessity to return to the House of Commons for affirmative resolution following debate before additional taxation can be imposed on the energy sector.

The Chancellor has found it relatively easy, in his own terms, to tax pensions, personal savings and businesses massively. He obviously views this as a rather modest measure to tax fuels more generally, and perhaps then will propose diverting some of the moneys from their original purposes to others that he already has in mind.

Our amendments Nos. 6, 4 and 5 are designed primarily to place some limit and parliamentary control on the tax-raising measures. I shall go into some detail on our new clause. New clause 1 is consequential on the drafting of amendment No. 4—it does not make sense unless one refers to that amendment, which inserts new subsection

(10) in the Bill. It tidies up the order-making powers in the original Electricity Act 1989, consequent on the suggested changes in amendment No. 4. I shall not detain the House further with technical explanations of new clause 1 unless Labour Members request that by way of intervention. I think that this will become clearer when they see the way in which amendment No. 4 is intended to operate.

New clause 6 is of considerable substance. It is one of our suggested mechanisms to impose a ceiling on the levy or tax-raising powers—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but for clarification's sake and for the benefit of the House, I think that he is referring to an amendment rather than a new clause.

Mr. Redwood: You are quite right, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I had misread the significance of the firm line under new clause 1; I mean amendment No. 6.

Amendment No. 6 is an attempt to impose a ceiling on the levy, and we propose to do that by ensuring that the aggregate of amounts paid by way of levy under section 33 of the 1989 Act in any period of six months does not exceed the average so paid in the previous two six-month periods. That should be relatively easy for the Government to accept, if we are to trust them when they say that they have no wish to increase the tax burden on the industry.

If the Government are not willing to accept this or a similar formula, our worries will indeed be confirmed that the intention of the Chancellor and his colleagues is to find an easy means of taxation by the back door, without the normal scrutiny of a Finance Bill, at the expense of the fuel industry and, ultimately, the fuel consumer, the person whom the Government often say that they are keen to help, but to whom their measures on company taxation do the opposite.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I do not know whether my right hon. Friend had a chance to read the Standing Committee debates. Did he notice that the Government's intention to have 10 per cent. renewable energy would put up the price of electricity by at least 15 per cent., which is roughly the percentage on which they won the election by telling pensioners that they would not allow the Conservative Government to increase VAT on electricity bills to 17.5 per cent.?

Mr. Redwood: Indeed. I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is ahead of me in the argument that I shall set out to the House. He is right to warn that the current energy policy could undo some of the good that had been established by competitive Conservative energy policies in lowering the price of energy delivered to customers. No small Budget measures by way of subsidy or compensation could offset measures of this magnitude if the Government did their worst through the blunders that they seem inclined to make on energy policy.

I notice that the Minister is not rising on any of this, so I assume that we are hitting home when we say that there are considerable dangers to customers as well as businesses in the policy that is unfolding in the Bill and elsewhere, and in the Executive actions and inactions of the ministerial team.

Amendment No. 3 offers the Minister greater flexibility in the proposed legislation. It shows how thoughtful we on the Opposition Benches are about the Minister's conduct. At times, we try to make his life easier, rather than more difficult, as well as to elucidate the mountainous problems that sit on his desk. This is a genuine attempt to assist him. The powers drafted by him or his advisers in the current text are rather clumsy. The amendment would allow the Minister to disaggregate. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) says that I often understate my case. He is quite right.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I was being ironic.

Mr. Redwood: I did not for one moment think that the hon. Gentleman was being anything other than ironic. I know that irony is the lowest form of wit and that he loves indulging in irony from his sedentary position below the Gangway, but as it was such a weak piece of irony, I thought that Hansard should have the advantage of it.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be grateful for the way in which I read it into the record for him. If only he would refer to his Order Paper and his amendment paper, he might learn something about a subject that should be dear to his heart. I am shortly coming to the coal industry, where I shall look to him for some support. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman is saying rather a lot from a sedentary position. I am grateful for that correction. I hope that he will give the House the advantage of his expertise shortly, because coal is of considerable importance to the people he represents, as well as to the constituents of other hon. Members.

Amendment No. 3 allows the Minister greater flexibility. It allows him to disaggregate the definitions of leviable electricity. It would, for example, allow him to make distinctions between different types of renewables, because we would urge him not to extend the tax to renewables. If he finds it irresistible to extend the tax to some renewables, amendment No. 3 will give him an opportunity to select from within the range and be kinder to those that are more speculative, that represent a bigger technical leap or that, by reasons of scale, are more difficult to see through to a successful conclusion.

10.30 pm

I hope that the Minister will speak about the way in which the Government will look after the renewable energy industry and how he intends to promote it in the light of the change against it in the projected levy under the Bill; if he is going ahead with the powers and intends to take disadvantage of them from the point of view of the renewable energy industry, I hope that he will tell us what other measures he is planning to take to offset that and foster that important series of industrial activities.

I come now to perhaps the most important and contentious of the amendments, amendment No. 2, concerning coal. We are offering the House the opportunity to exclude clean coal technology power generation from the definition of leviable electricity.

The Minister has from time to time said, as did his colleagues in the run-up to the election, that one of the ways in which it was hoped to square the circle of wanting greener policies, but also wanting a reasonably sized coal industry, was by promoting and helping clean coal technology. We have so far seen very little of substance from this ministerial team to put any weight behind their promise to the hard-pressed and deteriorating British coal industry. This gives the Minister an opportunity to do something more.

The Minister for Science, Energy and Industry (Mr. John Battle): Is the right hon. Gentleman suggesting that he wants an exemption for clean coal power stations? Will he confirm that, unfortunately, at the moment there is none because the previous Conservative Government shut down the possibility when they let the technology go from Grimethorpe?

Mr. Redwood: The Government have done nothing of substance so far to promote that technology. I am offering the Minister a way—

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Answer the question.

Mr. Redwood: I am about to answer the Minister. If the Whip will contain himself and return to his usual quiet charm, he may learn something.

I am offering the Minister a way of giving some incentive and promotion to the clean coal technology which he has said in the past is needed to provide a bigger coal industry than we are heading for under current ministerial policies.

I do not know whether the Minister is fully aware of the disaster currently hitting the coal industry as a result of the muddle and confusion created by the Government. Has he seen what has happened to coal output in recent months under the Government—a big reduction in coal output as a result of their policies? Has he seen what has been happening—

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): I marvel at the hypocritical and disingenuous way in which the amendment is being moved. A clear illustration of that is the fact that the right hon. Gentleman was part of the Cabinet in 1993 which threw out the recommendation of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry that £380 million a year for five years be taken from the fossil fuel levy to finance clean coal technology.

Mr. Redwood: There is no hypocrisy on my part. If the hon. Gentleman had done his homework, he would know that I was a keen advocate of the saving of the Tower colliery in Wales, for which I had some modest responsibility as Secretary of State for Wales. That was bought out by the miners and became a successful enterprise. I am pleased that they did that, and it is a great tribute to their achievements. I was keen that that remaining part of the deep-mine industry in Wales should survive. Partly because of my intervention, but more because of the efforts of the miners, it did survive, and I pay tribute to their work.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is a considerable difference between a direct subsidy to a technology and giving it relief from a tax to encourage private sector investment by giving it a relative advantage against other technologies?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. This is a modest tax incentive, but it is a step in the right direction. The Government have an opportunity to accept the amendment and to tell us what more they will do. The only conceivable fig leaf on their lack of policy is that they make something of clean coal technology and look forward to a future where coal can be sold in reasonable quantities without damaging the stringent environmental targets which they have set or are thinking of setting.

I shall return to my argument about the current grave position of the coal industry.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Redwood: I shall develop my argument a little and then I shall be grateful for my hon. Friend's wise advice.

The Minister was taken off the case and the Paymaster General was brought in by the Prime Minister to rescue the coal industry. The Prime Minister seemed to announce a deal that had saved the coal industry, at least in the short term. We then learned that nothing had been arranged and the Paymaster General was brought in to arrange something. We now believe that all that was arranged was a decision by leading generators to bring forward third-quarter purchases of coal into the second quarter of the current year. Let us assume that that happens. We have had a mild winter so far, and coal burn must have been reduced as a result. That means that, by the time we enter the third quarter, the burn will be down, the stock position will be up—all things being equal—and the crisis in the coal industry will be that much bigger.

The Minister should recognise that the issue is not just how much coal generators buy in any limited number of weeks, but how much coal they buy and burn and how much coal they wish to buy and burn on a continuing basis over the years ahead. I believe that the Paymaster General's intervention will turn out to have been unwelcome for the Government. It will have built up modest expectations that will be disappointed and it will have exacerbated the problem of adjustment when we get to the end of the second quarter. Also, it leaves the basic conundrum completely unsolved: do the Government wish to make people burn more coal, is it possible to burn more coal and keep to the environmental targets which they have set or are inclined to set and are they in a position to deliver on their promises to the greens and the coal industry?

Mr. Bruce: I wonder whether my right hon. Friend is missing one of the points made ably by the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham), which is that clean coal technology was at an advanced stage and nobody wanted to buy it. The previous Government decided not to put money into that. The opportunity for it to be used is available to the Government now and we have not been able to get any commitment from the Minister during the Bill's passage that he will put his money where his mouth is.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is right. Ministers have been reluctant to produce a package of measures which would promote one of their chosen solutions to the problem of their making—clean coal technology.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): I do not know whether my right hon. Friend is aware of the fact that I had the former Coal Research Establishment in my constituency, just outside Cheltenham.

Mr. Battle: Who shut it down?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, if coal is to have any sustainable long-term future, we have to use the latest technology—fluid-bed technology and combined cycle technology with heat recovery? That is the only long-term sustainable way to burn coal.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is right. If they wish to make—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. We cannot have the Minister making a contribution right now.

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall be happy to answer any point that the Minister might like to make by way of a proper intervention.

My hon. Friend hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton–Brown) is right. There has been an absence of positive action to back up some of the fine words—interspersed with some less fine words—from the ministerial team. The Minister owes the House an explanation tonight of the Government's stance on clean coal technology. They came to power saying, among other things, that they would be better for the coal industry than the Conservative Government had been, and that they would be better for clean coal technology than they claimed the Conservative Government had been. There is always room for improvement in this world, but nobody can say that, since May 1997, there has been any improvement at all. Indeed, there has been movement in the other direction. The mining communities feel let down by the Administration—they expected better and they are getting worse.

Mr. Hammond: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, although the focus over the past six or eight months has been on the pricing of coal contracts to generators, the long-term issue is not about price but about the Government's dilemma—the choice between their environmental targets and their commitment to the coal industry?

Mr. Redwood: Indeed, and we are finding it difficult to clarify how stringent the Government's environmental targets are. The Prime Minister—in a sweeping gesture—set a target for carbon dioxide emissions to be cut by a fifth; a massive movement, bigger than our partners were promising at the time of the conference where the Prime Minister made that promise. That would mean a further big reduction in the coal industry. Is the Minister prepared to quantify how much?

Mr. Battle: The right hon. Gentleman must be suffering from amnesia. Perhaps the late nights he keeps mean that he cannot cope. Does he remember being a member of a Government who passed the sulphur emission targets which would have shut down every coal power station in Britain except Drax and Ratcliffe? Who left us that legacy? Can he remind us?

Mr. Redwood: We read in the newspapers that the sulphur targets we set are thought to be too lenient by the Government, who are discussing a considerable intensification of those targets. Will the Minister confirm or deny that? It is rash for him to criticise the sulphur targets that we established in government if his Government are about to create stiffer targets which the coal industry will find it difficult, if not impossible, to meet.

The Minister seems quite unaware of the difficulties that the tensions are causing. As my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge said, there is a dilemma. The Prime Minister once said that he thought that government was about making hard choices. There is a good, hard choice for the Prime Minister, the President of the Board of Trade or the Paymaster General—or even, conceivably, the Minister, if he is allowed back on the brief. The hard choice is: are the Government greener than the Conservatives, in which case less coal will be mined, or are they less green than the Conservatives, in which case more coal could be mined?

How will the Government resolve the issue? Are they primarily a green Government—in which case they should be honest with the miners and tell them that much of the game is up for the mining industry—or are they a Government who are true to their roots in the mining communities, who will set less difficult targets and who will actively promote the market for coal? I trust that the Minister has read the suggestions from the Coalfield Communities Campaign. It would be good to hear whether he thinks that his Administration would like to accept those suggestions. How would that relate to the Bill? Does the Minister agree that amendment No. 2 is a small step in the direction of helping the coal industry? He has the choice, and he should give the House the benefit of his feelings before the night is much older.

Amendment No. 4 concerns renewables, and states:

"The levy imposed on a supplier of electricity generated in pursuance of qualifying arrangements under paragraph (c) of the definition of leviable electricity in subsection (8) above may not be greater than the aggregate payments received in respect of that electricity under this section."

The intention is to make sure that the renewable industry is not cheated under the proposal by having to pay more in levy than it receives from the fund created by the levy payments.

The original intention of the levy was to be generous to the renewables industry at the expense of less clean methods of generating power. The Minister must be more precise than the Bill, given that he wishes to upset the thrust behind the legislation that he inherits. He owes it to the House to say whether he would be happy with the amendment, which is offered in a helpful spirit, or whether he seriously intends to take money away from the renewable energy sector by imposing a higher levy on it than the payments that it receives. Will the Minister answer that point immediately to save the House some time?

Mr. Battle indicated dissent.

10.45 pm

Mr. Redwood: I am happy to wait until the whole debate is answered, if that is the Minister's wish. He would have saved the House time by saying that he accepted the intention of the amendment, or a lesser or greater intention. We would be happy with an amendment that would allow the renewables industry to receive back more than it pays, for example. We would not be happy with a looser amendment, which would leave the renewables industry potentially subject to the depredations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the whims of the President of the Board of Trade, which is the position in the Bill as it stands.

Amendment No. 5 would deal with the democratic difficulties in this proposal. It is a strong principle of our fine and ever-modern unwritten constitution that the House keeps control over the vote of moneys—over the levying of taxation and financial levies on industries or persons. What my right hon. and hon. Friends most regret about the measure is that it gives wide-ranging powers to levy money from businesses without going through separate and normal democratic processes to ensure that the levy rates are properly debated and approved through financial legislation. It would be more honest for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to introduce this kind of proposal as part of a Finance Bill, because its power to levy the whole energy industry is so wide that it has the nature of a tax rather than a special levy for a special purpose, which is how it was originally designed and named by the previous Administration.

The amendment therefore suggests that there should be a separate resolution by the House of Commons in this or a future Parliament to extend the levy. That modest request would be in keeping with the long-established principles on which our democracy is based, and with the principles established by long debate, row and battle centuries ago, when hon. Members rightly thought that it was necessary to have control over the Executive and their ability to raise taxes from industries and people in our community. If the Minister is not prepared to accept this modest proposal concerning the affirmative resolution, I hope that he will give us the benefit of his ideas on how the House of Commons can remain involved in the levying of taxation on the energy industries, given the wide-ranging and open-ended powers that have been drafted in the current version of this obscure but quite important Bill.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My right hon. Friend is dealing with one of the most fundamental issues that the House has to deal with at this point. Does he agree that the use of Henry VIII clauses, thereby giving Ministers unduly wide powers, is a serious deficit in the democratic process, and that even Ministers, who would naturally want to gain those powers, should resist those?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is right. DTI Ministers were detained for some hours last night because they were seeking Henry VIII powers over a minimum wage, with huge and unspecified cost consequences to the public as well as the private sector, and they were not prepared to put in the Bill the issue that concerns Labour Members as well as us—how much the wage would be.

Tonight, we have before us similar legislation, in which the Government wish to impose a levy on new industries and on sectors of an industry that have not previously paid it, without being prepared to specify in the Bill how much that levy would be and exactly how it would be spent on the other side of the ledger.

The Minister is looking around trying to think of something to say in response.

Mr. Battle: Sometimes strange things happen in this place: we change sides. Unfortunately, exactly his present argument was put to the right hon. Gentleman when he was in government in February 1989. He did not think that it was a great matter of principle then, because he voted against our attempt to introduce the affirmative resolution procedure under the 1989 Act.

Mr. Redwood: The Minister walked right into that; he now says that he thinks that it is a good idea to require an affirmative resolution. We seem to have reached happy agreement.

Mr. Battle: But I agree with you now.

Mr. Redwood: I think, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the Minister means that he agrees with me—with the right hon. Member for Wokingham. But he does not agree with me, because my view is clearly that we need the affirmative resolution procedure, whereas he is saying that he does not want it. [Interruption.] I do not remember having expressed a view at the time.

Mr. Battle: No, but you voted.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My right hon. Friend is having an interesting exchange with the Minister, but if he reads the debates from 1989, he will realise that he is now supporting the view that the present Prime Minister held at that time. It is surprising that the Minister, who I suspect is quite ambitious, does not accept the logic of the argument that the present Prime Minister, then simply the hon. Member for Sedgefield, expressed on the issue at the time. I hope that now he will immediately agree to accept the amendments.

Mr. Redwood: We live in hope, but I fear that my hon. Friend's hope may have outrun the reality of the Administration whom we are, unfortunately, experiencing day by day.

The new clause and amendments are designed to deal specifically with three important issues. The first is whether the Minister will accept the amendments or give us another way in which the House can retain ultimate control over how high the levy could go. We offer him the route of putting a cap, or ceiling, on the levy, and also the route of giving the House its entitlement—a requirement for an affirmative resolution should any change in the levy, especially an increase, be recommended by the Administration.

The second big issue that we seek to highlight is the future of the coal industry. We see an industry that, measured by its output, is in sharp decline. We see an industry subject to quick fixes by the Paymaster General and other Ministers. It may be worthy of a soundbite or a trip down a coal mine by the Minister without Portfolio, but is not considered worthy of a serious energy policy that might provide some relief, although the industry will hit grave difficulties in the summer unless the Minister overcomes his slumbers and gets his job back from the Paymaster General.

We have offered a positive, though modest, suggestion—one of many that could be developed by Executive as well as legislative action, and one that is suitable in the context of the debate—to offer a small fiscal incentive for those developing clean coal technology, which could help the next generation of coal-fired generating plant.

The third important issue which we have highlighted is the treatment of renewable energy, which many Opposition Members believe could play an important role. It represents a very modest proportion of our current power generation, but there are many imaginative and innovative businesses in this country, and it is the kind of technology that may produce a pay-off in exports all over the world as well as at home.

That is common ground between the Minister and us. However, the Minister has an advantage that the Opposition do not have: he can take action this day, or tomorrow in his office, to do something about the idea, whereas we can merely urge action on him. We are offering him the opportunity to respond positively to the proposal and, within the confines of the debate, to tell us what else he can do to support the renewable energy industry.

I think that in one of his more fair-minded moments, the Minister would agree that our fossil fuel levy and its allocation did something to promote energy in this country and that, from a slow start and modest beginnings, we succeeded in promoting some interesting technologies and helping some companies. We would like to know how the Minister wishes to continue that work, and trust that he will respond positively to our new clause and amendments.

Will the Minister accept our new clause and amendments—which are good in intention, modest in scope and helpful—or will he make other proposals that will achieve similar jobs for the United Kingdom and for our energy industry? Will he now take seriously the need for democratic accountability, the need for policy that says something to the mining industry that it wishes to hear and the need to do more to promote the renewable energy industry?

Mr. Skinner: I have spent quite a while as an hon. Member, but listening to that ex-Minister, the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), talking about saving the 17 or 20 pits that are left has been like being in fantasy land. I could laugh, but I really want to cry. When the Tories got into power in 1979, there were 300 pits in Britain and about 13 pits in Derbyshire, where I come from. Now the ex-Minister has come to the House to tell us the fairy story that, after only 10 months in opposition, he has totally converted and wants to save those jobs.

Many of the areas that we are talking about have been subjected, with the help of the Tory Government, to opencast mining. Whether we like it or not—it is a sad thing to have to say—the fact is that, once we opencast that land, no one will ever again drive another shaft down it. The geology becomes unstable, preventing anyone from getting at any of the remaining coal. Opencast mining does not get all the coal; it gets only some of it.

I have listened to the ex-Minister for the past 40 minutes, and it has been enough to make a cat laugh. He was there in the Government—a Minister—for the greater part of the time that the pits were closed. If he was not a Minister, he was in the policy unit, telling the other Tory Ministers what to do.

Even after 1984, 174 pits were still left. Then we had the savage experience of Tory Ministers—all of them—going back on what they had told the Trade and Industry Select Committee, which produced its report. My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) was a member of that Committee, so he knows what he is talking about when he describes the £285 million that should have been used to develop clean coal.

When Ministers set up that Committee, they said that they would abide by its recommendations. But what happened? We had a vote in the House. On the night in question, almost every Tory Member, and every Tory Minister, went into the Lobby to shut those 31 pits, leaving about 20 pits. The Tories privatised the remaining pits, after which we lost another batch of pits, which has left us in this almighty mess.

Whatever phraseology that man—that shadow Minister—uses, the truth is that he could talk a donkey's hind leg off and until his belly warms. But out there in the country, he will not convince the people of anything other than the fact that the Tory Government were hellbent on revenge against the miners after their victories of 1972 and 1974, and that they would go to any lengths to make those miners and their families eat grass.

One of the reasons why we were able to collect money in places such as Bournemouth, Bath, Worthing and all those Tory constituencies—including Wimbledon and Harrow, where I often went—is that people there said, "We want to feed the families that Mrs. Thatcher is starving." When I say "Mrs. Thatcher", I include that shadow Minister. He was involved in it.

So I tell the ex-Minister not to come here with his fancy fairy stories about wanting to help miners. I have never heard such piffle in all my life. I think about the villages that I represent in Derbyshire, and realise that the social fabric has broken down because the Tory Government finally got rid of all their pits.

Let us be clear about it: there is a qualitative difference between how pits were closed when I was working in them and how the Tories closed them. When Parkhouse colliery closed, I had a chance to go to about 15 other collieries within a five or six-mile radius. When they closed down the last 15 pits, make no mistake! There was no chance of being transferred. Ninety per cent. of miners in my constituency were told, "Sorry, there are no more pits left for you to go to." That was the criminal action.

I had a choice; I went to another colliery, but all the young lads were chucked on the scrap heap. There used to be stable communities, where doors were left open at night. When I was first a Member of Parliament, I saw row after row of miners' cottages with their doors open. Now the social fabric has been destroyed to such an extent that people are kicking one another's doors in, and there are three padlocks on the doors.

Let no one tell me that everything has happened in the last 10 months. I can be critical of this Government—I have already started—but I cannot blame them for what has happened in the coal industry. I may have to at some point, but I cannot now. There is not a single pit left in my constituency. There is not one in the whole of north Derbyshire; there is not one in Lancashire; there is only that co-operative left in south Wales—and this man here, the right hon. Member for Wokingham, is claiming credit for saving it. Come on!

I believe that there is one pit left in Durham, and there may be one left in Scotland. Let us think about it. In 1979, there were 300 pits; now we are down to about 20. Let me tell the House something else. The Government can have as many fossil fuel levies as they like, and they can shuffle the pack as much as they like, but they cannot repair the damage that was done over those 18 years of Tory government.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The hon. Gentleman is displaying some of the best rhetoric that I have heard since I have been in the House, but will he tell us, factually, how many pits the Labour Government closed in the 1960s and 1970s, compared with the number closed by the Conservative Government in the 1980s?

Mr. Skinner: I can give the hon. Gentleman a rough estimate—and the figures bear comparison; there is no mistake about that.

When I first came down to lobby Parliament in 1967, there was a Labour Government. A fellow who is now in the House of Lords—Lord Marsh—was allegedly the Labour Minister of Power. I had suspected him a long way back, when he wore a CND badge at his selection conference, because I had not seen him on the Aldermaston march. The badge got him the selection and, having been selected, he had a wonderful plan. It was almost like the Heseltine plan—not the Heseltine plan; the plan from Henley-on-Thames. Lord Marsh was going to close down the industry then, although he was not going to use the fossil fuel levy and all the rest of it. He had to be bundled out of office. That is what we did when we marched down here in 1967 and broke into the Labour party conference to save the industry.

I will tell the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) the difference in the situation. We were able to force a Labour Government to change course. We tried it in 1991 and 1992 with the Conservative Government, and we could not shift them. Between 70 and 80 pits were closed in the period that the hon. Gentleman is talking about.

I know the industry like the back of my hand; I know about all the closures. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that one pit has been closed in the last 10 months. I could not lay the closure at the door of my hon. Friend the Minister even if I wanted to, because the pit has been closed by private enterprise. The hon. Gentleman must understand this: once the coal industry is handed over to private enterprise, a Government cannot intervene, or can hardly intervene. Why? Because it is all about money—it is about shekels and it is about profit. The moment that Silverdale looked as if it could not deliver the goods, someone came along and said, "Close it."

My hon. Friend the Minister had better be aware of this point, as should every other hon. Member. Budge has about 17 pits. He is also mining about 16 million tonnes of coal a year from opencast. It sticks in my gullet to hear Budge asking the Labour Government for £300 million of subsidy from taxpayers' money, when he effectively stole the coal industry in the first place. With that subsidy, he could solve the problem himself, because all he has to do to save every single pit is turn off the tap of opencast coal production.

My hon. Friend the Minister should remember that point. When he has to make calculations, with or without a levy, he will have to bear it in mind that there are other components. He can say to Mr. Budge that we want to save the 20-odd pits that are left, but that he had better cut back on opencast. Changing the mineral planning guidance rules would make one hell of a difference. We could then save the deep mines and the miners who work in them.

My hon. Friend the Minister could do something about the French power that is coming over here. I do not go a bundle on this Common Market, and never will. I have never been caught up in it, unlike the right hon. Member for Wokingham, who is a Johnny-come-lately. He is anti-Market now, but at one time he was greatly in favour, like most of the Tories.

If 7,000 or 8,000 miners' jobs can be saved in Britain, we had better do that and not save the French nuclear power that is coming over here. If we can shuffle the fossil fuel levy in that direction, by all means let us do it. My hon. Friend the Minister should pay some attention to the question of imported coal, which comes from some of the most unlikely places. We cannot afford to chuck our few miners out of work while subsidising up to the hilt imported coal from Spain, Germany, Colombia and slave-labour economies.

The fossil fuel levy pales into insignificance compared with what can be done, but if Budge decides that a pit is not profitable, perhaps because it has run into some bad geology and is losing money, we can do nothing. Under nationalisation, we could save a pit by getting through the bad work, because there were enough profitable pits for the strong to help the weak.

Under privatisation, that will not happen: Mr. Budge will say, "That pit's unprofitable; it's going." Mark my words, if the coal industry remains in private hands, the owners of the few remaining pits will close them, just as they closed Silverdale, because it was not delivering. That is why the whole question is so important, over and above this tin-pot fossil fuel levy.

Ministers must pass the message on to Downing street or anywhere else that the only way of saving the few remaining pits, and taking them out of the grip of Mr. Budge and all the rest, is to bring the industry back into public ownership. That does not go down very well with new Labour, but it has to be said. It is much more important than some of the rubbish coming out of the mouth of the right hon. Member for Wokingham.

It has been a sad story, mainly because we had 18 years of a Tory Government who were determined to do the dirty on the miners and their families. By God, did they rub it in. Now we have to set up task forces in every single pit village to try to get work back into the communities. It is a sad story, all right.

I will give my hon. Friend the Minister the benefit of the doubt tonight, for what that is worth, but the decisions that we make on this little Bill are unimportant compared with what we have to do if we want to save the industry. If a Labour Government make the decision to save the 20-odd pits in Britain, it is possible to do it.

If we want to use the levy to shift a bit here and there and move the balance this way or the other, so be it: I go along with that. I believe in intervention and Governments moving in. I do not know whether it is old Labour or new Labour, or old-fashioned socialism. I do not believe in the principle of market forces.

I am like the farmers who ran the march the other week. They say they cannot produce food like the Mediterranean countries because they cannot compete with them. I am not against the principle of that dreaded word "subsidy". I believe that it is important to get people into work. I believe in welfare into work—in keeping miners in their jobs rather than chucking them on the scrap heap as window cleaners. We have got more window cleaners and taxi drivers in Bolsover and Barnsley than we have ever had before. That is a sad commentary on the proud pit villages that were destroyed by that lot opposite. I just had to stay to tell them.

The right hon. Member for Wokingham can spout as much as he likes. Some Tory audience might take it all in when he tells them, with his jerky movements, what he wants to do to save the industry. It is all but destroyed. The Labour Government must do something to save what remains of it. I will help my hon. Friend the Minister to do that. I had to do a little deal with him the other week to save concessionary coal; I hope that that show is on the road permanently. I will give him a hand with a shovel to save what remains of the industry, but I will not expect any help from that lot opposite, who destroyed the miners' jobs and left them to rot in nearly every pit village in Britain.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I did not want to stop the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) in full flight. I have allowed a wide debate so far. Perhaps we can return to new clause 1. It would assist the Chair if mention were made of it.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): Mr. Deputy Speaker, we were privileged that you did not stop the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) when he was in full flight. I have been here 15 years. I would never patronise the hon. Gentleman, but I must say that it was a privilege to listen to him and to the passion that he put into his speech. I hope that you will not stop the Minister if he decides to respond to the hon. Gentleman's points. I would love to hear his detailed response to them rather than to what the hon. Gentleman called this shoddy little measure or little piffle of a Bill.

It is to this little piffle of a Bill that I must turn. I oppose the measure, but I am a pragmatist. I accept that the Government have a huge majority; they can do what they like. They could do what the hon. Member for Bolsover wants if they had the mind and the guts. As the Government will get the measure through, I say only that, if they are minded to try to square the circle by taking the illogical step of imposing a levy on fuel generated by alternative, green means while going into the fifth round of the non-fossil fuel obligation, I assume that it is because they wish to show their green credentials.

The Government do not want to abandon NOFFO. They will continue to fund alternative means such as extra hydro power in Scotland, which is awash with it, and extra wind power in parts of England that are fed up with that. To continue with that and impose a levy on electricity generated by green means is illogical. If that is what they want, I urge the Minister to pay attention and to accept amendment No. 3. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) said, it would give him the flexibility and scope to impose levies on different sorts of electricity generated by alternative or green means.

If the Minister is minded to do that, I should be particularly interested to hear his views on the sort of levy that he might impose on wind power generated in parts of the country where wind power might no longer be so desirable as it was in the past. If the non-fossil fuel obligation is intended to encourage alternative energy sources and technology that are on the frontiers of science, one of the areas of wind power that should be looked at is wind power generated by offshore means. I believe the technology to do that has been developed, and, with the subsidy which NOFFO grants, the technology is capable of coming on stream which would enable us to build much bigger, more substantial and more stable wind farms, slightly offshore—perhaps even quite a bit offshore—where they would not be an eyesore and a nuisance to constituents of mine living in the Lake district or close to it. I hope that the Minister will seriously address that point.

11.15 pm

I have written to the hon. Gentleman in the past suggesting that, as we have now had four rounds and are entering the fifth round of NOFFO, and as the previous Government's policy—slavishly followed by the present Government—has succeeded in encouraging alternative forms of energy and alternative renewables, the time may have come to look at the direction in which we are going. I know that the Labour party is reviewing most areas of policy—indeed, everything seems to be under review—but I wish that the Minister would put the policy on renewables, particularly as it affects wind farms on sensitive sites in this country, under urgent review.

The Minister has decided not to use the planning mechanism as a means of further tightening things up. Although that is a possible avenue which I should happily encourage a socialist Government who believed in extra planning controls to follow, he has decided not to go down that route. As he is taking in the Bill the additional instrument of imposing a levy on renewables, he should take up the suggestion in amendment No. 3 to give himself more flexibility. Rather than adopt a broad-brush approach and impose a levy on all forms of renewables, he would be able to target the levy on certain types of renewable that we might consider, after a review, are less appropriate now.

I have skirted the subject, but let me say bluntly that I am concerned that some operators have now decided that wind farms are a good cash cow. Because of the subsidy that is available, parts of my constituency are now plagued by speculative planning applications, not for half a dozen windmills, but for up to 200 windmills in areas on the edge of the Lake district national park and other areas of outstanding natural beauty.

Although, at the end of the day, many of those wind farm developments have been turned down by the planning authority and, thankfully, by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions inspectors, and although some will no doubt be turned down in future, they cause enormous concern and blight for a period of 12 to 18 months while the application goes through.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): Is my right hon. Friend aware that in my constituency, which his borders, there are six existing applications for wind farms, two of which are in the north Pennines area of outstanding natural beauty?

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In all corners of my constituency and that of my hon. Friend, which cover some of the most beautiful parts of Northumberland, there is a rash of planning applications in areas of outstanding natural beauty. No doubt many of those applications will be turned down, but the concern caused is considerable.

That offers another chance for the Minister to show his green credentials. I assume that he has not abolished NOFFO, for the simple reason that he does not want to tell environmentalists, "We are getting rid of the renewables policy." I accept that there are parts of the renewables policy which are perfectly sensible.

It is correct and appropriate to introduce a policy such as NFFO, which we did in 1995, to encourage alternative technology. Wind farm technology is now well proven. It works. The time has come for it to stand on its own feet without taxpayer subsidy. Let us take the subsidy that is available to land-based wind farms and push some of it towards new technology that would enable wind farms to be built offshore, for example.

That option is available to the Minister. I do not suggest that his whole Bill should be scrapped, much as I dislike its concept, but if he is going to go ahead with it, for goodness' sake let him take the appropriate power in amendment No. 3. Let him take the suitable power, so that he is able to target the levy towards those renewable sectors that we want to encourage and towards some of the renewable sectors where we already have sufficiency and of which we do not want any more, particularly in sensitive areas.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My right hon. Friend makes an important point, particularly as the Government, by press release, have told the world that we are going towards a 10 per cent. requirement of electricity generated. However, they will not tell the House or the world how they are going to achieve that. Clearly, one of the problems that has brought so many Labour Members into the Chamber is that that requirement will almost certainly mean a reduction in coal generation.

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend makes a good point. No doubt the hon. Member for Bolsover will fight that corner as robustly as he did tonight. In many ways, my suggestion is a tiny help to him. I suggest that some parts of the renewables policy go too far. If the Minister wishes to divert some of the energy and some of the subsidy through NOFFO into alternative forms of renewables, rather than into large wind farms in inappropriate areas, he will have my full support.

While he is at it, will the Minister talk to Scottish Office Ministers? I have no political connection with Scotland at all now; I am merely an occasional visitor when I am allowed across the border. However, it still seems extraordinary to visit some favoured haunts in the highlands, an area that is awash with hydro-electricity—Scotland, I believe, is an exporter of hydro-electricity—to see NOFFO being used in Scotland, encouraging the damming up of yet more small lochs, and to see small, unnecessary hydro-electric projects there, adding to the plethora of hydro-electricity it already has.

The Minister has a chance to use the amendment to be much more selective and incisive in the tools he uses to direct electricity generation and renewables policy. I disapprove generally of his approach, but, if he is minded to take it, let him adopt the scalpel rather than the sledgehammer, which he has in the Bill.

I hope that the Minister will respond to my points, but, if he is not minded to do so, I would dearly love him to respond to what the hon. Member for Bolsover said—if not tonight, then at some other point. This debate will run and run.

Mr. Hammond: The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)referred to this measure as a tin-pot fossil fuel levy. The whole point about the levy is that it is unlimited in its potential extent. At its height, when the levy was 11 per cent., I believe that it raised about £1 billion a year, which by anyone's standards—and whatever the purpose for which it is applied—would hardly be considered a tin-pot amount of money. That sum could be used seriously to tackle many of the problems in different sectors of the energy industry.

I am happy that there is only one group of amendments on the amendment paper, which suggests that we might get home for breakfast, but, with your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to discuss the amendments and the new clause separately, because they have a certain logical consistency.

Amendment No. 5 would add to the wording of clause 1(3), to make any extension under section 33(9) of the Electricity Act 1989 subject to affirmative resolution of the House of Commons. The purpose of the amendment is simply to ensure adequate opportunity for scrutiny on a matter that gives considerable cause for concern not only to Conservative Members but, as we discovered on Second Reading and in Committee, to Liberal Democrat Members, for a variety of reasons.

Our principal concern is that clause 1(3), which inserts a new subsection (9) into section 33 of the Electricity Act 1989, is something of a blunt instrument, which would allow the Secretary of State to remove the definition of leviable electricity altogether, so that all electricity became leviable, or to leave the definition exactly as it is. Clause 1(3) does not allow the Secretary of State any discretion to extend the levy to certain areas that are not currently leviable, without at the same time hitting the full range of unsubsidised renewable technologies and any other technologies that currently escape the levy.

It has been suggested by my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), who is no longer in his place, that large-scale hydro-electric projects in Scotland might properly have the levy extended to them. We have tabled amendment No. 3 specifically with the purpose of giving the Secretary of State the ability to add power-generating resources selectively to the scope of the levy without forcing him or her to extend it across the range of all electricity.

It is common ground between Labour and Opposition Members that the NOFFO regime has been a success, not perhaps principally in the large amount of electricity that is generated under it—although some 200 or so projects are approved under the NOFFO arrangements, the amount of electricity generated is still quite small—but in terms of the convergence that has already been achieved. It is now a realistic probability that some of the technologies will reach market pricing and that we will shortly see such electricity sold directly into the retail market as green electricity purchased as such by consumers.

Mr. Ian Bruce: It would have been extremely helpful to the Standing Committee to hear from the Minister what he intended to do with the non-fossil fuel obligation. If we could have had a clear picture of what he intended in the next round for NOFFO, we could have been very much more helpful and worked on a bipartisan approach. Is it not ridiculous that the Minister's right hon. and hon. Friends are urging him to take action on things such as clean coal, yet he still will not answer Lord Ezra or anyone about exactly what he intends to do, or what other non-fossil fuel obligation he intends to require?

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend anticipates the point that I was about to make. A future amendment of section 32 of the Electricity Act 1989 may enable the levy to be used in support of clean coal technology or any other new or existing technologies. It would be interesting in that context if the Minister could tell us the current status of the private Member's Bill introduced by Lord Ezra in another place. I am surprised that the hon. Member for Bolsover did not mention that Bill. The Minister was probed on it in Standing Committee.

The noble Lord was given to understand that the Government would treat his Bill benevolently when it reached this place. By the time of the Standing Committee's proceedings, the Minister had not answered a letter from Lord Ezra; we would be interested to know whether the Government intend to make time for that measure when it gets to this House. That would have a significant impact on the matters we are debating this evening.

11.30 pm

Perhaps the Minister will also tell us what steps have been taken—I know that he has taken some already—to clear with the European Commission any moves that the Government might be minded to make to allow the subsidising, through the NOFFO mechanism, of clean coal technology; or to allow other measures to help the coal industry. Such measures would not, I believe, become possible until they had been cleared by the Commission.

The levy is relatively low at the moment—less than 2 per cent.—but at its peak it was set at 11 per cent. At that level, it could provide a technology not subjected to the levy with a powerful competitive edge over one that was subjected to it. In pursuit of environmental and other objectives, it might be useful for the Government to have the power to include certain new technologies in the levy, without necessarily extending it to all technologies.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the amount of money raised under the previous Administration, when there were difficulties with the nuclear industry. That money is no longer included in the price of electricity. The mechanism involved is a very powerful one; yet we still cannot find out from the Minister by how much he intends the levy to rise.

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend is right. Any measures that the Minister was minded to introduce to extend the use of the NOFFO arrangements to support clean coal technology would require an amendment to section 32 of the Electricity Act 1989. Lord Ezra, when the Bill was introduced in another place, sought to include such a provision, but was ruled out of order.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Following the blistering attack by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), may I take it that the shadow Front-Bench team has been chased from the Chamber? The hon. Members for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) and for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), and the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), have all disappeared from the scene. What credibility can we ascribe to the remaining members of a party whose Front-Bench team disappears in this manner?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Hammond: We will do our best. Perhaps our right hon. and hon. Friends have gone to the Tea Room for a short break, in anticipation of lengthy proceedings.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My hon. Friend will know that we operate a lean and mean team. With so many DTI Bills coming through, and with so many DTI Ministers—with all their flats—dealing with them, Conservative Members still appear able to debate these matters cogently while encountering a great deal of difficulty even getting Labour Members to get to their feet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps we can now return to the amendments.

Mr. Hammond: I will not be tempted down the route that my hon. Friend offers me.

Amendment No. 2 offers the only means, within the limited scope of the Bill, of allowing the Minister to show his practical support for clean coal technology. It is a small start. How much excluding that technology from the scope of the levy would be worth would depend entirely on the level of the levy at the time. Clearly, if the levy was 11 per cent., it could be a considerable advantage which might make a significant difference to a private investor considering investing in clean coal technology for retrofit. If the levy was only 2 per cent.—[Interruption.] I am sorry: I have been tempted off my track by the Minister.

[Mr. Hammond]

The current problems in the coal industry have focused attention on support for coal mining and coal burning processes. The issue is not just the price agreed with the generators, as much of the press speculation and comment over the past few months has suggested. It is also the contradiction, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) said, between the Government's commitment to reduced emissions of greenhouse gases, which we all welcome, and the Government's undoubted desire to help the coal industry if they can. Even before the election they were balancing on a tightrope, trying to satisfy the green lobby while masquerading as the friend of the coal mining community. Now they must decide on which side of the tightrope they will fall off.

The only route out of the problem for the Minister is to use the mechanism of the NOFFO—section 32 of the 1989 Act—in the future to support clean coal technology, while not negating the Government's commitments on greenhouse gases.

We are trying to draw out the Government's policy. We know that a number of reviews are taking place. Perhaps it would have been better if the Bill had been limited to subsections (1) and (2) of clause 1, which would have made it truly just a technical measure, as the Minister has suggested at various times that it is.

By including subsection (3), however, the Minister has given himself powers considerably to extend the scope of the levy. In those circumstances, we must probe him about his wider intentions. Had he completed his review of the future of renewables, funding and the NOFFO mechanism and then introduced a new Bill that amended section 32 of the Electricity Act 1989 and widened the scope of the levy as subsection (3) does, that might have been more logical.

We need to know whether the Government intend to use section 32 to try to support the coal industry. Are they interested in using the levy as a tool to support the industry, as our amendment No. 2 suggests? What levels do the Government envisage for the levy in the future? We would not necessarily be hostile to a higher levy if it made sense, but we are not minded to write blank cheques for the Government.

We want to ensure through the amendments that there is a proper system of reporting back to the House, and that any measures that the Government introduce to extend the scope of the levy will be properly reviewed in Parliament. We need to know how they will reach their ambitious emissions targets, how much that will cost, and how they will finance those costs. We seek openness and debate. What I have suggested the Government might be considering would not necessarily be wrong, but it would be wrong to sneak it in through the back door of subsection (3) and other provisions of the Bill.

If support for clean coal and other technologies through the levy is a coherent part of the Government's energy policy in the long term, and not just a short-term fix, it might be sensible to use the mechanism of the non-fossil fuel obligation. We will keep a check on what the Government do in that respect. For that purpose, we have tabled amendment No. 6. We do not suggest that the Government should not contemplate increasing the level of the levy, but, if they do increase it, that should be subject to approval by Parliament, so that a proper check can be maintained.

In discussions such as this, it is important not to forget that, alongside the environmental argument for supporting alternative technologies and managing the fuel equation in our electricity generation industry, there is a second pillar of argument for supporting new energy technologies: security of supply. That tends to be an on-off issue. At certain times—for example, in 1973 and during the Gulf war—security of supply becomes extremely fashionable and the driving force in particular areas of energy policy. At other times, when our energy supply does not seem to be seriously threatened and our energy security is not obviously under threat, the issue slips out of sight, and the environmental focus tends to take over.

Anyone who has attended any of the excellent seminars organised by the various strategic and international study institutes with which London is blessed will realise that, although our energy supplies do not appear to be under any imminent threat, many quite plausible scenarios suggest that we would be wise to consider energy security as an important part of the equation. That is a second, and quite legitimate, reason for encouraging indigenous energy sources—although I do not suggest for a moment encouraging them at any cost.

Mr. Clapham: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the previous Government and the one before that set us on a course of over-dependence on gas? In light of that, it is extremely difficult for this Government—who are trying to do something positive for the mining industry—to be effective.

Mr. Hammond: Doing something positive for the mining industry includes immediately approving new gas-fired power stations, which the Government said they would not do. Gas is an indigenous energy source in the United Kingdom—at least at the moment—unlike some of our other energy sources.

I do not suggest that we should pursue energy security at any cost. However, if security can be achieved in a way that is compatible with a sensible environmental policy at a sensible cost, that is a legitimate objective to pursue. Sections 32 and 33 of the Electricity Act 1989 may be a legitimate route for achieving that objective as well as environmental objectives.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Looking back at the debates on the original electricity legislation that introduced the non-fossil fuel obligation, one notices that the cost differences between gas, coal and nuclear and wind power then are incredibly different from those levels today. The non-fossil fuel obligation and the fossil fuel levy give the Government flexibility and should be retained. We are rather surprised that the Government do not agree.

Mr. Hammond: The flexibility that I believe the amendments would give the Government could prove useful to the Minister. For the second night in a row, I find myself in the somewhat unusual position of urging the Government to give themselves more discretionary power. We can envisage the advantages that that would have.

I turn now to amendment No. 4, which I think stands a little apart from the other amendments, in that it seeks to protect electricity generated from renewable technologies under qualifying arrangements. The amendment seeks to prevent a situation whereby any given source of electricity supply would be subject to a levy that might be more than the subsidy being received in respect of that electricity.

We might contemplate that situation when the price of renewable energy generated from certain technologies converged with market prices. We might see that the subsidy payable is quite low—or very low indeed—at a point in the not too distant future, perhaps under some of the bids that the Minister is receiving under the current NOFFO round.

If at some point the levy were to be raised from its current low level to 5 or 10 per cent.—somewhere within the range that has been experienced since the mechanism was introduced—a technology-based renewable energy generating station could pay more levy than it receives in subsidy. I think that the Minister had some sympathy in Standing Committee for the argument that it would send the wrong signals to the renewable energy generation industry were we to suggest that, as it approached convergence and lost its subsidy, it might become a net payer of levy. We would not like to send it that message.

All these amendments have a certain coherence. Their overriding theme is the need for transparency and accountability as the Minister seeks to use the mechanisms that are available to him to deal with the issues. There is no suggestion that we would not be sympathetic to what he might have to do, but there is a desire to ensure that the House is properly informed, and that proper debate takes place.

11.45 pm

Mr. Ian Bruce: I notice that the Chamber is starting to fill up with Whips. The Deputy Chief Whip is present. Obviously, he is a little worried that the Whip on duty is the same one who was on duty last night when we were debating the National Minimum Wage Bill. Perhaps the Deputy Chief Whip is concerned that we may talk through the night. I can reassure him that it is not our intention to delay the House unduly, but the Bill before us is important. The Minister, who takes this matter extremely seriously, will want to respond in full to matters that have been raised in this full and sensible debate.

Whips are, supposedly, the silent people. In Committee, they were keen to ensure that the Committee was filled with the Stepford tendency of new Labour MPs who would not—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not want to know what the Whips did in Committee. It has nothing to do with me. We have amendments before us and the hon. Gentleman will speak to them.

Mr. Bruce: I am most grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for reminding me not to be tempted by such important people as the Deputy Chief Whip.

It is important that the House has the opportunity to have a full debate. It has allowed the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) to speak on a subject about which he is knowledgeable and passionate, and his speech was a treat to us all. Indeed, he spoke directly to the substance of the amendments before us. We also had a treatise from my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), which went into great detail about the amendments that we tabled.

I shall respond to any interventions that hon. Members may wish to make. If they wish me to go wider, I should be happy to do so. I shall talk about the background to the amendments and why it is so important that the Minister is given the opportunity at this early hour to tell the House what is in his mind about where we are going. However, before I start my full remarks, I should speak briefly about the non-fossil fuel obligation, which is part of section 32 of the Electricity Act 1989 and concerns the protection of public interest, and section 33, which the Bill will amend. Those terms can confuse people about exactly what is intended.

You will know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that, in deciding which amendments to select for debate, Madam Speaker and her Committee are always extremely wise and beyond criticism. Madam Speaker was correct not to select the three amendments that I tabled—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. No comment should be made on amendments which have not been selected. There was good cause not to select them, and the House knows that. Nor should the hon. Gentleman deal with the origins of the amendments. The amendments are here for debate, and that is what the hon. Gentleman must do.

Mr. Bruce: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for keeping me on the straight and narrow.

The Minister may argue, probably correctly, that section 32 of the Electricity Act 1989 already contains powers to promote clean coal technology, and that may well be a reason for rejecting the new clause. We are simply seeking, as we did in Committee, to tease out whether the Government need various powers. It is important to examine the Government's intentions.

The hon. Member for Bolsover, like other hon. Members, will want the Government's fuel policy to be sufficiently flexible. The levy should not go on specific non-fossil fuels when one of the original purposes of NOFFO and the levy to pay for it was to provide for the cost of closing nuclear power stations when they came to the end of their life. That levy has been extremely effective. Electricity prices have fallen since its introduction, rather than risen, as was the suggestion then. The Government may want that fall to continue or they may want to ensure that they can increase electricity prices in the future to pay for Kyoto. No one has yet told us how our obligations under Kyoto will be paid for.

We already know that the Government plan to put taxes on aggregates and landfill, and to encourage the burning of waste to generate electricity—a controversial subject. This evening, I attended a dinner of the Institute of Wastes Management, where the problems of people not wanting what is considered to be invasive technology in their back yards was discussed.

Mr. Hammond: Does my hon. Friend agree that amendment No. 4 would allow the Minister to distinguish between technologies in the way that he is suggesting is necessary?

Mr. Bruce: Indeed. Section 32 helps the Minister to deal with the protection of public interest—that is what the section is called in the Electricity Act 1989. The additional flexibility is designed to enable the Minister to deal with difficult situations.

[Mr. Bruce]

The mechanism is still being used effectively by the Government and they say that they want to continue to use it. The fact that that mechanism has stood the test of time is a tribute to our Conservative predecessors, who obviously got it right. It is rare for a mechanism which was heavily criticised to have stood the test of time. We should not want Ministers and Whips to have to find more parliamentary time to introduce yet another measure when it was decided how the obligation would be imposed. Our amendment offers the Minister a new mechanism to enable him to do a better job for the future and to tell us about funding.

Mr. Hammond: Does my hon. Friend agree that amendment No. 3 gives the Minister every power that he would have within the Bill as drafted, plus some additional powers to use subsection (3) in a more subtle way than is currently offered?

Mr. Bruce: I am loth to say that the Minister would not want to be subtle. However, his response in Committee demonstrated that he wanted to bamboozle us. In a rather aggressive manner—I know that that is just his way and that he does not mean anything by it—he seemed to be telling Conservative Members that anything that we do to help him so that he can help the public and his friends in the coal industry should be rejected at every opportunity.

The cap on the levy is dealt with in the amendments. That could lead one to believe that we are suggesting that the non-fossil fuel obligation should be used for all sorts of additional purposes and also that it should be held back. It is somewhat contradictory. We are saying not that the non-fossil fuel obligation and the levy should never go up beyond the level that we are suggesting, but that, if it were to be increased, the House should have an opportunity to discuss it. Those are crucial issues for the future.

The environmental lobby is keen to ensure that we have as much information as possible about where it believes that the country should be going. The Government are looking at all sorts of things, including their transport policy. They are all asking what we should be doing for Kyoto. They are asking what we should be doing for the future.

We are not talking about no-cost options. It is important to know that the Minister has a power that could put up electricity prices substantially—I do not believe that there is any limit. The Minister could wake up one morning and be told by the Chancellor that he is trying to do something for Kyoto but that he does not want to do it by general taxation because he would be found out and people would be critical. In those circumstances, the price of electricity could be increased by an order, which hardly needs to be debated in the House.

Mr. Hammond: Does my hon. Friend agree that the levy has something of the nature of a hypothecated tax, which has the extraordinary characteristic of being self-collecting? The spending Department spends and it automatically collects the right amount through the mechanism of the levy.

Mr. Bruce: Indeed. It is a subtle and clever mechanism that a hypothecated tax has been operating in the United Kingdom for over a decade without anybody noticing. People have noticed electricity prices going down, despite Labour propaganda suggesting that prices have been going up.

If we are to be honest, it is important that people should know the costs. My hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge knows that the levy, which was introduced by a Conservative Government, transferred existing costs of nuclear power on to the coal industry, as there was inequality between those two forms of energy. Because nuclear power stations were nationalised—nobody seemed to care that they were uneconomical—the extra costs had to be found. A subtle and clever mechanism was brought in, and any Chancellor who recognises how clever that mechanism is will be tempted to use it. Despite the fact that the Treasury is not speaking before the Budget, perhaps it is listening to the debate. It may think that this is an ideal way to raise additional taxation.

The House would like to discuss this matter further, and I am disappointed—as are my hon. Friends—that no Labour Member, other than the hon. Members for Bolsover and for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham), who intervened passionately, has taken part in the debate. I shall now allow the Minister to respond—assuming that I cannot tempt any Labour Member to express his views. I would not want to hog the limited time we have available, and I should not want to delay the start of the Third Reading debate.

Mr. Battle: This is a Bill of two clauses, which deals with the type of electricity on which the fossil fuel levy can be charged. The levy is the main means of raising the funds to support renewable technologies for the generation of electricity, and the Bill will ensure a level playing field in the generation of electricity. It will maintain the existing levy on nuclear energy generated in England and Wales and will bring under the levy for the first time the imports of nuclear electricity—a matter to which my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) referred. The imports from France of nuclear energy will be brought under the levy. I accept that it is a small measure, but the Bill will shift the balance in favour of renewables and will ensure that the nuclear industry pays its share.

It has been an interesting debate. We had a wide-ranging speech from the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) who, sadly, had to leave us. We have had contributions from the hon. Members for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) and for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond). I heard critical mutterings, but let us be fair—those hon. Members have been present throughout our proceedings on the Bill—on Second Reading, for the whole of the Committee stage and tonight. At least two Opposition Members are seriously interested in the Bill, and I have listened to what they have had to say.

Amendment No. 2 proposes that electricity supplied from clean coal generating plants could be exempted from the levy, but sadly there are no such generating plants operating in Britain. Simply exempting electricity supplied from such stations from the scope of the levy would not give sufficient incentive for such plants to be built. We are looking carefully at how to encourage clean coal technology. We already provide support for the development of clean coal technology under the foresight programme; some £4 million has been provided this year alone.

Mr. Ian Bruce: The Minister has clearly done some homework on clean coal. Is the technology ready to go, assuming that a NOFFO bid was allowed and we had some response?

Mr. Battle: There are one or two rumours of interest, but no more than that. We are looking for clear proposals. I hope that proposals for clean coal technology at an affordable price can be introduced quickly.

Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): Will the Minister clarify the Government's position on the coal industry? Do they believe that the coal industry is at its optimum size? Should it be expanded, altered to include clean coal technology, or further reduced for environmental reasons?

Mr. Battle: We see a future for deep-mined coal in Britain, and we want clean coal technology as a means of ensuring that. We shall work to that end, but we inherited incredible difficulties from the previous Government.

Amendments Nos. 3 and 5 provide for the scope of the levy to be extended to new categories of electricity, but that approach differs from the approach envisaged in the Bill. I emphasise that the Bill simply amends section 33 of the Electricity Act 1989. For example, had we not acted to extend the levy to the nuclear industry from 1 April this year, as the primary nuclear contract set by that Act runs out, nuclear generators could have benefited from the resulting market distortion to the tune of £60 million to £70 million a year at the expense of customers. That is why we have placed the levy on nuclear energy, including that generated in France. The approach proposed in amendments Nos. 3 and 5 is based on the continuation of that distortion. We introduced the Bill in the first place to get rid of that.

Mr. Hammond: I accept what the Minister says, but he misrepresents amendment No. 3, which simply seeks to give the Secretary of State the power, should she wish, to extend the levy sector by sector to other types of technology, rather than extend it to all forms of electricity. How could the Secretary of State object to being given more power to act more subtly if she wants to?

Mr. Battle: I was coming to precisely that point. Perhaps I should accept no more interventions but try to answer the debate. The approach proposed in the amendments is based on the continuation of distortions. The problem with that is that support is not closely targeted on the companies that need it, nor is the amount of extra revenue that they can generate in the market tied to the amount of support that they need. In other words, such an approach would be wasteful and inefficient, and would not achieve the objectives that the hon. Gentleman suggests it would.

Our approach is better, because we are signalling, through the Bill, that one day all electricity may be leviable. We hope that green, renewable sources of electricity generation will be able to compete on equal terms with other forms of generation in the future, and I see no reason why such electricity should not then be subjected to the levy. The effect would then be that resources could be targeted closely on those renewable generators that need and deserve support, which is precisely the point made by the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean). I agree with him. The amount of support that those generators receive can be measured according to their needs. We believe that that would be a more effective way to proceed.

At present, most renewable generators cannot produce electricity at prices that are competitive on an open market. Amendment No. 4 fundamentally misunderstands how NOFFO operates. As Opposition Members who have been present throughout the Bill's proceedings know, we have spelt out the fact that the levy is paid to people who produce the electricity: it gives them the difference. Opposition Members are nodding, so we know where we stand. There is therefore no reason to give further support, as the amendment seeks to do.

Amendment No. 6 seeks to ensure that the amount of levy paid by licensed electricity suppliers stays the same or falls. That is short-sighted because we cannot predict what will come in the bids for NOFFO for renewables. The procedure is demand led. If new schemes come forward, even those set up by the previous Government, we shall not shut them down and come back to the House every time. We want renewables to be supported, which is why we have the Bill.

Mr. Hammond: The amendment does not say what the Minister says it does. It says that, if the levy is to rise, the Secretary of State must come back to the House and get that rise approved by means of a statutory instrument, subject to the approval of the House of Commons. What is wrong with that?

Mr. Battle: It is late and the hon. Gentleman was up late last night, too. He seems unable to listen. If bids 3 and 4 for the NOFFO projects come through, as they will this year, is the hon. Gentleman saying that we must come back to the House for every renewable scheme? There were hundreds of such schemes. The idea is nonsense and would hold the whole process up. I do not think that that is the intention behind the Opposition amendments. NOFFO 3 and 4 projects have yet to come on stream and, as a result, the overall amount of support could rise.

Opposition Members aired the same thoughts under different guises in Committee. Furthermore, the Bill has already passed through the other place and had a good airing there. We gave the Opposition plenty of time in the Standing Committee. Indeed, in the other place the Opposition spokesman, Lord Fraser of Carmyllie, said:

"Indeed, but for that rare aberration of political judgment by the British people on 1st May, I have no doubt that I would have been introducing this self-same Bill from the other side of the Chamber. In those circumstances, it is unnecessary for me in any way to rehearse the elaborate and detailed argument which the noble Lord usefully gave to the House in support of this measure".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 18 July 1997; Vol. 581, c. 1144-45.]

I could not agree more, and I ask the Opposition to withdraw their new clause. They have made their points, and we have taken them on board.

Question put and negatived.

Bill read the Third time, and passed, without amendment.

Sudan

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Betts.]

12.11 am

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I welcome the opportunity to raise the subject of Sudan. For many years, I have been concerned by the fact that that country has largely been ignored by the media and the world at large. More than 1.5 million Sudanese have died, and more than 4 million, in a population estimated at about 27.5 million, have been displaced. As the conflict appears to be black versus black, Arab versus black, or Muslim versus Christian, it has not caught the imagination or interest of the world.

As a guest of the National Assembly, with two others from the United Kingdom, I visited Sudan for a week in January. Our hosts treated us with great kindness and courtesy, and I met a variety of people, formally and informally.

A German who had formerly lived in Sudan and was visiting from another African country, told me that the international sanctions had forced the National Islamic Front regime to develop its own economy, with some success. In his opinion, that was in contrast to the earlier Mahdi Administration, which received lavish international aid but did little to improve the lot of the ordinary people in the Sudan.

I know that the Government support, as I do, the Intergovernmental Authority for Development process—but has the Minister found, as I did, that, as ever in a situation of conflict, the first casualty is truth? Propaganda takes over, with a bias one way or another.

Many issues could be raised. I recognise some other problems that could be examined in depth—problems that any Administration, in the Sudan or anywhere else, would have to face. The devastation of the south and the resulting shift of population means that the percentage of southerners in the Khartoum area has risen from 1 per cent. to 30 per cent.

Those displaced persons live in what is virtually a dust bowl, in shanty accommodation. Charges have been levelled that the authorities—mainly, I suspect, minor functionaries—have followed plans under which unregistered churches are demolished to make way for roads.

People have been removed to other areas and left to build their own houses. No real sanitation is provided on those estates. Schools also have been affected. The human rights committee of the National Assembly has a virtually impossible task in attempting to adjudicate on any charges.

Islamic activists have been moved into areas that are occupied by Christians who have already been displaced. Islamic activists are advised of community meetings, so that they might vote on local issues. The consequence is that the authorities can claim that they are acting at the behest of local people.

I ask the Minister whether the United Nations rapporteur for the United Nations Commission on Human Rights has updated his October 1997 report, and whether he has been free to move unrestricted in Sudan.

On a brief visit to Juba, we heard from Muslim and Christian leaders that their people had co-existed in friendly relationships, and mixed at different levels. Nevertheless, there was evidence of appalling need in that area. The National Islamic Front said that it would rebuild when the war was over. However, the decay and lack of proper infrastructure was reflected in the people's low morale and poor condition.

Is the Minister confident that all possible action is being taken to ensure that humanitarian aid is available in all areas? Is he aware, for example, that the Sudanese Administration have regularly siphoned off aid, and diverted it to soldiers or to Muslim groups that they claim are as much in need as others?

While we were in Khartoum, a Catholic Fund for Overseas Development delegation that was accompanied by the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Liverpool advised us that tools and seed that had been destined for the south had been so delayed that they could not be used when they arrived, as the time for planting and the rainy season had passed. Consequently, there was no development of the harvest. Moreover, food that was sent where it was needed had not been distributed, but was held in Government stores.

What representations have been made on the imprisonment and torture of citizens in Sudan? I discovered that the Presbyterian minister in Juba had been arrested by security police, and beaten without trial or sentence. Although allegations of illegal conduct by him were given as the reason for his arrest with others, no one was able to provide a witness. He was therefore released. I did not meet him during my visit, because he had moved out of the country, to Nairobi, to recuperate from his beatings. Such incidents are typical in Sudan.

Has there been any response to the Government's representations on the abduction of young people, who are forced into service in the defence forces? When I raised that matter with the authorities, they attempted to compare the practice with national conscription in the United Kingdom. I was happy to remind them not only that conscription in the United Kingdom no longer exists, but that, even in wartime, there is an opportunity for conscientious objectors to perform first aid or other civilian activities rather than in military operations.

I certainly do not believe that such conscription should be sustained as a way of treating fellow citizens, carrying them off into slavery. Does the Minister accept that there is evidence that such a practice continues in Sudan? Does he give any credence to the National Islamic Front Government's line that that practice is not really slavery, but a tradition among the people—that it is how they live? Such a line seemed rather far-fetched.

Conversely, I could not accept the criticism of those within and outwith Sudan who condemned groups—from Switzerland and other countries—that were concerned about the problem, and provided money to ransom slaves. How long will such practices be supported by those who do nothing either to stop them or to redeem slaves?

I found evidence of duplicity when it was claimed that the south could vote in four years for independence or for a federal Sudan. While some Christian leaders were hopeful, I formed the opinion that most Muslim leaders were determined to keep Sudan as a whole, no matter what happened, and to advance the concept of Arabisation and Islamisation.

There was certainly a pattern historically, according to some Christian leaders I met who were arguing for an independent south. A few had served in the Mahdi regime. It was the old policy of "divide and conquer", which has ever been a powerful and persuasive policy of Governments of one sort or another.

The Muslim view of an Arabisation/Islamisation of the Sudan was patent. As a result, disillusion has crept in. Hence the split between the former southern commander Kerubino Bol—a signatory to the 21 April 1997 peace agreement—and the Government. He appears now to have allied himself to the leader of the Sudanese People's Liberation Army, John Garang.

This surfaced while we were there. News broke of rebel troops surrendering in Wau, the third main city. For my benefit, Muslim leaders assured me that—unlike those in Northern Ireland, where we were arguing for the handing over of weapons and decommissioning—they were kind-hearted, and were allowing people who were coming over to their side to maintain their weapons as a sign of good faith.

A few weeks ago, I discovered here in Westminster, from other sources, that some old weapons had apparently been handed over for new. Sudanese representatives, however, advise me now that this was a Trojan horse group. At least, several hundred of them—armed with modern, in the Sudanese view, largely Soviet-block assault weapons—co-operated with an SPLA attack. They alleged that they had been led by Commander Kerubino, who is currently missing. He was a Dinka, who had had a disagreement with Riek Machar, a Nuer. Machar, as the Minister will know, is the appointed chairman of the southern executive, not elected by the people but appointed by the regime.

After initial success in the centre of the city of Wau—having taken over some strategic places—the rebels were ultimately repulsed, but still hold the outskirts of the town. Because of the link with the Dinka leader, the Dinka civilian population were attacked savagely by Government forces. Has the Minister any recent news of developments in that regard?

Significantly, Wau was the centre where, according to a United States report, Iraq helped Sudan to develop chamical warfare capabilities in the mid-1990s. I know that, in a Question Time relating to Iraq, the Foreign Secretary had no evidence of that. Will the Minister now say whether there is any fresh evidence? On that occasion, the Foreign Secretary said that he would inquire into it.

What representation has been made concerning attacks on civilian targets? Will the United Nations, which seems divided on many matters, now seek to implement UN resolutions? Sometimes, as in the House, resolutions are made without much resolution. In particular, will the UN implement a no-fly zone, as in southern Iraq, to diminish NIF capacity to wage war against its own people by bombing them?

In the regrettable plane crash in which Lieutenant-General El Zubei Mohammed Salih lost his life with six others, one of those killed was Arok Thon Arok, a southern leader who had signed the agreement with Riek Machar. At the public mourning, Dr. Hassan al Turabi, the ideological leader of the Islamic regime, announced, according to The Guardian of 19 February, that Arok Thon Arok was a last-minute convert to Islam. The news was greeted with triumphant shouts from several thousand mourners: Islamisation even in death.

[Rev. Martin Smyth]

The reality was different. Six bodies were laid out in white winding sheets, each covered by the national flag. Arok Thon Arok's corpse, in a coffin, was finally released to his family, after some debate, for a Christian burial. In our modern world, with its emphasis on pluralism, people must be given true liberty within the law—we understand that Sharia law was not to be extended to the Christian and Animist communities—to follow their religious and political convictions. I believe that that is Her Majesty's Government's position. Should not Sudan share that policy with the free world?

I express my appreciation and gratitude to our ambassador and the embassy staff in Khartoum, who were very helpful in arranging meetings.

12.26 am

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tony Lloyd): I congratulate the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) on securing this debate. I know that he has been a Sudan watcher over many years, and I place on the record my appreciation of the measured way in which he introduced the debate. I will try to answer his specific questions, but there are one or two matters on which I will not comment tonight, simply because I cannot give an answer. I will reflect on the debate in the cool light of day—which will be sooner than we had expected—and write to him.

Sudan is a troubled country, racked by civil war, divided against itself. Much of the south has taken up arms against the Government in Khartoum and the north. In the 14 years of bitter fighting, the conflict has become more than simply north against south, if indeed that was ever a realistic description.

The conflict has been complicated by tribal and other divisions among the southerners, some of whom, as the hon. Gentleman said, are Christian, while some are Muslim and others Animist. The Sudanese People's Liberation Army has been active for many years in the south, but it has now joined the parties of the democratically elected Government who were overthrown in the 1989 coup to form the National Democratic Alliance, under which umbrella the conflict has spread to the east of the country.

As the hon. Gentleman said, Britain is one of a number of countries seeking to help to bring this sad state of affairs to an end. While those efforts continue, our policy towards Sudan reflects our concerns about human rights abuses in both the north and the south of the country, with the Sudanese Government's refusal to countenance multi-party democracy.

We are also concerned about the aggressive way in which the Sudanese Government have pursued the civil war, and about their involvement with terrorist groups and regional insurgencies that threaten Sudan's neighbours—in particular, their support for the Lord's Resistance Army, a brutal organisation that is responsible for killings, abductions, lootings and even, almost certainly, the sexual exploitation of children in northern and western Uganda.

The Government and civil society in this country have in no sense abandoned Sudan. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we maintain the embassy in Khartoum, and I was delighted to hear his congratulatory remarks about the role of the ambassador. A senior official from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office visited Sudan in July 1997 for discussions with representatives both of and against the Sudanese Government.

We keep open links with the Sudanese opposition. During the last seven months of 1997, the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett), met the former Prime Minister, Sadiq al Mahdi and the NDA leader, Muhammed Osman al Mirghani, as well as the Sudanese ambassador.

A series of meetings in 1994 and 1995 appeared to be making progress. In May 1994, IGAD adopted a declaration of principles, which includes the right of self-determination for all Sudanese people, and the separation, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned, of religion and state for the settlement of the conflict. We supported that process, but it ground to a halt in May 1995 in the face of the Sudanese Government's rejection of the declaration. The Friends of IGAD and, more recently, the IGAD partners forum that replaced it, continued to encourage the IGAD process.

Military pressure from rebel groups and diplomatic pressure from outside persuaded the Sudanese Government to resume the IGAD process on the basis of the declaration of principles. The first round was held in Kenya in October and November last year. The next round will be in April, with further contacts after that.

We believe that the regional approach offers the best chance of the comprehensive settlement to the conflict that the people of Sudan need and deserve so much. I say "comprehensive settlement" because the conflict in Sudan is more than a question of north versus south. A number of Sudan's ethnic groups have joined the struggle against Khartoum. The plight of the Nuba people was recently highlighted by Africa Rights, a non-governmental organisation. Many of the Beja in the east have joined the opposition through the Beja Congress. A settlement that did not take account of their interests would not be acceptable. We therefore continue actively to support the IGAD process.

We support the process both in public and in private. My hon. Friend the Minister of State made clear our welcome for the renewed talks on 30 September. We were a party to the EU statement of welcome and encouragement at the start of the talks. We have been in touch with all parties, urging them to approach the talks constructively and in good faith.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the recent fighting in the south of Sudan, and asked whether I had any recent news of it. As he said, it has reportedly been taking place in several areas. We know of reports of it in the Wau area. It is unclear who is winning, but it is clear that the cost of fighting has been further human suffering. As always, the innocent bear as much of the brunt as those directly involved.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Sudanese chemical warfare capabilities, and drew attention to his exchange with my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and to the recent United States report claiming that Iraq had helped Sudan to develop such capabilities. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office cannot validate those reports, and is not aware of any fresh or substantiated evidence on the matter.

The hon. Gentleman raised the important question of human rights. I, too, have been a Sudan watcher over many years, and the human rights situation in Sudan continues to give serious concern. Increased respect for human rights in Sudan is a centrepiece of our policy. We want a peaceful, democratic Sudan, where the human rights of all citizens are equally respected. I endorse the hon. Gentleman's demand for pluralism in Sudan. We recognise pluralism in our country, and support it in all countries.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Does the Minister agree that people purporting to be Christian rebels have also been guilty of some violations of human rights?

Mr. Lloyd: With the hon. Gentleman, we deplore the abuse of human rights from whatever quarter. Human rights are indivisible: they cannot be partial or arbitrarily based.

In that context, the UK was active in securing the passage of resolutions highly critical of Sudan at the UN General Assembly in each year between 1992 and 1997, and in getting agreement at the UN Commission on Human Rights to the appointment of the special rapporteur. The rapporteur's most recent report—October 1997—expresses deep concern about the serious, widespread and continuing human rights violations in Sudan. The update of that report has yet to be issued, but we believe that it is due any day now. As far as we are aware, there has been no change in respect of the special rapporteur's freedom of movement.

One of the hon. Gentleman's specific human rights concerns involved the practice of the Government of Sudan of conscripting secondary school children. Her Majesty's Government have expressed their deep concern about that practice to the Government of Sudan, who defended themselves, claiming that every country in the world has conscription, and that defence of one's country is a national duty. We shall continue to monitor the situation, and will raise the matter again if evidence of its continuation emerges.

Human rights work constitutes a major part of the work of the embassy in Khartoum. Staff there raise specific cases with the Sudanese authorities, and make use of their contacts to urge greater respect for human rights. For example, our ambassador has raised recent church destructions with the National Islamic Front leader, Dr. Hassan al Turabi.

With regard to the hon. Gentleman's points about abductions, we unconditionally condemn all forms of slavery. Even if that is not Government policy, as the Government of Sudan claim, they are at least morally responsible, and we hold them accountable to suppress the practice.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the ability of aid to reach all quarters. There are difficulties in getting aid throughout the length and breadth of Sudan—that is a matter of practical fact. However, we continue to put pressure on the Sudanese Government to ensure that it gets through as widely as possible. Since January 1991, we have committed more than £137 million to Sudan, including our share of EU assistance for humanitarian aid. Last year, we gave more than £3 million in food aid to various parts of Sudan, and we recently announced a pledge of £4 million for emergency food and non-food aid in support of the UN consolidated appeal.

The issue of sanctions and embargoes against Sudan allowed the hon. Gentleman to propose an interesting alternative to existing measures. We will look at any proposal for further UN sanctions on its own merits and in the light of non-compliance by the Government of Sudan.

I have been unable to respond to several of the hon. Gentlemen's points, but I should like to conclude by saying that we are with him in our concern that the people of Sudan are the ones who have suffered during the long years of the civil war. We and all the friends of Sudan are doing all we can to bring the suffering of those proud and decent people to an end. That must be the resolve of the House, the Government and the world community. However, the responsibility now lies with the Government of Sudan, and we all hold them accountable to ensure that they play a part in that task.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-three minutes to One o'clock.

Local Authority Debt Repayment

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Clelland.]

9.34 am

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): I am grateful for this opportunity to initiate a debate on an important, if rather abstruse, issue of local government finance. Just the name of capital financing adjustment seems to lead to people's eyes glazing over and their turning quickly to another matter. However, it is important that we consider the issue. It is particularly important that the Minister should hear the views of hon. Members on this important element of capital financing for local authorities.

The issue sounds dull and complex. Sadly, little attention has been paid to it. It is fortuitous that this debate is taking place only one day after a debate on the hidden tax increases that the new Government have already introduced. For my constituents—and all the residents of the borough of Trafford—this is yet another hidden tax. The Government's changes to the calculation of the capital financing adjustment will mean a tax increase for millions of people throughout the United Kingdom.

Like many of the Government's changes, those changes have been introduced by stealth, taking funds away from Trafford and many other local authorities. Perhaps worse than that, not only have the Government taken funds from authorities that have traditionally been prudently managed, but they have transferred them to some of the most profligate and ill-managed authorities in the country.

Trafford councillors are appalled as much by the way in which the new charge has been sneaked into place as by the financial penalty that is being imposed on them. The complexity of the matter is being used to cover the Government's tracks. That tactic has also been used for the introduction of the £5 billion annual pension tax through a technical adjustment that was little understood at the time. The same approach to taxation was shown by the Government's shift to quarterly payment of corporation tax. At the time, it was portrayed as a benefit for business, but it will be a £22 billion cash flow cost for businesses during this Parliament.

During this short debate, I hope to shed a little light on the complex matter under consideration and to attempt a simple explanation of the impact of the Government's changes. The previous Government calculated the capital finance standard spending assessment on the basis of a notional 1990 debt level. That rewarded councils that had behaved thriftily and responsibly during the 1980s—councils such as Trafford, which had benefited from good Conservative administration through the 1980s. Indeed, Trafford had benefited from Conservative administration from its inception in 1974 until the tragic events of a couple of years ago, which, I trust, will be only a brief interlude of insanity for the borough.

The Government's new system adopts a different approach, taking into account the higher of either notional or actual debt in calculating the capital finance SSA. That reallocates the given cake that is available to favour profligate authorities—very often, it hardly needs to be said, Labour authorities—at the expense of those that have been better managed. Many of the councils benefiting from the change are those that flouted public spending controls in the 1980s, often through creative accounting techniques that have since been made illegal.

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): Such as?

Mr. Brady: If the hon. Gentleman is patient, he will hear some examples. I know that he does not expect to be disappointed.

The history of the capital financing adjustment is like a trip through an old Labour theme park. From newspaper reports from the 1980s, I have found a series of examples, which the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) has asked for. The Times of 24 June 1987 stated:

"Local ratepayers could face a 35% increase to finance creative accountancy debts: unions in Manchester fear 16,000 council workers may have to be dismissed",

and

"David Blunkett admits that his authority's capital programme stands to be 'devastated'".

That was at a time when Manchester city council raised £200 million by selling civic buildings, including the central library, to a company that it wholly owned, and arranged a two-year rent holiday. Similar tactics were used in Brent and Lambeth. Some of the perpetrators of such scandalous abuses are now members of the Government; others sit on the Government Back Benches—although I do not see any present for this debate.

Labour claims to have changed, but in office, stealthy changes to the capital finance system for local authorities are often portrayed as technical changes, which people will not understand or notice. Changes are being introduced in a quiet, cautious way, with no fanfare or announcement of the impact that they will have. Such changes are rewarding old friends and punishing well-managed authorities.

My borough of Trafford will lose £700,000 from its SSA. That equates to the cost of 28 teachers, whom the borough could otherwise have employed. It amounts to the funding of two primary schools for a year. It could have been used to reduce each council tax bill by £10.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): Is my hon. Friend aware that, in West Sussex, the result of fiddling with the formula is a £2 million reduction in our central Government grant, which is equivalent to a rise of 1.5 per cent. in council tax?

Mr. Brady: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing that to my attention. It is by no means an isolated incident. The change in capital financing has shifted funds from prudent authorities, from authorities that have borrowed sensibly or not at all, to authorities that indulged in very high levels of borrowing before April 1990. Such a perverse policy rewards activities, policies and management techniques in local government that any Government would say they wish to avoid. The Minister must therefore explain why his Government feel it appropriate to reward authorities that have behaved badly at the expense of those that have behaved well.

The reduction in Trafford's SSA is equivalent to the cost of 350 secondary school places, which could otherwise have been provided. That is particularly relevant in Trafford, because our excellent local schools are so popular that they should be given funds to expand, and not be deprived of the funds that they need. The loss of £700,000 combines with other factors in this year's SSA settlement to mean a real-terms cut of £3 million. That will mean higher taxes, together with lower service levels. The same pattern is being repeated across the country as local authority budgets are fixed for the coming year.

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that, until 1 May, all local authorities were given lots of money and that the activities that he is describing have occurred only since 1 May? Many of us were in local government for a long time and experienced the previous Government's restrictions on local authority capital financing, which were far worse than anything that the hon. Gentleman is describing. He ought to be addressing the previous Government.

Mr. Brady: We would all be delighted with more resources in national and local government, in order to provide services. Such resources must be divided fairly, in an understandable way, which rewards and is seen to reward good, not bad practice.

Mr. McNulty: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brady: No, I am dealing with the previous point. My contention, which the Minister must answer, is that the Government's policy on changing the way in which the capital financing adjustment is calculated effectively rewards bad practice and penalises good practice.

The overall loss to well-managed authorities will be significant. The loss of about £50 million in the shire counties compounds the sense that they are being penalised, often at the expense of cities. The example of Trafford illustrates that the change is not simply a raid on shire counties. The policy also penalises metropolitan boroughs that have been better managed.

The worst thing about the policy change is not its day-to-day effect or its effect on particular local authorities—it is the principle that the Government are setting out as a guide for local authority practice. The message of the policy is that the Government intend to reward and encourage bad management, profligacy and waste, and to punish good, thrifty councils.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brady: I am coming to a conclusion; I shall not give way.

If Labour has changed, it must review the decision and reverse the policy. I urge the Minister to address that.

9.45 am

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in the debate. I had not intended to do so, but, given the remarks of the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady), I felt it necessary to spell out some of the thinking in Labour-controlled local authorities during the 1980s and to support the steps that the Government are taking.

The hon. Gentleman is quite right that local government financing is extremely abstruse. I and many of my colleagues wrestled with it in the 1980s and the early 1990s, so we know very well that, when spending allocations were fixed around some notional figure, strange anomalies sometimes arose. One found that spending programmes were moved between revenue and capital purely because of the availability of finance and not necessarily because that was the best way of financing or because the projects concerned were top priorities.

Underlying what the hon. Gentleman said, I detected a desire to draw distinctions between good and bad local authorities, and the implication that the good ones were Conservative and the bad ones Labour. That is the complete opposite of the truth. If Conservative authorities had been so good, more might have been left. Conservatives lost profoundly at the ballot box, which, in any democracy, is the ultimate test.

Mr. Brady: I am sure that the hon. Lady is well aware that, over the years, many factors have resulted in certain changes in local authority control. One of the principal factors in recent years was that the Conservative Government had become unpopular. There is no question about that, and we are well aware of it. Even though that happened, the borough of Trafford remained under Conservative control from 1974, when it was set up, until 1995. The Labour party has only a very tenuous grip on it, and should wisely consider some of the specific examples that I quoted.

Ms Keeble: That was a speech, not an intervention. The reason why people supported Labour-controlled local authorities in the 1980s and the 1990s when, I admit, some of us made mistakes, was that we were overwhelmingly seen to be supporting the communities that we represented. People supported us because we had that link. As leader of an inner-London authority, I had to grapple with supporting and protecting communities against the appalling scandals of Tory economic policy and the impact that it had.

During all the Tory years, male unemployment in the ward that I represented was about 35 per cent., and unemployment among women was so high that I think that it would have been virtually impossible to calculate. Local shops closed down not because of lack of trade but because people in the community did not have enough money in their pockets to be able to buy enough to keep the shops open. There was low income and unemployment. Whole communities were discarded by the Tory Government as being unworthy of, for example, job creation schemes. Disadvantages were not tackled. Such communities were deemed unworthy of programmes that could deal with disadvantages of race, sex and disability.

Labour councils had to pick up the tab for protecting the communities that Tory central Government had discarded. In Southwark, we used to call the Tory Government the "shower across the water". It was apparent what was happening. In examining our management of local finances, we had to bear certain things in mind. My council was much criticised by the shower across the water—I was going to say "you lot", but I thought that I might get into trouble.

Most local councils look to maximise spending on local services, because they are the only services that people will get. Labour councils offered the only lifeline out of poverty and unemployment. By reorganising their operations, most Labour councils sought to maximise spending on services and not on bureaucracy.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk): The hon. Lady is obviously concerned that Southwark should have enough money to spend on services. Does she share the concern expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) about the effects of the change to the capital financing adjustment? In Southwark, the standard spending assessment for next year will be reduced by £860,000 as a direct result of that change. Does the hon. Lady believe that that will help the voters about whom she is so concerned?

Ms Keeble: I do not represent any of the Southwark constituencies, so it is difficult to comment on the details of those figures. I am talking about the council's history and how we have arrived at our present position. In that context, I am explaining why the Government are taking the right decisions. The council sought to maximise expenditure on services, which meant that the money spent—be it revenue or capital—was geared directly to ensuring maximum service provision.

Mr. Tony Colman (Putney): Does my hon. Friend agree that all debt entered into during the 18 years of Tory central control was approved by the then Department of the Environment? Local authorities could not go it alone: their debt was always fully approved by the Tory Government of the day.

Ms Keeble: Exactly. I thank my hon. Friend for that comment, which brings me to my next point—and if the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West objects, I shall certainly give way.

Southwark council was aware that, despite opposition to Conservative policies on local government finance, we had an obligation to operate within the law and to ensure that we made sound financial arrangements for local services upon which the community relied. That is why we adopted both capital and revenue spending regimes that were not always incredibly helpful: we had to live within them in order to ensure that services were not disrupted by intervention from central Government via the Department of the Environment. That is why my hon. Friend's point is so important.

Mr. Brady: I am keen to reply to that specific point. It takes no account of the case that I made regarding some of the creative accounting techniques used. A key problem in the 1980s was not the levels of debt authorised by the Department of the Environment, but the mechanisms that local authorities sometimes used to avoid those controls.

Ms Keeble: I am sure that those creative accounting techniques have no bearing on the changes that we are discussing today. The most scandalous accounting—I shall not call it creative accounting—was practised by Westminster council. Southwark council examined the local government spending rules and worked out how we could use those rules—completely within the law and approved by the Department of the Environment, as my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Colman) said—to maximise spending on the local services on which our community relied.

That brings me to a matter which I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will mention. The experience of those years left me—and probably most my colleagues—in absolutely no doubt that the rules for local government spending were abstruse and chaotic and urgently needed reform. Both the revenue and capital rules should match closely the needs of the area, so that SSA calculations are not based on the nonsense of hotel nights, and so on. Capital should reflect expenditure. It should be calculated in such a way that money allocated may be spent on capital projects, such as schools, and is not allocated to different forms of notional spending that would ultimately skew the way in which the money is spent.

I had to wrestle with those problems for eight years, and for three years as leader of Southwark council. I am extremely pleased that the Government are considering ways of changing both revenue spending and capital spending to ensure that they provide a good, sound basis for service provision. I am absolutely delighted that, through some other departmental and job creation programmes, the Government are addressing some of the employment issues that were such a problem for the council. That will automatically ease the serious pressures on council revenue spending with which I and many of my colleagues have wrestled in the past.

9.56 am

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) on the way in which he introduced the debate. He put his finger on a complicated matter which has a great effect across the country, particularly in councils such as Trafford and Tewkesbury. I thank my hon. Friend for bringing the issue to the attention of the House.

The information that I shall use in my brief contribution was provided by the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford), a short time ago by way of a written answer. I am grateful for his assistance. When I examined the settlement in Tewkesbury, I found that the council faces a 5.1 per cent. reduction in its standard spending assessment. I found that quite odd, so I examined the situation more closely—the Minister was kind enough to provide the details—and I discovered that, if national totals had been taken into account, Tewkesbury would have received an increase of 0.8 per cent. If demographic changes in Tewkesbury had been taken into account, it would have had an increase of a further 0.6 per cent. However, the method of distribution would have meant a loss of 6.5 per cent.

Because of the changes, the net reduction in Tewkesbury is 5.1 per cent. I am told that changes in the composition of the indices in the all other services block and changes in the treatment of debt are responsible for that. That seems rather unfair. Tewkesbury does not have any debt, and that seems to have cost it dearly. My office contacted Tewkesbury's finance section yesterday, which agreed that the settlement was unfair. The council said that it might not have paid off its debts if it had known that the new system would be introduced. I am sure that many councils will be encouraged to take on more debt, in the knowledge that the Government will bail them out. The Government seem to have created a rather odd system that will encourage debt, which must lead to a reduction in council services throughout the country.

Mr. Colman: Will the hon. Gentleman join me, as a Member of Parliament with a Tory-controlled council—Wandsworth—which has reduced its services, in condemning Tory Wandsworth for sitting on more than £30 million of balances and refusing to pass a Labour group proposal for a lower council tax of £295, when it has been affected in a similar way to the hon. Gentleman's council?

Mr. Robertson: I will certainly not join the hon. Gentleman in condemning any council. I am not making that point, and I do not have the knowledge to speak about Wandsworth, although I understand that it has held a responsible level of council tax, community charge or rates for many years.

If a council increases its debt, the voters in the area should, unfortunately, have to pay for it until the next opportunity to kick out that council. I do not see why people in Tewkesbury, which has incurred no debt, should have their grant reduced simply to pay for the sort of councils that my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West discussed.

Ms Keeble: Can the hon. Gentleman relate figures for finances to the services provided? People are extremely interested in what they get for their money. In particular, could he say what his county council is doing about some of the services that are most important to local people, for example, nurseries?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Lady may recall that I asked a question of the Secretary of State for Education and Employment about Gloucestershire county council. Mistakenly, the right hon. Gentleman assumed that it was under Conservative control and condemned it for its nursery policy. In fact, for many years, it was controlled by the Liberal Democrats, so he got that wrong. He also got another aspect wrong, as the Labour group on the council has tried to deny passported money going to schools, and it is going to the schools only because of the Conservative group on the council. Therefore, perhaps the hon. Lady ought to look a little more closely at the matter than the Secretary of State did on that occasion.

To return to the reply that the Under-Secretary was kind enough to give me, it seems that the reduction in total of revenue support grant and redistributed non-domestic rates in Tewkesbury exceeds the reduction in the SSA. The hon. Gentleman informed me that that follows changes to the SSA system and, crucially—this will come across to council tax payers in the near future—one of the causes of the change has been a shift in the cost of local authority services from central Government to council tax payers. With the new change, it seems that the cost has been shifted only to certain council tax payers—in other words, those in prudent authorities and not those who live in the sort of authorities that my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West so eloquently described.

10.1 am

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me rather earlier than I had expected. That gives me the chance first to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) on what everyone present would recognise as a speech impressive in its command of a complex subject, eloquent in its trenchant denunciation of the extraordinary change that the Government have made in the capital financing adjustment this year and powerful in its conclusions, to which I will return.

The debate is important because we are just beginning to see the consequences of the changes to the capital financing adjustment and timely because those changes will become apparent to council tax payers throughout the country in the next few weeks as demands hit mats. Although change in the capital financing adjustment is a complex issue, the consequences of that change are fairly simple and I shall concentrate on them. The effects of that change, and a number of other changes in the way in which SSAs are calculated, are beginning to be revealed in a series of record increases in council tax. In the next five or six weeks, council tax increases in a large number of authorities will be higher than any increase since the system was introduced.

Mr. White: In the 1996 Conservative Government's Budget, it was stated that council taxes for last year and this would be raised far higher than inflation, to shift the balance back to local tax payers. That was the your Government's policy, but you seem to have forgotten that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I must remind the hon. Member that I was not a part of any Government.

Mr. Yeo: I am glad that the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Mr. White) raised that point, as I intend to come directly to it. The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions has confirmed that, had the Conservative party remained in power, the average rise in council tax would have been significantly less than the rise that results directly from the Labour Government's decisions. We have him on record in the House saying so, and I shall quote the relevant section of Hansard in a moment. This year will be notable for record increases in council tax and, unfortunately, for reasons that I shall explain, it may not be the last year in which we have such increases.

I was surprised by the speech of the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble), who spoke of her experience in Southwark. Given the record of that borough, frankly, I would rather have kept quiet in the House about my involvement.

Ms Keeble: As I said, all of us have made mistakes. However, is the hon. Gentleman aware that Southwark was the only council that froze the poll tax for the whole three years that it was in existence?

Mr. Yeo: I am afraid that we are not debating the poll tax and it was not even directly the cause of the Conservative defeat at the election last year, since it was abolished before the previous election, which the Conservative party won. It is difficult to see how one can relate that tax to the change in the capital financing adjustment, which is the subject under debate. The hon. Lady referred to Southwark at some length and, given the borough's record, I should have thought it wiser to keep quiet about any connection with it, had I had any such connection—I am glad to say that I do not.

If the hon. Lady had troubled to inquire about the subject that we are debating, she would have found that Southwark has lost £862,000 of SSA directly as a result of the change. Like many other inner London boroughs, it has suffered badly in the SSA calculations this year because the Government and the Labour party are so consumed with envy at the outstanding success of Westminster and Wandsworth they have deliberately fiddled the formula to attack Westminster and, unfortunately, have swept up a lot of other inner London boroughs as well. I hope that, after they have seen enormous rises in council tax in London, that point will not be lost on voters in inner London on 7 May.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): It is not merely the London borough of Westminster that has lost out in the settlement. One of the other changes in the formula has been the adjustment to the bed nights, which has cost many coastal resort local authorities and areas that receive visitors a great deal in their SSA this year—something which the Minister, in a recent debate, agreed to reconsider for next year. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will re-emphasise that. The restoration of the special recognition of the extra costs of being a tourist area, such as providing more public conveniences, car parks and leisure facilities, would be welcome. The loss of that recognition has also cost council tax payers dear.

Mr. Yeo: The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to that matter. I confess to having some sneaking sympathy for the Minister. Dividing up the cake among the local authorities is a problem for any Government. They will never produce a formula that will satisfy every local authority or even every group of authorities, because they have directly competing interests in this matter. Whatever the size of the overall cake, some will be disappointed.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West rightly pointed out, the problem about those changes is that they seem to have been motivated by a desire to penalise authorities that have been acting responsibly. Southwark has lost out, and I hope that the former voters in Southwark of the hon. Member for Northampton, North will be aware of that. Northamptonshire county council has also lost badly as a result of the change, and I am sure that her voters will be interested in the enthusiasm with which she supported the Government's decision to make the change when it has clearly penalised them so directly.

The consequence of the changes is a huge rise in council tax. Throughout the country, council tax payers and service users are starting to learn exactly what it means to have a Labour Government at Westminster. It is clear, even before next week's Budget, that Britain cannot afford a Labour Government.

The capital finance adjustment and the other changes to the calculation of SSAs will result in an increase in council tax in Devonshire of 19 per cent., in Northumberland of just under 18 per cent., in Cheshire of 17 per cent. and in Norfolk of nearly 16 per cent. I could name several other councils that face equally formidable increases. For example, Gloucestershire, which includes the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson), faces an increase of almost 11 per cent.

Mr. Andrew Reed (Loughborough): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the standard spending assessment is a complex issue? Last year, under a Conservative Government, my local authority of Charnwood—of which I was then a member—faced a 12 per cent. increase because of the changes in the SSA, despite the fact that it raised its spending only in line with inflation. Does he accept that, because the SSA is so complex, there will always be such variances?

Mr. Yeo: As I said in response to an earlier intervention, I recognise that any change in the SSA formula is likely to produce losers as well as winners, which is a matter of concern to those authorities and residents that are affected. Our concern is whether the capital financing adjustment is justified, why it was made and what its consequences will be.

The effects of the change are by no means confined to the shire counties that I mentioned. In Wakefield, for example, the increase in council tax will be nearly 12 per cent. and in South Tyneside it will be nearly 10 per cent. Even in London, where there will be elections on 7 May, there will be substantial increases—Hillingdon, for example, faces an increase of 12 per cent.

Mr. Gibb: Is my hon. Friend aware that none of those figures take into account the consequences of the Government's decision to end dividend tax credits paid into pensions funds, which means that there are further increases in the pipeline? The county council in West Sussex, which covers my constituency, is £4 million a year short because of that measure, which is equivalent to a further 3 per cent. rise in the council tax.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend makes a most important point, to which the House will soon want to return, especially when, in the next few months, the results of the actuarial valuation are published. The Government have been waiting for those results to establish what action should be taken to deal with the huge burden that has been placed on all employers, particularly local authorities.

The pensions tax will lead directly to substantial increases in council tax or to substantial cuts in services unless the Government give an unequivocal assurance that the full amount of any shortfall—any additional employer's contribution that councils will have to make—will be covered by an increase in the SSA. The Government have refused to give such an assurance, which is extraordinary, as the more prudent councils may want to start taking into account that huge new burden in their longer-term spending plans. Without that assurance, they may find it necessary in the next budget round to start planning substantial service cuts or even more swingeing increases to the council tax.

Mr. Colman: I declare an interest as the chair of the United Kingdom standing committee on local authority superannuation funds. The average funding is just over 90 per cent. of the full funding level. For a number of local authorities, it is significantly higher—way above 100 per cent. The main reason why the figure is 90 per cent. is that, in 1990, the previous Government asked for a reduction in funding levels to 75 per cent. to pay for the implementation of the poll tax.

[Mr. Colman]

Mr. Yeo: The hon. Gentleman emphasises the gravity of the situation. If he is concerned that the funding level is inadequate, how can he support a tax that makes the position very much worse? He has made the case for the Opposition more eloquently than anyone has before. It is precisely because there is concern about funding levels in local authority pension funds that it is a disaster for the Government to refuse to give the assurance that the councils need.

Council tax payers in the various types of authority will face increases—if I had time, I could give a much longer list. The local authorities that I mentioned have one factor in common: they have all suffered as a result of the Government's decision to change the treatment of local authority debt that was incurred before 1990—in other words, to change the capital financing adjustment.

Mr. Colman: The constituency that I represent is covered by Wandsworth local authority, which has also "suffered"—to use the hon. Gentleman's word—because of the change. Will he join me in condemning the fact that Wandsworth has refused to reduce its council tax to the level that the Labour group wanted—£295—despite the fact that it was able to build up a balance of £30 million through the Tory years of special treatment?

Mr. Yeo: I am happy to debate with the hon. Gentleman—all day, if necessary—the merits of the London borough of Wandsworth, which is an absolutely outstanding example of how to run a local council. It is a byword for efficiency, innovation, satisfactory service and value for money, as the residents have shown by continuing to return a Conservative majority.

I had the pleasure of visiting Wandsworth the other day; it was the same day that I happened to visit Hampstead, in the London borough of Camden. In Wandsworth, I was told how public libraries were to be open on Sundays; in Hampstead, I was told that public libraries were closing—they were closed not only on Sundays, but on every day. That is the difference between an authority that embraces the opportunities of partnership with the private sector and is determined to continue increasing value for money and the quality of its services, and one that sits back and adopts the old socialist local government nostrums, which have been tried and which have failed so many times.

Mr. Brady: I was intrigued by my hon. Friend's mention of libraries. He may be interested to note that, in my constituency, the borough of Trafford, which is now under Labour control, has recently decided to close three public libraries. The Government are supposed to be championing literacy, but they are taking away money from the borough.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend makes a most important point. That is another example of how the Government like to say one thing when their actions cause the opposite result. We have seen that time and again.

Each of the authorities that I have mentioned have suffered as a result of the change to the capital financing adjustment. On 2 December, in the statement on the revenue support grant settlement for next year, the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions confirmed—it can be found at column 161 in Hansard—that the council tax rise should be 7 per cent. if the Government continued to use the Conservative Government's figures and estimates on public spending. By the time that the Secretary of State and his fellow Ministers had finished fiddling the formula, many local authorities faced increases of double that amount—some of the ones that I have mentioned face increases substantially more than that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West rightly described the changes in the capital financing adjustment as a stealthy and hidden way of taxing people. As he pointed out, the effect of the change is to penalise local authorities that have chosen to repay their debts rather than to spend more money. That is a legitimate choice—many people would call it prudent. It certainly should not lead to council tax payers being penalised by a funding fiddle and a distortion of the formula.

Let us consider Hampshire county council, whose SSA was cut by more than £3 million as a result of the change. Not surprisingly, on 2 January, the council wrote to an official at the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions about the change. It says in paragraph 14.1—in case the Minister's officials happen to have one to hand for his benefit:

> "Hampshire County Council considers the change to the 1990 debt indicator in the Capital Financing SSA a retrograde and unfair amendment to SSAs. It effectively transfers support from councils who prudently used capital receipts to reduce debt to those who used them to increase their capital programmes. Whilst this was a perfectly legitimate decision to take, it should not result in higher SSA. This breaches the fundamental principle that SSA distribution should not be influenced by the spending decisions of individual councils . . . councils like ours are being unfairly penalised for their prudent policies."

My fear, which I think may be shared by my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury, as well as by my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West, is that the change has been made not for reasons of need or because a careful study has been made of the relative levels of deprivation in one authority as compared with another, not because there has been some move of population, not even because the Government have reconsidered what kind of facilities are needed in places such as holiday resorts on the south coast, but purely for political reasons.

It is mostly—not all, I accept—Conservative local authorities that prudently repaid their debt, so it is mostly Conservative local authorities that suffer under the change. The trouble is that, whichever party controls the local authority affected by the change, it is the people who live in that area who suffer and will have to pay higher council tax, and will find that local authority services in their borough, district or county are reduced.

As the change rewards authorities that were high spenders, people are likely to suffer even more in the future. Councils can read signals as well as hon. Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale,

West was right to draw attention to this point. The Government are encouraging spendthrift councils and penalising prudent councils.

Ms Keeble: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman regards the measure as unfair. Surely, if councils do not have capital spend because they have repaid debt, they do not need recognition of the impact of their capital spend on revenue budgets. Surely it is right that the Government should take cognisance of the impact of capital programmes that were approved by the Department of the Environment on revenue budgets. Otherwise, revenue budgets, especially for road improvements, get clogged up by the servicing of debts.

Mr. Yeo: The difference between us is simply that the Conservative party has a different approach. We believe that, if a council can see ways of saving money on behalf of its taxpayers, it should be encouraged to do so, not discouraged from doing so. That is why we structured the SSA calculation to give that encouragement. That is why I find the change so alarming, not just for this year—although it is bad enough for this year—but for future years. If councils are told, "Don't worry. Don't bother to do anything prudent. Don't say that you believe in saving or investment but just go ahead and be as extravagant as you want," that is what some councils will do. Not all councils will do so. Councils under Conservative control—too few at present, but about to increase in number, I am sure—are unlikely to respond to that signal, but other councils may do so. That is what is so worrying. People in those areas will suffer.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): I apologise to you and the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I cannot be here for the whole of this debate.

The point that my hon. Friend makes is a good one. Does he recognise that the authorities that underspent on capital in respect of debt interest payments in relation to the SSA, such as mine in Cambridgeshire, were able to use that excess headroom to support service provision elsewhere? Is there not a corollary that those who were spending on debt interest over and above the SSA ought not to be bailed out so that they do not suffer the income detriment?

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend has put his finger on an important point which goes to the heart of the matter. I agree with what he says. I am glad that he has drawn attention to the record of his authority. Hon. Members on both sides of the House ought to be aware of the consequences of the change now and in the longer term for their local authorities and the people who live there.

On a number of matters, the Government have been at pains to lay great stress on the importance of consultation. I pay tribute to the volume of consultation papers coming out of the Minister's Department in recent weeks. I believe that we shall be getting some more on such alluring subjects as whether the Minister will honour the Government's election pledge to end crude and universal capping. We await that one with great interest. I hope that it will give some explicit answers, perhaps more explicit than the recent paper on best value, which left unanswered almost as many questions as it dealt with. If the Minister would like to give us any hints of what will be in the paper on capping, it would be riveting information for those of us who have troubled to come along for today's debate. Everyone in the House has an intense interest in the financing of local government. It is not a particularly fascinating debate for those who do not have an interest, but we should like a clue about what is coming up on capping.

The Government have laid great stress on consultation. That is why I was surprised to read in the letter from Hampshire county council, to which I have already referred, in paragraph 14.3:

> "It was not the subject of consultation with the Local Government Association in this year's SSA SubGroup meetings."

I find it rather shocking that a Government who keep telling us that they want to consult before they make changes have slipped this one through. Perhaps they were afraid of the response that the consultation might produce.

Overall, the effect of the change has been to remove £52 million from the SSAs of shire counties. It has added £33 million to the SSAs of metropolitan districts. Once again, the Government's priorities are clear. When it comes to allocating public money, new Labour always favours the towns and hits the countryside. My hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West drew attention to Trafford council libraries in his constituency. We keep hearing from the Government that they are governing in the interests of all the people and want to respond to the recent impressive demonstration of concern by people from rural areas, yet when it comes to making a hard choice between town and country, they choose to take the money away from the shires.

Out of the 34 shire counties, all but two lose SSA directly as a result of this change in the methodology. Lancashire loses more than £3 million and will have to raise its council tax by 14 per cent. Essex loses close to £3 million and will have to raise its council tax by almost 15 per cent. Lincolnshire loses more than £1.5 million and will have to raise its council tax by more than 13 per cent. The list goes on and on.

Mr. Lansley: The list could go on. Will my hon. Friend reflect that it is not only that a county council such as mine will lose £1.5 million and will have to increase its council tax by 10.2 per cent. but that, as a consequence of capping—Cambridgeshire is capped at a relatively low level of council tax—it will have to cut services? There is a threat to close four old people's homes in Cambridgeshire alone.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend is right. I am glad that he quoted Cambridgeshire. I should have included it on my list if I had realised that he would be present, but it is better that he should do so. He is also right to draw attention to the fact that not only is this about increases in council tax—painful as they will be for people who were told last year that Labour would not increase taxes—but it is a clear example of broken pledges even before we have had what we understand will be further substantial taxes on motoring. My hon. Friend is right to say that this is also about cuts in services. We shall see wholesale cuts in services throughout the country in the next few months, made by Conservative, Labour, Liberal and coalition councils. They all face the same dilemma. That is the direct consequence of the decisions made by the Labour Government since 1 May last year.

Ms Keeble: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way again. I appreciate that I have been up and down quite a lot in this debate. I do not understand why councils should have to make cuts. If the SSA provides them with an element of spending to service debt and if your argument is that good councils have paid off their debts and do not need the money to service their debts, they should not have to raise revenue to compensate. That is my understanding of your argument.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady has been here long enough to realise the form of address.

Ms Keeble: That is what I understand the hon. Gentleman's argument to be. He undermines his own argument.

Mr. Yeo: Those authorities could see what the standard spending assessment calculations were last year. As we learn from Hampshire, they did not have a chance to express a view about the changes this year. I see the Minister shake his head. He will be able to respond in due course. I quoted from a letter.

The change clearly has an adverse effect on the authority's SSA. To compensate, it will have to raise tax or cut its services, and many authorities will do both.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend has been generous in giving way to me, as I arrived late. Does he recognise that, last year, for authorities such as mine, a notional debt level was built into their SSA allocation and, because they had extinguished their debt, they could use that SSA for service provision whereas, this year, because of the Government's change in funding, that notional debt has been reduced, the SSA has been reduced, and the money is not available for service provision?

Mr. Yeo: That is exactly the point. I congratulate my hon. Friend on expressing it so succinctly. A change that was not based on an assessment of changing need, but was simply a financial change—made out of pique, I suspect, for political reasons—has reduced the resources available to authorities such as Cambridgeshire county council, which will therefore have to cut services, raise council tax or both. The service cuts will be painful for those who have relied on local authority services hitherto.

The settlement will be expensive for council tax payers throughout the country, especially in the authorities to which I referred. In the shire counties, the average council tax rise is almost 12 per cent.—three times the rate of inflation. Band D taxpayers in shire counties will pay an extra £120 next year. The average council tax rise across the country looks as though it will be about 8.5 per cent. Even in the metropolitan districts, the group most favoured by the Government, the increase will be more than twice the rate of inflation.

Mr. Reed: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that Charnwood borough council hardly represents an urban area, yet our council tax increase this year will be 7 per cent., and the Labour-controlled local authority there, in a shire borough, will raise its spending by 3.4 per cent. again, almost in line with inflation? Does he recognise that the urban-rural myth that he is trying to perpetuate is unacceptable?

Mr. Yeo: It is not a myth, but a fact, and it is unacceptable. It is revealing of the situation that we have now reached that the hon. Gentleman gets up and says proudly that, in his area, the council tax will be up by only 7 per cent. If we had had a Conservative Government, that would have been the average for the whole country. A loyal Government Back Bencher would not get up and boast what a wonderful outturn it was for Charnwood that its council tax was up by only double the rate of inflation, and only double the rate at which actual spending has increased. That would have been the case across the country, had the Conservatives still been in government.

I have had rather longer than I expected to explore the subject, and I am grateful for that opportunity and for the contributions of my hon. Friends. There are plenty of questions for the Minister to answer. I hope that he will explain why the change is justified, and confirm that the consequences are as they have been described. I hope that he will give an assurance that, next year, proper account will be taken in good time of the concerns of authorities that are adversely affected by any proposed changes.

We have concentrated this morning on the capital financing adjustment, but, as the Minister knows, there were other changes to the SSA methodology about which we were concerned. It is an important and complicated subject, on which genuine consultation is necessary. I hope that he will give us some assurances about that.

10.33 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Nick Raynsford): I congratulate the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) on his success in securing this debate. By the end of it, he may feel a little less satisfied at having chosen the subject because a great deal of the innuendo and comment from his side of the House has been incorrect, is based on a misunderstanding of what has happened and has no substance in fact, as I shall demonstrate during the next 20 minutes or so.

As we probably expected, the debate has ranged more widely than the SSA element for debt repayment. It might therefore be appropriate if I make some general points before dealing with the specific subject raised by the hon. Gentleman.

This Government have a new agenda for Britain's future and a vision for local government's place in that future. We want to reinvigorate local government in ways that encourage increased democracy, with local people having the chance to have more of a say in the affairs of their council; increased autonomy, with more freedom for authorities to take their own decisions; increased accountability, with elected representatives being more visibly accountable for their actions; and increased partnership between central and local government and between local authorities and people, businesses and groups in their areas. As the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) observed, we are issuing a number of consultation papers that focus on those and other matters to encourage a serious debate about how we take forward the future of local government.

As part of the process required to achieve our aims, a review of local government finance is being carried out by our Department, working closely with local government, business and other representative organisations and other departments. Consultation papers on possible changes to aspects of the local government finance system will be issued over the next month or so, as part of the wider consultation on modernising local government.

The volume of local government business reflects the importance that we attach to local government. The local government agenda will keep us all busy over the current parliamentary term and, I hope, beyond it. We need to make prompt progress. Our agenda is positive. We are a Government who want to be judged on our success in improving the quality of life for all people and by the extent to which we have made a difference. The extent to which local government is delivering services efficiently and in an accountable way to local communities is extremely important to us.

On local government funding, all public expenditure programmes must be examined rigorously each year; local government spending, which accounts for a quarter of all public expenditure, is no exception. Decisions on local government spending must look not only at the pressures on local authorities, but at the scope for greater efficiency and effectiveness within local authorities.

We are committed to working within the public expenditure plans that we inherited from the previous Government. While keeping within existing spending targets, we have reorganised priorities. We have put £835 million more into education, every penny of which will be covered by an extra £835 million of revenue support grant. That is a better, fairer, more flexible settlement than in previous years and has allowed an increase of total standard spending by 3.8 per cent.

We have provided an extra £350 million for community care. We have also provided £1.3 billion for capital spending needs to improve the state of school buildings through the new deal for schools and £800 million extra for housing through the capital receipts initiative.

We are committed to reviewing the local government finance system in future years, but we will continue to expect local authorities to behave prudently and responsibly.

Mr. Gibb: I was interested in that list. How much did the Minister allocate to local government when he heard the July Budget and the announcement that dividend tax credits repayments would be ended? What assessment has he made of the impact that that will have on local authority pension funds?

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman raises an issue which was raised in the earlier debate. He will know from earlier discussions that there is no impact in the current year as a result of that change. As the hon. Member for South Suffolk recognised, the actuarial assessment is currently taking place. The Government have always made it clear that as and when that assessment has been made and the net cost—I emphasise the net cost, after compensating savings have been taken into account, rather than the gross cost figures which are misleading and have been unwisely bandied about in recent months—is known, the Government will take those figures into account in framing the appropriate support for local authorities in future years. I repeat that there is no impact in the current year.

Mr. Brady: I am concerned by the Minister's suggestion that there is no impact in the current year. Surely the fact that there has been no actuarial revaluation yet does not mean that there has been no impact in the current year. It simply means that in a future year, when the revaluation has taken place, a greater provision will have to be made to make up for this year when nothing has been done.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman fails to understand that local authorities must act on the basis of an actuarial assessment and that their contributions are fixed on that basis until the next valuation. When the next valuation takes place, the impact is taken into account and the contributions, net of savings which may result, will be decided. That is why there is no impact in the current year.

SSAs are the basis for the distribution of revenue support grant. They are based on measures of spending need that apply to all authorities and are discussed with local government representatives. I want to knock on the head one of the falsehoods that have been peddled this morning—the suggestion that the changes have been introduced by stealth and that local authorities had no opportunity to discuss them. That is not true. They were discussed at the SSA sub-group which discusses the local government settlement each year. The issue has been debated on numerous occasions and was raised at the sub-group this year.

The SSAs for 1998–99 were debated in the House on 5 February, and the local government finance settlement for 1998–99 has been agreed. Having said that, we are committed to a fair distribution of Government grant among authorities and believe that there is still scope for improvement in the arrangements in future years. My colleagues and I will look closely at the current SSA system. We will listen to local government views on how SSAs might be improved, both for 1999–2000 and in the longer term.

As the hon. Member for South Suffolk said, changes inevitably produce gainers and losers. Some authorities will plead for changes that benefit them—it is the nature of their role—and others will plead against them because they adversely affect their future prospects. That is why the Government must reach an informed judgment about the balance of merits and disadvantage in deciding what is best. That is what we have done this year and it is what we will seek to do in the future.

Mr. Lansley: The Government felt able to make changes to the SSA methodology for this year, but they failed to live up to their promise to introduce the changes recommended by the Elliott review into the area cost adjustment. Will the Minister give a pledge that the review will be completed in time for changes to the area cost adjustment to occur for the 1999–2000 financial year?

Mr. Raynsford: The area cost adjustment has been debated previously: the hon. Gentleman raised it in an Adjournment debate I answered some time ago. I made it clear at the time that we had undertaken to review ACJ this year before the settlement was reached. The fact that we have not carried out the proposed changes is simply a reflection of the fact that there was a stark division of opinion in local government about the impact. Some authorities—notably the hon. Gentleman's local authority, Cambridgeshire—were keen because they would gain from it. Others who would lose were opposed.

In our discussions, it emerged that there were possible alternatives, including a specific cost option, which had not been researched thoroughly. We believed—it is an entirely responsible decision—that that research should be undertaken and evaluated before any final decision was taken on a matter that is inevitably controversial, as it benefits some authorities and damages others. That is in train and we will discuss it further when we have the benefit of the further research on the specific cost option.

If the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West believes that the SSA system does not treat Trafford fairly, I would be happy to examine any proposals he has for different methods of calculation. However, I stress to him—and to any other hon. Member who raises these issues—that any decision has to be universal and the changes must apply to all authorities. We must consider the impact in the round—both the negative and the positive. We want to feel confident that the changes will produce a sounder assessment of need.

Mr. Brady: I thank the Minister for his generous offer to take account of any proposals I may make about a fairer way of assessing SSA for the borough of Trafford, provided they can be taken in the round. The point he made about gainers and losers is important. As a matter of generality and principle, will the change reward or benefit authorities with high levels of debt in the 1980s and penalise those with low levels of debt in the 1980s?

Mr. Raynsford: I will come to that point in a moment. I have advised the hon. Gentleman that he might not be happy with the evidence I shall present to him.

For 1998–99, we decided that it was sensible to change the method of calculating the capital financing SSA. During the 1980s, local authorities had a choice of whether to use capital receipts to pay off debt or to finance new capital expenditure. That choice was made available by the then Conservative Government and it continued until 1990. Decisions taken on whether to apply receipts for debt redemption purposes or for new investment were entirely legitimate, and authorities were perfectly free to come to a decision under the arrangements.

When SSAs were introduced in 1990, the previous Government decided to favour those who had applied capital receipts to debt reduction and penalise those who had chosen new capital expenditure by treating everyone as if they had chosen to use capital receipts to repay debt early. I stress that that was not a requirement of the regime that existed prior to 1990. There was a retrospective process of rewarding some and penalising others for decisions taken prior to the introduction of the new arrangements.

Mr. Yeo: Does the Minister think that it is wrong to reward prudent councils?

Mr. Raynsford: It was wrong to introduce regulations that had a retrospective impact when authorities had no way of knowing that they would be penalised as a result of acting in a way accepted by the then Government as entirely proper. It was a shabby change in the regulations and it caused widespread concern in local government. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman is defending it.

Mr. Yeo: If the Minister thinks it is so shabby, why is he doing exactly the same thing now?

Mr. Raynsford: If the hon. Gentleman listens, he will hear that we are making a change to restore the fairness that should have existed from 1990. We are not making a change that will benefit any authority as a result of their decisions on whether to use receipts for one purpose or another. Their decisions will have no impact on their SSA entitlement. Decisions taken prior to 1990—decisions taken one way or the other in a perfectly proper way within the rules that applied at that time—should not retrospectively result in an authority getting more or less SSA than they should be entitled to. That was the error of the Conservative Government. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman is defending it.

Mr. Yeo: The only difference between what the Minister is doing now and what the previous Government did—which he says was shabby—is that the effect of the change made by the previous Government was to benefit prudent authorities and to damage spendthrift ones. In line with old Labour thinking on this matter, he is making the same type of change—the only difference being that he has chosen to benefit the spendthrift authorities and to hit the prudent ones.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman is wrong on this, as on so many other issues. The change is creating a fair framework that will treat all authorities on an equitable basis. The debt is being assessed on either the actual or the notional—whichever is the greater. This will be a fair system, reflecting the position as at 1990, so that authorities will be subject to a regime they can understand and of which they know the consequences. However, they will not be retrospectively penalised for decisions they took in good faith before that date—perfectly legitimately—for which the previous Government penalised them.

That was a typical example of the previous Government making assumptions after the event about how local authorities should have treated capital receipts. Authorities that had properly decided to use their receipts to finance new capital expenditure felt justifiably aggrieved. To correct this, we decided that the debt calculation for the 1998–99 settlement should be based on an estimate of 1 April 1990 debt which is the greater of actual or notional debt. This will enable authorities that chose in the 1980s to undertake capital expenditure rather than repay debt early to meet their unavoidable loan charges while allowing them to spend at SSA on services such as education, health and police.

Mr. Gibb: The change in the formula will result in West Sussex receiving £2 million less from central Government. How can that be fair?

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman clearly has not been listening. Any changes in the formula will have an impact. There are gainers and losers. If he will wait a moment, he will understand that the changes will not have the consequences that he and his colleagues have suggested. They are not designed to reward the profligate and penalise the prudent. That is simply not the case, as I shall demonstrate in a moment.

By taking the larger of the actual or notional debt, we have ensured that other authorities that chose before 1990 to repay debt early will continue to receive SSA provision for the capital expenditure required to provide necessary services. Thus both groups of authorities are treated fairly, whereas the previous arrangement penalised one and rewarded the other.

As the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West pointed out, the change to the treatment of debt at 1 April 1990 has resulted in a reduction in the SSA element of debt charges for some authorities, including Trafford.

That is not the case in Tewkesbury. As a result of the adjustment to the capital spending SSA, some £20,000 extra was given to Tewkesbury.

Mr. Laurence Robertson rose—

Mr. Raynsford: From the hon. Gentleman's earlier intervention, he seemed to have a rather different impression.

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful to the Minister, who has been generous in giving way. I was quoting from the written answer that he gave me.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman must look carefully at the response. The overall impact was a reduction, because there were a number of changes. In terms of the change to capital financing, Tewkesbury was a gainer, so the change does not have an adverse effect at all on Tewkesbury, which demonstrates the incredible complexity of the process. When one is juggling a number of different indicators, there will be some that gain and some that lose. The overall impact is not terrifically predictable. That is why it is so important to try to ensure that we are as fair as we possibly can be.

It is inevitable that there will be some losers when there is a change to SSA methodology, particularly with a service such as debt charges, where the national amount is determined in relation to the amount that authorities will in aggregate spend on borrowing costs in the coming year. However, I am convinced that the change to the methodology was fair and proper. It was discussed with local authority associations in the SSA sub-group and the outcomes are a major improvement on the previous methodology. There would, of course, have been no need for any painful adjustments in the coming year if the previous Government had adopted a fairer basis for sharing the costs of borrowing when SSAs were introduced.

Mr. Sanders: Is the debate not connected to the use of the public sector borrowing requirement and how it impacts on local spending decisions on capital items? Does the Minister favour the alternative—general government financial deficit system—which would iron out many of the anomalies that stem from the 1990 changes?

Mr. Raynsford: The debate has ranged widely, but I suspect that I would incur your wrath, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I were tempted to stray into the territory of the public sector borrowing requirement, which the hon. Gentleman invites me to do, so I shall stick closely to the subject of the debate—capital financing SSA rules.

It has been argued that the change allows authorities to influence their SSAs. That is one of the charges that the Opposition have made. Let me make it absolutely clear that we have no intention of allowing authorities to take decisions that will affect their SSA entitlement. The adjustment simply reflects the position before the introduction of SSAs in 1990. There is no possibility of authorities taking decisions that will influence their entitlement in any way.

Mr. Lansley: The Minister is mis-stating the proposition in order to attack it. The point is that, through the change, he is seeking to replace a notional basis of debt calculation in an SSA with an actual debt calculation from the 1980s, when the SSA, as we know in respect of expenditure, is a notional rather than an actual figure. It is not a target for spending but an assumed level of spending, just as there was an assumed not an actual level of debt.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman has clearly not been following the debate closely. The whole basis of the assessment is to ensure that legitimate decisions taken by authorities before 1990, when the new system was introduced, should not have an adverse impact on authorities' entitlement to SSA.

Neither does the change condone creative accounting. The suggestion that it does is one of the more preposterous arguments advanced by the Opposition this morning. Any creative accounting would, by definition, have been used to get outside the normal borrowing procedures. It is not taken into account in the provision of SSA cover for debt repayment.

It has also been argued that the change to the debt charge methodology is designed to favour so-called high-spending profligate Labour authorities at the expense of low-spending Conservative authorities. That is not the case. It is always difficult to convince Opposition Members of this because there are so few Conservative authorities left where one could demonstrate the impact, but one of the largest gainers from the change is the royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea. I hope that the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West will recognise either that that borough is profligate and Labour controlled or that his argument is false.

The reality is that the royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea has been Conservative controlled throughout the past 20 or 30 years and is one of the largest gainers from the change, which entirely kills the preposterous argument that we are acting in a partisan way.

Mr. Brady: I thank the Minister for giving way once again, but is the best that he can do to find a particular case that he claims disproves the generality of the situation? Boroughs such as Trafford, which was under Conservative control throughout the 1980s and, like many other local authorities, ran its affairs prudently, are being punished. The Minister cannot escape from that by using Kensington and Chelsea as an example.

Mr. Raynsford: I thought that the hon. Gentleman might say that, so I have some examples of prudent authorities that have been penalised as a result of the changes. Those suffering a larger reduction than Trafford include Lancashire, Sunderland, Coventry, Liverpool and Tower Hamlets. Does he regard those as prudent, well managed and being penalised unfairly? If he does not, his argument is false.

Mr. Brady: The principal mass of authorities that are being hurt by the measure are in the shire counties.

[Mr. Brady]

My authority, and others that the Minister has named, may be exceptions of metropolitan areas that are suffering from the Government's attack, but the shire counties are losing £50 million.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman is extremely confused if he believes that Liverpool, Tower Hamlets, Sunderland and Coventry are shire counties. Even my authority, Greenwich, is in virtually the same position as Trafford, so I hope that Opposition Members will recognise that the change has been introduced because we believe that it is right, not because of its impact on the party political nature of any authority, or on particular benefits to any local authority.

Mr. Yeo: No amount of selective quotation from the list of more than 400 authorities can alter the fact that it is primarily, but not all, Conservative authorities that have been penalised, and it is primarily spendthrift Labour authorities that have benefited. If the Minister publishes the complete list in Hansard, those facts will be apparent to even the most casual reader.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman, like his hon. Friends, is confused. That intervention was in the same vein as his speech, which was full of inaccuracies and verged at times on the hysterical. He made a number of ill judged and unfounded allegations. The reality is that we have introduced the change because we believe that it is logical and that there is justice in it.

The particular circumstances of metropolitan districts such as Trafford are recognised in SSAs in several ways, including population density, shared facilities and various indices of need.

Trafford's 1997–98 SSA has increased by £4.75 million—3 per cent.—for 1998–99. That is the figure arrived at after adjustments for changes in function have been made. Much of that rise is due to the adjusted increase in SSA for education, everyone's top priority service, which in Trafford represents an extra £4.031 million—a 5 per cent. increase. The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West must recognise that the Government are putting money into education in his area, which is right both for the nation and for the people of Trafford.

The RSG distribution for the 1998–99 settlement is a closed matter, following approval of the local government finance settlement by the House on 5 February, and it will not be reopened. It is now up to authorities to set their budgets in the light of all their circumstances, including the provisional capping principles.

We shall consult widely on the best way to take forward the future financing of local government. As I have already said, we are issuing several consultation papers, and will enter detailed discussions with representatives of local government on the matter. We also intend, as my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has made clear—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order.

Parliament (BBC Coverage)

11 am

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): I am grateful to have been allowed a debate on this important issue. I declare an interest—the profound debt of gratitude I owe to the BBC for having dismissed me some 20 years ago. I joined the corporation as a journalist straight after university, and had a wonderful six or seven years.

However, I became involved in politics, standing for Parliament in Solihull in 1974 and arguing, in the way that embryonic politicians do, that the BBC should change itself. I argued that it should allow women to read the news, and should employ more black and Asian journalists. At the time, those were outlandish ideas. I also said that BBC journalists should be better paid—a preposterous notion.

Alas, I committed an inexcusable professional error, so the BBC, rightly and condignly, dismissed me. That probably saved my sanity. I cannot imagine what would have happened to me if I had remained a BBC employee.

I do not want the debate to take the form of BBC bashing, which is an occupational malady for politicians. Politicians who complain about the media are rather like sailors who moan about the weather, and spin doctors who complain about the media are rather like snakes who protest about being in the snake pit.

We are discussing not so much the right of Members of Parliament to be heard on the BBC as whether the BBC is taking steps that will lead to its decoupling not so much from Parliament as from the people.

I am no unconditional worshipper of Parliament. Frankly, much of what is said here is tawdry, tedious and, as we have heard during some recent days and nights, time-wasting. The modernisation of the House is long overdue. The people's will and the people's voice have been heard, are being heard and will be heard in many different ways; expressions of the people's views will be heard other than through the House.

I would make a small wager that Parliament will survive. Ministers will come and go, Speakers and Deputy Speakers will come and go, but Parliament will go on and on. The purpose of the debate is not to substitute Parliament for the editorial control of the BBC, but gently to suggest that the BBC may not survive as a publicly funded institution if it insists on de-linking itself from Parliament.

Politicians, separately from what is heard in the House and its Committees, will of course continue to be heard on the airwaves. Ministers will queue up to be "Paxmanned", and will stumble out of bed for early morning television and radio shows. I do not suggest that the voice of politicians is likely to be unheard or even reduced.

The voice of politicians as Ministers, as the Executive, will continue to be powerfully heard, and the rent-a-quote merchants, the stunt boys and girls who force their way on to the airwaves now and then, will be heard, too. Indeed, if the BBC reduces its parliamentary coverage, we shall see more of politicians in other ways, on the streets with stunts and cheap campaigns designed to get coverage.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Although the BBC has a justifiably excellent reputation both in Britain and abroad—we must remember what happened during the attempted coup in the Soviet Union in 1990—what sort of BBC would there be without this place? Without parliamentary democracy, the BBC would be merely a state organ, such as exists in countries that lack parliamentary democracy. Is it not a pity that the BBC bosses do not recognise that?

Mr. MacShane: My hon. Friend makes a valid point, but I am trying to keep my speech as short as possible so that as many hon. Members as possible can contribute to the debate.

We are not talking about politicians being kept off the airwaves; the loud, the powerful and those who represent Government will always get a hearing. However, beyond those people are the myriad voices and views of Members of Parliament working in the House and in its Select and Standing Committees, raising all sorts of issues and reflecting all sorts of perspectives.

It is true that many of those are "off message", as we now say—idiosyncratic or difficult. So be it. The BBC may want to make its coverage of Parliament as bland as possible, but we do not have to sit idly by while that happens. It is essential that the House, and, through the House, the nation should understand what is happening.

The BBC is proposing a fundamental and permanent downgrading of its parliamentary coverage. First, "Yesterday in Parliament"—probably the main link between Parliament and the people—is to disappear. Secondly, "The Week in Westminster" is to lose its present format and slot. Thirdly, the excellent "In Committee" programme is to go.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): My hon. Friend may not be aware that the Liaison Committee, which consists of the Chairmen of all the Select Committees, met last week and authorised me to write to the chairman of the BBC about the importance of "In Committee"—a letter to which Sir Christopher Bland has replied.

Select Committees now have much more important tasks, seen by the public, than they used to. On many days, including today, what happens in them is front-page news. However, such items do not show how Committees come to their conclusions, which is of enormous importance. Would it not be a disaster if the BBC failed to recognise its obligation in such an important matter?

Mr. MacShane: I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend. One of the critical remarks often made about the House is that, as today, the green Benches are relatively empty. However, it was ever thus. When Sir Martin Gilbert, the distinguished biographer of Winston Churchill, walked around here with me once, he said, "Do you know that, when Winston Churchill made those memorable speeches warning of Nazism in the 1930s, the House was empty?" It is not the presence of Members on the Benches that makes the debates and the voice of the House important, but what is said here, free of any influence other than the duty to conscience, constituents and the national interest.

Mr. David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden): I commend the hon. Gentleman on his excellent judgment in choosing the debate, and also on his opening remarks, one of which I believe was a quotation from Enoch Powell.

May I reinforce what was said by my predecessor as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon)? Of course, Select Committees' deliberations occasionally make the front page of the newspapers, but the only leverage that a Select Committee has—this is much truer of the other Select Committees than of the PAC—is exposure to the light of the aspects of government that it scrutinises.

The "In Committee" programme provides the only real exposure that the scrutiny carried out by many Select Committees receives, and it is vital not only for the task of the BBC but for our task. If the BBC removes "In Committee", as appears to be the plan, it will cut the effective powers of scrutiny of the House of Commons.

Mr. MacShane: I hope that the chairman of the BBC will listen to those two powerful interventions from the previous and present Chairmen of the most important, senior and influential Committee of the House.

As I said, "Yesterday in Parliament", "The Week in Westminster" and "In Committee" are to go. BBC2's morning report of Parliament will disappear and I understand that the BBC is threatening to do away with the regional television parliamentary programmes. Any one of those changes would have been cause for concern, but in their ensemble, they represent a concerted attempt to downgrade coverage of Parliament in a fashion unprecedented in the BBC's history.

In its defence, the BBC has been disingenuous, if not deceitful. Its army of spin doctors has been fanning out, pretending that what is proposed is only a minor change. Yet at stake is nothing less than a dismantling of mainstream, accessible broadcast coverage of Parliament. The transfer of programmes to graveyard slots or on to the ghettos of long wave, or the absorption of parliamentary coverage into generalised current affairs programmes, will massively reduce the opportunity or choice of listeners to hear what is said in Parliament.

I am particularly concerned about the BBC's cleansing of "Yesterday in Parliament" from the "Today" programme. It has been more than disingenuous in its justification of expelling parliamentary coverage from "Today". The BBC says that, as soon as Members of Parliament come on to the air, audiences plummet, but the BBC's figures do not remotely justify that claim.

The chairman, in his letter to Madam Speaker dated 21 November 1997, said that Radio 4 loses 1.3 per cent. of its audience between 8.30 am and 8.45 am and, when "Yesterday in Parliament" comes on, it loses 0.9 per cent. Frankly, 0.9 per cent. is not a massive loss. Most people have finished their breakfast and are on their way to work after 8 o'clock, and that is when the "Today" audience plummets.

According to the chairman's own statistics, in the period between 8.30 am and 9 am, it is the sweet and caressing tones of Jim Naughtie and Sue MacGregor that lose more audiences at a faster rate than the voice of parliamentarians.

Mr. David Davis: The hon. Gentleman will not be invited on to the "Today" programme again.

Mr. MacShane: Alas, the only time I was on the "Today" programme was when I attacked the BBC, so I have some hopes. Those who stay on message never get on it.

[Mr. MacShane]

What else do we know about the audience for "Yesterday in Parliament"? Between June 1996 and June 1997, the audience for "Yesterday in Parliament" went up, not down. We also know that, when other material is broadcast in the Monday morning slot, the audience is no greater. We also know from evidence given by the BBC to the Select Committee a fortnight ago that only 80 per cent. of Britain can receive long wave, to which the BBC proposes to transfer "Yesterday in Parliament". If one goes into Dixons to buy a modern radio, one often finds that long wave is not available on the radio.

We know, too, that up to 1.3 million people—about the combined sales of The Times, The Guardian and The Independent—are connected to Parliament on week-day mornings. That is a goodly part of the population. "Yesterday in Parliament" represents less than 1 per cent. of all that Radio 4 broadcasts, so sacrificing it seems wholly unnecessary. Its slot in the "Today" programme is vital because, like it or loathe it, "Today" cannot be ignored; it is our national newspaper of the day. It is not just for Members of Parliament or, as The Guardian so charmingly put it the other day, for pointy heads and policy wonks—whoever they are. It is listened to by civil servants, business leaders, journalists and teachers throughout the country, wanting to hear, wanting to know, getting a chance to learn what Members of Parliament have to say in the Commons and in Select Committees and what is said in the other place.

Listeners can hear the awkward squad—those parliamentary roundheads and cavaliers who dare to be Daniels, who dare to stand alone, who dare to have a purpose firm and dare to make it known. Cleansing them from the "Today" programme may suit some spin doctors on both sides of the House and the Executive, but their voices should be heard.

Still, the BBC, like all great bureaucracies, is made of rubber; it comes bouncing back with unconvincing arguments. "We are giving you more time," it says—yes, but fewer listeners. As the Critical Quarterly, in its remarkable black paper on education, put it 30 years ago, "More means worse." We already have a parliamentary channel on cable broadcasting Parliament around the clock. Hansard is available on the Internet. Wall-to-wall coverage of Parliament will not help anyone.

As a former journalist, I am particularly saddened because "Yesterday in Parliament" is a superb piece of broadcast journalism. It distils, into a little under 15 minutes, 12 or more hours of parliamentary proceedings. Extending it to 30 or 45 minutes, or even two or three hours, will weaken the force of that journalism. I do not want more Members of Parliament on the air, but I want the nation and its listeners to have the possibility of hearing what is said and done in the House in their name at a time and on an airwave when they are tuned in.

I have said that the BBC's arguments are disingenuous. Its statistics simply do not add up. But the BBC has been more than disingenuous; it has been deceitful in promising that real consultation would take place. In essence, what was floated, proposed and lobbied for last summer is what will take place.

I do not like to use the word "contempt". That is an overused word in Parliament. But the BBC chairman has not been straight with the Speaker. As so often happens to the great and the good when they accede to that post, they immediately go native and become mouthpieces for whatever the BBC bureaucratic moloch wants to do.

We must be realists. The BBC is not King Charles I in a fight with the Commons. The world will not stop if 15 minutes of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark), my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) or the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) are replaced by Mr. Humphrys making sure that no Minister or shadow spokesman can form a sentence with a beginning, middle and end without being interrupted.

Yet I fear for the future if the BBC refuses to listen and act on this debate. If the BBC thinks that Parliament is no longer important, the time may come when Parliament attaches no importance to the BBC. As someone who believes in the BBC, I ask myself whether that is the end game—a furtive, shabby, dishonest decoupling of the BBC from its unique character in the world as a publicly funded, editorially independent but parliamentary accountable broadcaster.

Are those who dream of privatising the BBC—we know some of their names—pushing forward that agenda? The broadcasting of parliamentary proceedings in a mainstream outlet of the BBC is nearly as old as the BBC itself. In ending that service, the BBC is telling the nation not only what its chairman and his officials think of Parliament, but he is announcing urbi et orbi, that the marriage between the BBC and the British public may be drawing to a close. Is that what the BBC wants? Is it what Britain wants? I urge the chairman, even at this late stage, to think again.

11.17 am

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) and I congratulate him on securing the debate. He supported me when I raised the issue at business questions some 10 days ago, and I am delighted to endorse every word that he has given us this morning. I am sure that other hon. Members on both sides of the House will share that view.

My text is C. P. Scott:

"Comment is free but facts are sacred", which we might update by adding that commentary is fun but reportage is serious and sacred. That is what we are discussing today. We are addressing not simply the numerical figures of audiences or the new ghetto which will be created for those who take an interest in our proceedings, but the character of some of the programmes that the BBC now proposes to give its listeners and viewers.

It is not only Members of Parliament who have considered those programmes to be important in the past. The BBC itself has always viewed those programmes as extremely important and as part of its duty to its public and the nation. I have quotations from several episodes in the BBC's history to prove that point. The BBC's annual report and accounts for 1945 state:

"From the opening of the new Parliament in August 1945, a quarter hour period (10:45 to 11:00pm) was devoted in the Home service to a summary of each day's proceedings, under the title 'Today in Parliament'. This made it possible to keep listeners more closely informed on Parliamentary matters."

In 1946, the then assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Wilfred Burke, said:

"Another new condition is one to which the House will attach considerable importance. That is the new obligation laid upon the Corporation to broadcast a daily report of the proceedings of both Houses of Parliament."

No less a person than Mr. Herbert Morrison, the then Lord President of the Council, said in 1946:

"It is one of the duties of the BBC to keep the country informed about Parliament."

In 1982, a report from the House of Lords Select Committee on Sound Broadcasting stated that the BBC

"shared the wishes of members of both Houses that the proceedings of Parliament should reach as wide an audience as possible; in their judgment"— the BBC's judgment, not that of the House of Lords—

"the new format of 'Yesterday in Parliament' was more likely to achieve this than the old."

The BBC's annual report in 1985 stated.

"Recorded actuality from both chambers and from committees regularly finds a place in news and current affairs programmes in the networks, the regions and local radio where there has been growing demand."

There was no sign then of the BBC claiming that parliamentary coverage was, literally, a turn-off for its listeners and viewers. The 1985 annual report also commented:

"The BBC's commitment"— a strong word—

"to full and serious reporting of parliamentary affairs is reflected in such programmes as 'Today in Parliament', 'Inside Parliament' and 'The Week in Westminster' where recordings are used to good effect. The new format of 'Yesterday in Parliament' within the 'Today' programme has improved audiences."

As the hon. Member for Rotherham said, that comment does not suggest a falling audience—far from it.

Perhaps the most important statement of all was made last December by the Minister for Arts, whom I am delighted to see in his place on the Government Front Bench. He said that the BBC agreement "contains one specific programming requirement introduced . . . in 1948 and re-iterated in 1996, that the corporation 'shall transmit an impartial account day by day, prepared by professional reporters, of the proceedings in both Houses of Parliament.'"—[Official Report, 11 December 1997; Vol. 302, c. 1258.]

Given that background of commitment to regular reporting and its importance to our House, the other place and the world at large—the programmes are popular and people want them—why are we now given several extraordinary excuses as to why those programmes no longer have a place in the schedules? The hon. Member for Rotherham effectively dealt with the ludicrous argument about the fall in audience between 8 am and 9 am. It is absurd, and I do not know how anyone could come before the Speaker or any other House authority and pretend that that was a good reason.

The figures show that, outside the "Today" programme itself, there are more listeners for "Yesterday in Parliament" and "Today in Parliament"—the listenership is growing—than for any other programme on Radio 4 except "The Archers". I am devoted to "The Archers", but if we have to start having murders, suicides or tractor accidents to persuade the BBC that we are important enough to be broadcast at a reasonable hour, that implies that the BBC is tearing up the commitment given under Lord Reith and in every era since.

I come from a scattered and sparsely populated rural area in Cornwall and I am, therefore, especially concerned about the notion that long wave is somehow an adequate substitute for FM. That is patent nonsense. Ever since this debate was announced, I have tried to persuade the BBC to provide me with a map to show the coverage of the United Kingdom achieved by long wave. I am told by the BBC that it is an "imprecise science"; in other words, it does not know. It can provide a map of the FM coverage of the United Kingdom, but it cannot provide a map that shows the areas in which long wave is easily received. Even some parts of London find it difficult to achieve good reception of long wave. The sudden suggestion that the quality of the receivers and the transmitters will be dramatically improved in weeks so that everyone can listen to long wave is patent nonsense.

All those arguments were "exposed"—I use the word advisedly—by Mr. Peter Hill in The House Magazine in October last year. He wrote a skilled, careful, scientifically based article, as we would expect from a former senior and distinguished reporter of the BBC. I find it extraordinary that the chairman and senior officials of the BBC are still repeating the arguments that have been so effectively disposed of. At a cross-party meeting that several hon. Members had with the controller of Radio 4, he was still repeating some of those arguments even when they no longer held water.

As I implied at the beginning of my speech, I believe that there is a hidden agenda behind the BBC's moves. It is not simply a numbers game, because the very character of the programmes is at risk. I shall take one example of that. "The Week in Westminster" is to move to Thursday evening, which will more than halve its audience, and that is bad enough. However, as a sop to the House, the BBC proposes to broadcast the programme in weeks in which the House does not sit. How can a programme called "The Week in Westminster", which purports factually to report parliamentary matters, be broadcast when the House is not sitting? The answer must be one of two options. Either the programme will become a report of the week in Whitehall and be all about the Government, not the House—but that is not what the BBC is pretending—or it will not be reportage at all, but commentary. We have a huge amount of commentary already on all channels, radio and television. We ask only that a small portion of the schedule is consistently addressed—every week and to a real audience composed of the whole United Kingdom—to reportage of the Houses of Parliament, including, as the hon. Member for Rotherham said, what happens in the Chambers and in Committees.

By definition, "The Week in Westminster" on a Thursday evening will not look at the whole week. It will contain nothing about Fridays. Is Friday now unimportant in the House? If so, someone should tell the Speaker, the Whips and the House officials. It appears that Friday will no longer exist, simply because the BBC, at the stroke of a pen, is to dispose of the programme to Thursday nights.

More important, "The Week in Westminster" would dramatically change in character. It would no longer report what the nation's representatives are saying and doing in this place—it would be about the Government or would be a commentary on the parties and political affairs outside this place.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I have followed the hon. Gentleman's speech carefully and he is doing a great service to the House. Does he agree that, to all intents and purposes, the executives of the BBC are trivialising and making peripheral what goes on in Parliament? We do not want that, and I do not believe that that is what the people of this country want.

Mr. Tyler: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. We do not agree often, but he has put the point succinctly and it leads precisely into my concluding point. Those who want to see and hear their parliamentary representatives working in this place, representing them, will be treated by the BBC as a tiny, insignificant and unimportant minority. They will be consigned to a scheduling ghetto. That is not just an insult to Parliament but an insult to our constituents and to the BBC's listeners and viewers. I hope that the BBC will think again.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The other day, I received a note from the public affairs unit of the BBC—I presume that one has gone to other hon. Members—that began "Dear David" and asked whether I would signal my support for the proposals. It is surprising that I received such a note, whether it began "Dear David" or otherwise, bearing in mind my earlier interventions on the matter, including my Adjournment debate on 11 December 1997, during which I was, to say the least, extremely critical of the proposals. My hon. Friend the Minister replied to that debate, as he will to today's.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) and the hon. the Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) said, we must emphasise that what appears to be a technical matter—broadcasting on long wave or on FM—has great relevance to the proposals. I said in my Adjournment debate that "Today in Parliament" had lost more than half its audience since it went over to long wave in 1994. Parliamentarians as well as listeners would agree that it is an excellent programme. It is perhaps too long for the morning, but in the evening it provides good coverage of what has gone on in both Houses of Parliament. The BBC must have known that putting "Today in Parliament" on long wave would substantially reduce its audience. The BBC cannot be naive about the matter, and I can think only that it deliberately made the change because it believes few people want to listen to Parliament's proceedings and few are obsessed by politics and current affairs, and that it could find other listeners.

As the hon. Member for North Cornwall said, the BBC is making a great deal of the fact that the Friday programme, which is briefer than the Monday to Thursday programmes, will be extended. However, that late evening programme, which is the only one broadcast on FM, will move to long wave only, so there will be no real gain for it, as the BBC is perfectly aware.

The BBC has taken a propaganda line since last July when the proposals were leaked. Points of order were made in the House, and hon. Members will remember that Madam Speaker said that she was displeased by BBC proposals, but, all along, the BBC propaganda line—as has been shown during the debate—has been that people switch off because they are bored by the 15-minute or 16-minute recording of what occurred the previous day in Parliament. The reasons for fewer people listening from 8 am have been stated, although the BBC was originally reluctant to give the figures. Even now, the audience of "Yesterday in Parliament" is well over 1 million, which is larger than that of "Newsnight"—who knows what proposals the BBC has for that excellent programme?

Most people have no desire to switch off at all. I rang the BBC during the summer recess to ask how many people were listening to the substitute slot. The answer was that there was little difference between the number of people who listen to "Yesterday in Parliament" and those who listen to the substitute slot when Parliament is not sitting. Where is the evidence that listeners are bored and fed up with listening to parliamentarians for 15 or 16 minutes a day, and switch off such programmes when they come on air? There is no reason to believe that there is any truth in the BBC propaganda line.

The controller of Radio 4 said last summer that 350,000 listeners switched off when "Yesterday in Parliament" came on in the morning, but the BBC is now reluctant to repeat that comment. My hon. Friend and the hon. Member for North Cornwall explained that people switch off between 8 am and 9 am for obvious reasons: they are taking their children to school, going to work, and so on. The BBC was willing to use its propaganda line, when it seemed that it might be effective, to discredit the reporting of Parliament.

One cannot have a great deal of respect for people who use such tactics, but I have the greatest respect for the journalists who are involved in "Yesterday in Parliament" and the evening programme. One can criticise from day to day, and ask why one item has been excluded and another has been given so much time, but the people involved are skilled, and there is no doubt that they do an excellent job, and have done so on radio and television since the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House. Their position is being undermined by their bosses, who give the impression that what they do is not of great value, which is unfortunate.

I shall not mention the other changes, because my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for North Cornwall discussed them in detail. The essence of the matter is whether the BBC recognises that it has a public service duty adequately to report the proceedings of Parliament. I have concluded that the BBC has a different view. I have said that I have the greatest respect for the BBC, its coverage and the way in which it broadcasts overseas events. I referred to the attempted coup in the Soviet Union, and said that it took place in 1990, but I was a year out: it took place in 1991. One remembers that Mr. Gorbachev learned the details of what was going on from the BBC.

One wants to defend that fine reputation; indeed, whether the BBC has been underfunded or had difficulties with the Foreign Office over funding for its overseas broadcasts, parliamentarians have come to the rescue and intervened constructively. Unfortunately, the view on domestic matters, and certainly on the reporting of Parliament, is that listeners are not interested in politics, and any old excuse is made to cut such reporting. Hon. Members are right to think that Ministers and spin doctors will benefit at the expense of parliamentarians. I do not believe that should happen without a great deal of criticism.

I said in business questions and repeat today that we know what sort of institution the BBC would be without this place and without parliamentary democracy. Its freedoms, like the freedoms and civil liberties of all the people of this country, come from one place only—the Houses of Parliament, where the rule of law is established. It is unfortunate that the BBC does not recognise that and act accordingly.

The proposals, which I understand the chairman of the BBC will discuss when he comes to the House on Thursday, should be thrown in the dustbin. Despite all our protests, including that of Madam Speaker, the chairman, the director-general and the controller of Radio 4 may push them ahead. That is their right, and we cannot tell them what to do, but if they treat Parliament in such a contemptuous way, and refuse to listen to our justified criticism, we shall inevitably show contempt for those who control the BBC.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): This is a unique debate. I am not entirely sure, because my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) has just entered the Chamber, but I suspect that there will be virtual unanimity on the anxieties expressed by the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) about the BBC proposals for the reporting of Parliament.

Yesterday, I chaired a meeting of the all-party media group, at which Matthew Bannister put the case for the BBC. He put a good case, but a number of people disagreed with it. I repeat what I said in my intervention on the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler): the BBC is seeking to peripheralise and trivialise the coverage of Parliament. That concerns me very much. I have been here for more than a quarter of a century, and over that time the BBC's serious coverage of Parliament has been reduced. I believe that the current proposals will reduce it further.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall referred to Peter Hill, a BBC journalist with considerable experience, who is totally committed to Parliament and who covers it remarkably well. As has been said, last autumn he wrote an article severely criticising what the BBC intended to do. Nor do I think that the House should take lightly the concern expressed by Madam Speaker. It is not often that the Speaker of the House of Commons publicly states her concern about what is going on, but Madam Speaker believes fervently in the role of Parliament, and thinks that it should be covered properly by the BBC.

Uniquely, I must agree with every word said by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). He and I are generally very much on opposite sides. It is good to note the virtually unanimous condemnation—I use that word advisedly—of what the BBC intends to do.

I shall not repeat the arguments about the change from FM to long wave, for the simple reason that they have already been fully and accurately deployed; but I sometimes wonder why the BBC keeps referring to audience figures. I believe that the figures are wrong. Moreover, the BBC is funded in a unique way, and, in accordance with its charter, has a serious commitment to providing a public service. That commitment will be greatly damaged if it implements its proposals.

I mentioned Matthew Bannister. He is very articulate. I knew him for many years before he rose to the higher echelons of the BBC, and I have a high regard for him and his ability. When he came to the all-party media group last night, however, it seemed to me that he was very much carrying out the instructions of his media bosses. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet will confirm if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he tried to justify the proposal by saying that, far from cutting coverage of the House, the BBC was giving it extra time.

As the hon. Member for North Cornwall pointed out, the BBC says with great sincerity that it will broadcast "The Week in Westminster" when the House is not sitting. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that "The Week in Westminster" will become a programme about Whitehall and government. It will consist merely of reporting and comment, rather than being a serious programme giving people what I think they want to hear. As an evergreen Back Bencher, I think that it is important to Members of Parliament that their constituents can hear what their representatives have said on the Floor of the House from time to time—with, of course, appropriate editorial treatment. After all, we believe—mostly—in the impartiality of the BBC's editorial staff.

It is amazing how many letters I receive from constituents saying, "Oh, Mr. Winterton, I heard you say so-and-so in the House of Commons last week." I find that very rewarding, and I think that rather more people follow what goes on here than the BBC would have us believe. You may say that this is not the right place for me to say this, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but Mr. Tony Hall, the head of BBC news, is coming to the all-party media group on 25 March, and I hope that as many people as possible will come and tell the BBC's senior executive exactly what they think of its proposals. As an Opposition Back Bencher, I cannot stress enough how concerned I am, and how important I consider the BBC's public service duties.

Let me say to the hon. Members for Rotherham and for Walsall, North that I am not one of those Conservative and Unionist Members who believe that we should privatise the BBC or, force it to raise funds from advertising. I have never believed that, although I want it to become commercial in the sense of exploiting some of its services—for example, the tapes and compact discs that it produces. I think that it could market those more aggressively, and thus increase its revenue. It does a pretty good job—which could, however, be improved—in selling its fantastic programmes overseas; but it has a prime duty to give Parliament adequate coverage. I do not want to go into this in depth, but the BBC is right in saying that long wave is unreliable in many parts of the country. Is it therefore surprising that the BBC can state that audiences have been reduced, when not many people can receive long wave broadcasts of the standard that they expect?

I congratulate the hon. Member for Rotherham on securing the debate, and on the reasoned and robust way in which he put his case. His view is shared by Conservative Members and by the minority parties, particularly the Liberal Democrats. I hope that the unanimity in the House continues, and that, when Sir Christopher Bland and John Birt come to the House to try to explain what they are doing, they will receive a positive response. They, too, are coming to the all-party media group later in the year, on the day when they publish the BBC's annual report. We have a responsibility to give them a platform.

I agree with the hon. Members for Rotherham, for Walsall, North and for North Cornwall. We must not allow the BBC to implement changes to the disadvantage of this place, or allow such changes to be accepted by default.

11.48 am

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I do not entirely share in the unanimity. I have known four Members of Parliament for Rotherham, every one of whom has made a contribution to the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) made an elegant and important contribution, and we are in his debt.

I do not always agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) on every subject, but I strongly agree with what he said about public service obligations.

The discordant note that I introduce is this. We shall have to cast a particular mote out of our own eye. The problem is that it is all very well for the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) to say that, in the past quarter of a century, serious coverage has been reduced, but something else has been reduced: ministerial interest, in both parties, in the proceedings of the House of Commons. I am concerned about the gradual bypassing of Parliament, which I think started with Mrs. Thatcher. More and more, statements are being made in Millbank or in Conservative central office, long before they are made on the Floor of the House. It is a question not only of etiquette but of the amount of attention, particularly of Ministers, that is paid to the House of Commons.

Yesterday morning, there was a major event in the history of the Labour Government. I am not concerned here about the merits or demerits of the minimum wage legislation, but it is something that was very close to the heartstrings of my party. I shall put it gently. If such a measure had been passed after an all-night sitting, and if their colleagues had been up all night getting it through, Harold Wilson and Jim Callaghan would have made it their absolute business to be on the Treasury Bench at least for the final speeches, and probably—certainly in Wilson's and Callaghan's case—for all the speeches on Third Reading.

For much of the legislation that has been passed in the past few months—it was the same during the Conservative Government—the Secretaries of State whose legislation it was were very seldom to be seen on the Treasury Bench. They left it to junior Ministers. What more important thing do Secretaries of State who are conducting legislation through the House have to do than to listen—on their own legislation, which they are promoting—to their parliamentary colleagues of all parties?

If the Government cease to listen to the House of Commons—as Governments in general are ceasing to do—what do we say to BBC senior executives, one of whom, who must be nameless, has asked, "If you do not take yourselves that seriously, and if Ministers do not take the House of Commons that seriously, why should the BBC take you so seriously?"? The debate is part of a wider argument on the bypassing of Parliament.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, and entirely agree with the important point that he is making so strongly. However, I think that he will agree that two wrongs do not make a right, and that it is not entirely clear which is cause and which is effect. I think that one of the reasons why successive senior Ministers, and Governments generally, have treated the House with less courtesy and respect for its role is that they do not think that they will attract the media's attention if they do so. We witness today an empty Press Gallery for this debate. I think that the hon. Gentleman will agree also that the media are not excused in paying increasingly less attention to the proceedings of the House simply because Ministers have followed them in making that mistake.

Mr. Dalyell: The hon. Gentleman has made the point more eloquently than I would have done. Others wish to speak. I shall only endorse what he has so pointedly said.

Mr. Alan Clark (Kensington and Chelsea): I congratulate the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) on making his case, and also on the restraint, in several senses, that he showed in developing that case. Specifically, he made no reference—he might have some acquaintance with or memory of them—to the complexities and, in a literary sense, corruptions of the career structure inside that enormous and—as he eloquently described it—rubbery corporation. He did not mention the pressures that those pressures generate, or the contribution that they make to an anonymity of responsibility, which makes it difficult to fix on a particular target or individual and to say, "If we can bring our case to them, perhaps we can correct this."

Meanwhile, as hon. Members have already said, we are witnessing the standard corporation technique, whereby, if one wants to get rid of a product, one makes very little of it. As supply is so limited that people cannot get the product, one says that there is no demand for it. It is a cyclical process. The BBC is engaged in that process, transferring programmes that it admits have higher ratings to "listening ghettos"—where no one can get at the programmes, or where one can hear them only with great difficulty, because they are broadcast at the wrong time of day. The process is self-fulfilling, and enables the BBC to say, "There is no demand for those programmes, so we may as well get rid of them."

The process is part of a larger one that I see developing within the BBC. It is a type of dumbing down. The BBC is giving much more air time and exposure to special interest lobbies and mini-focus groups that argue their case, although almost in political isolation, because they are not really politicians. They do not understand—as we do, as we are sent to the House by our constituents—political pressures in the round, although they have good soundbites, mini-rows and disturbances, and give trouble. However, those groups should be only on the fringe of politics, not at the centre, as the House certainly should be.

As the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) so eloquently said, for a variety of reasons, the House finds itself under pressure from many different sectors. In the eyes of many, our importance is diminishing. Therefore, rather than pay attention to what the House of Commons says, it is legitimate to listen to those various little focus groups, pressure groups and people who will make a scene on air or on television and give the programme "more of a kick".

I should like briefly to deal with the matter of that "kick"—the matter of ratings. It is no business of the BBC to determine its output by ratings—which are not and never have been part of its charter. I went to a lunch hosted by Sir Christopher Bland—I hope that I am not abusing his hospitality. He invited some prominent parliamentarians, and gave us a résumé of his future programmes and of what the corporation was doing. On all the items that he showed us, he declaimed their ratings and the acclaim from critics. He told us that the ratings for this or that programme were as good as those for ITV's programmes. That is not his business. Lord Reith never concerned himself with a programme's ratings. His duty, as he saw it, was to inform and to educate. That is how the BBC was conceived.

We can complain about the process, and we have right to do so, because it is deplorable. I know from my own mailbag that many individual constituents complain about it. The process can be corrected only by a strong and forceful personality who is not concerned with ingratiating himself with the establishment. The BBC requires an individual who will promote his various officials, editors and producers not on the basis of their impact on ratings or the acclaim that they garner, but on the basis of how they fulfil the BBC's fundamental duty, which is quite different from that of independent television companies—which have no duty except to their shareholders, and only minimal constraints imposed on them by censorship and the dictates of so-called good taste.

We shall have to initiate a fundamental change in the BBC—in attitude, conscience, responsibility and the sense of duty of those at the top. Until we do that, we shall have debates such as this one. The Press Gallery will remain empty, and no one will pay the slightest attention.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) for giving me a chance to raise the issue of regional television broadcasting of parliamentary affairs.

Many of us will have built up a quite close relationship with our regional BBC outlets and participate frequently in their programmes. It seems to me that there are two essential components in that regional broadcasting: first, that there are correspondents who go out of their way to build links with all the region's Members of Parliament, irrespective of party and position; and, secondly, that they are given adequate air time and are able not only to provide pieces for regional magazine programmes that follow the news, but to have their own slots throughout the week to broadcast genuine regional coverage.

That is especially important in areas such as Yorkshire—an area of interest both to myself and to the hon. Member for Rotherham. That we have a Leeds-based team is very significant: it is important that our coverage of Westminster comes from "John Turnbull, our man in Westminster", not from a national feed, and gives a genuinely regional perspective. People in Yorkshire and other peripheral regions respect that. The breadth of coverage is significant, as those in the team are able to move into the wider arena: for example, we have recently discussed issues such as the Child Support Agency and alternatives to prison sentences—broader issues, discussion of which involves residents of the region and their parliamentarians. I ask myself where else we could get that sort of coverage.

Hon. Members have recently waxed lyrical about the importance of the constituency link as we discuss alternatives to the present electoral system. If we are not to have regional coverage, all we shall be left with is the Government's pronouncements and national spokespeople talking; people will never hear what their region's Members of Parliament think from a regional perspective.

The other key issue is the following of political careers. In Yorkshire, we report the Leader of the Opposition as the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague). We have followed the career of the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), who is reported as such, all the way from local councillor to his current position as the esteemed Secretary of State for Education and Employment. It is that ability to engage with local politicians as local characters that is important, in that it cuts behind some of the hype and spin that are often seen here.

I hope that, as well as debating the topical issue of "Yesterday in Parliament", we shall seriously look at the future of regional broadcasting. We should treasure it and continue to provide to people in the regions a genuinely regional voice, instead of their having to rely solely on Government pronouncements and national spokespersons' responses.

12.1 pm

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet): I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) for the fact that I was unable to be here for the first part of the debate. The hon. Gentleman knows, because he was in the same Committee earlier this morning, that I have been chairing the Committee on the Public Interest Disclosure Bill and was therefore unable to be here earlier. I hope that the House will accept my apology.

Despite having heard only part of the debate, I should like to make a couple of comments on the remarks made. It has been suggested that the BBC is in danger of sidelining Parliament into ghettos and, by that means, demonstrating that no one is listening, thereby putting itself in a position of being able to kill off the programme. Some of that is going on: I, like my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), heard Mr. Bannister last night indicate that "The Week in Westminster" was to be moved from its current Saturday morning slot to an hour on Thursday evening when, quite clearly, fewer people will listen. I regard that with sadness, because the breadth of Saturday morning programming means that people who ordinarily would not listen to "The Week in Westminster" might catch some of it and learn something that they might otherwise not have learnt.

Mr. MacShane: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the audience for "The Week in Westminster" on Saturday is greater at its end than at its beginning? Believe it or not, it is actually an audience grabber.

Mr. Gale: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying, although there are those who are unkind enough to say that that is because people are tuning in for the programme that follows "The Week in Westminster", rather than for "The Week in Westminster" itself.

Be that as it may, that argument fits uneasily with that advanced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark), who suggested that the BBC should not have to search for an audience. That is an elitist argument, which we have heard long and often. My right hon. Friend said that what is happening would not have happened in Lord Reith's day, but I hope that he will forgive me for pointing out that Lord Reith and his corporation did not face the competition in terms of outlets that faces the BBC today.

There are a dozen and more radio and television channels nationally, plus very good local radio channels and information available on the internet. Mr. Bannister told us last night that he was having great difficulty in persuading children to listen to the sort of programmes that the BBC puts on in the evenings, because young people have access to so many alternative information outlets. It is not surprising that the BBC has to consider whether anyone at all is listening to what it broadcasts. I suspect that, if not my right hon. Friend, then others would say in fairly short order, "Hang on—why are we paying our licence fee? Nobody is listening." I am not suggesting for one moment that the BBC should be populist, but I do believe that it has a duty incumbent on it to be popular and to present a breadth of programmes that attract an audience. Otherwise, as a broadcaster, I would have to say that there is no point in broadcasting.

Mr. Alan Clark: My hon. Friend's remarks are making me extremely concerned. His argument is essentially populist. There is strong competition to supply what it is thought people want and to titivate them and attract their attention by various means. However, the business of the BBC has always been to present the truth, the facts and objective commentary—to inform and to educate. It is a fact of life that that does not attract big audiences, but the BBC has to lump it.

Mr. Gale: On the contrary, the BBC over the years and currently does, on occasion, attract very large audiences, and all power to it for doing so.

I do not want to take much more time, but I want to comment on what Mr. Bannister said, because his views have been, not misrepresented, but partly represented this morning and I should like to present an alternative view. Matthew Bannister told Members of Parliament last night that the BBC was in fact extending the hours of coverage of Parliament. My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield recognised that fact in his speech, but what he did not say was that Mr. Bannister has also given a clear undertaking that, as and when—it would be sooner rather than later—digital sound broadcasting becomes widely available, instead of being available to an elite few who are able to afford expensive receivers, the BBC expects to be able to dedicate an entire channel to the broadcasting of Parliament. That seems highly desirable.

My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield said that Radio 4 on long wave was hard to receive, but I have to say that I listen to Radio 4 on long wave, not on FM, and I have no difficulty with it at all.

Mr. Ben Bradshaw (Exeter): I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has pointed out that the proposals represent a huge expansion of parliamentary coverage, which builds on the large expansion in recent years. That contrasts with the attitude of newspapers and other media, which tend to ignore Parliament. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is up to schedulers, not politicians, to schedule programmes on the BBC? Does he accept the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), that part of the problem is us: we are boring and announcements are made on the "Today" programme and "The World at One", not in this place?

Mr. Gale: I was coming to that point, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making it for me.

Radio 5 Live is an excellent service: it comes to the House and covers live Prime Minister's Question Time; in addition, when Ministers are good enough to come to the House to make the occasional statement, it covers those as well. Radio 5 Live covers in a very good form a great deal of current affairs, news and politics throughout the evening. Radio 4 currently provides excellent coverage, and it is clear that that will be extended.

The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw) is absolutely right, as is the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), to lay the blame fairly and squarely in this Chamber. For this debate, there are more people in the Public Gallery than there are in the Chamber—there are about 13 Members of Parliament present. We are all aware of the pressures on Members' time resulting from constituency work or Committee work—I myself was guilty of that earlier this morning. It is not necessarily a fault that the fulcrum of debate has shifted from the Chamber of the House of Commons to other places, including the media, but we cannot blame the BBC for that.

Although critical of some aspects of Mr. Bannister's proposals, I broadly support them and I wish him well. I want to hear the extended coverage, because I believe that the BBC does a very good job.

12.8 pm

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk): It is right that we should be having this debate about the future of the BBC's parliamentary broadcasting, not just because it is a subject of close interest to Members of Parliament but because the broadcasting of the proceedings of Parliament to the public plays an essential part in our democratic process. I congratulate the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) on securing the debate and making his case so cogently. I also congratulate the other right hon. and hon. Members who have contributed.

The BBC is so well established; also it is not just a British institution. I share the high esteem and affection in which it is held. It has brought the most important events of the century into the homes and lives of millions of people. Highly professional BBC commentators and interviewers have become household names. The BBC also performs an invaluable function through its regional broadcast services, strengthening the identity of communities and highlighting issues of local interest.

More recently, the BBC began to broadcast the proceedings of both Houses of Parliament, providing a direct link between the people and their representatives. There is no filter, no comment and no spin. Politicians are shown not as they might wish to present themselves to television and radio presenters and the public, but as they make their arguments and are held to account by their political opponents. Parliament is the heart of our democracy. Coverage of it is an unparalleled insight into how our democracy works.

The BBC is subject to pressure for change in the same way as other institutions. It has to adapt to changes in contemporary society. Not all such pressures are necessarily for the good or are likely to endure. In succumbing to them, the BBC may risk its unique relationship with Parliament and do a disservice to the democratic process.

The emergence of rich, vocal and powerful single-issue pressure groups as a major influence is one of the most significant changes in our national life in recent years. Campaigners have discovered that they can be more influential in impacting political decisions from outside the party political process than from within it. In Parliament, competing claims are balanced by Government and Opposition in the knowledge that both will eventually be held to account for their actions by the electorate. Outside Parliament, there is no counterweight to the shrill claims of single-issue groups. One example of how a decision on a serious issue can be derailed by a pressure group was the Brent Spar episode. Ironically, the ultimate effect was the reverse of minimising the environmental impact. The biggest challenge for the BBC and the other media is how to deal with the influence of pressure groups in their political coverage.

The growing importance of the media in political debate in recent years has led to the professional packaging of political arguments for the media as almost an art form. The soundbite culture has emerged. The tendency for Government policy announcements to be made outside the House of Commons, whether in exclusive press briefings or amid the razzmatazz of press launches, has undoubtedly reduced the accountability of the Government and the scrutiny that their policies receive. That practice has grown over the years, but it has mushroomed recently.

More seriously, Madam Speaker has repeatedly criticised Ministers for making announcements about Government policies outside the House. Regrettably, the desire to control the news has resulted in an incessant drip feed of headline-grabbing stories that often damage the credibility of the Minister, the Department or the project involved.

The BBC is caught between the need to preserve and enhance its audience figures and its overriding duty as a public service organisation. In the age of the soundbite and instant response, there is not the time for broadcasters to give the detailed consideration to political issues that Parliament can. Broadcasters are not in a position to demand information of the Government as Parliament does.

We live in an era of unprecedented news management. Perhaps it was ever thus, but the practice has latterly scaled new heights. The Prime Minister's press secretary recently complained that the BBC has become a

"downmarket, dumbed-down, over-staffed, over-bureaucratic, ridiculous organisation."

Indeed. Governments can be tempted to avoid public accountability, but Oppositions have a duty to hold them to account. The BBC has a public service duty to assist that scrutiny fairly and openly.

Alastair Campbell's comments were greeted with dismay. However, commentators missed the point. As a professional news manager, he wants nothing more than dumbed-down, downmarket coverage. The raison d'être of his ilk is to replace substance with spin.

All Governments have sought to manage the way in which their policies are reported in the news media, but, by any objective standards, this Government have gone to extraordinary lengths to present themselves in a favourable light. That is why it is vital that Parliament should continue to be able to hold the Government to account and that the public should know about it.

The specific changes proposed by the BBC are not acceptable or appropriate. The number of long wave listeners is in decline. The BBC's audience figures for the two key programmes—"Yesterday in Parliament" and "Today in Parliament"—do not bear close scrutiny. We have all taken on board the comments of the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis) about the removal of "In Committee".

We are told that the public find our proceedings boring. That does not absolve the BBC from its duty to present our proceedings to the public as they are. It is not their duty to make Parliament more entertaining by jazzing up their coverage or concentrating on the more trivial exchanges.

Increasing coverage by an average of eight minutes a day is no compensation for switching Parliament to the wavelength with a declining audience. I do not accept that the format of "Yesterday in Parliament" is what makes people tune out or switch off when it begins. Let me be clear: the Opposition oppose the proposed changes. I should be grateful for an unequivocal statement of the Government's position from the Minister.

Over the years, Parliament has sought to protect the finances, integrity and independence of the BBC. I was among the many Members of Parliament on both sides of the House who sought to prevent cuts to the World Service budget. The importance of the BBC is its unique status as a public service broadcaster funded by the licence fee. That funding arrangement frees it from the financial pressures that beset purely commercial broadcasters. With that comes a special obligation to pursue the highest standards of broadcasting and reporting.

Just as Parliament has a duty to the BBC, the BBC has a duty to inform the public about the role of Parliament, including those aspects of Parliament that, while not dramatic, are an essential part of the democratic process. We believe that the proposed changes undermine that public responsibility. I hope that the BBC will accept its duty and urgently think again about the changes that it is proposing.

12.17 pm

The Minister for Arts (Mr. Mark Fisher): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) on securing the debate and introducing it with such clarity and force. The subject has been of considerable concern to the House since the BBC announced its proposed changes last July: there have been many written and oral questions Madam Speaker has corresponded at considerable length with the chairman of the BBC; my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) secured an Adjournment debate on the subject last December; and the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport took evidence on 24 February. It is clear from all that that Parliament is exercised. As the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) has noted, it is nearly unanimous in its view today.

We have had an excellent debate. There has been general agreement about the excellence of the BBC's political journalism. It is because of that excellence and the proper rigour of scrutiny that that coverage puts on the Government and the work of the House that hon. Members are concerned about possible damage to its quality or effective reach. Two basic questions have run through the debate: what precise effect will the changes have; and, will they be consistent with the obligation placed on the BBC in its 1948 royal charter and agreement to "transmit an impartial account, day by day, prepared by professional reporters, of the proceedings in both Houses of Parliament"?

Decisions about programme content and scheduling that express that obligation are, as my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw) said, wholly a matter for the BBC, which has and must have complete editorial independence, but the fulfilment of that obligation is important. Its purpose is not in doubt: to allow the public to hear the work of the House and to draw their own conclusions.

Mr. MacShane: Some people have commented on the lack of hon. Members present. Is my hon. Friend aware that no fewer than 12 Standing and Select Committees are at work this morning, with up to 20 hon. Members in each? Is he also aware that the parliamentary Labour party is meeting at the moment, attended by between 40 and 150 Members? The absence of hon. Members in the Chamber does not mean that this House and MPs are not at work. To deny that work to listeners of "Today" will be a serious diminution of the reporting of the House.

Mr. Fisher: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that important point. The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis), the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), the former PAC Chairman, made that point in their very important speeches. I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has returned to the Chamber. His speech reflected exactly the importance of Committee work.

Let us be clear about what the changes consist of. "Yesterday in Parliament" is to be broadcast for 23 minutes instead of the current 14 minutes, but it will be broadcast only on long wave. "Today in Parliament" is to be extended on Fridays by 15 minutes to include coverage of Select Committees, but will also be broadcast only on long wave. A new Sunday evening programme, "The Westminster Hour" is to replace "In Committee", to which we will come in a moment. As hon. Members have pointed out, the new programme will, rather bizarrely, run throughout the year and therefore during weeks in which the House will not be sitting.

There will be a new nightly television programme covering Parliament, a new parliamentary web site as part of the BBC's News Online, and "The Week in Westminster" is to move from 11 am on Saturdays to 8.30 pm on Thursdays—a slot devoted to Parliament and politics all the year round. Again, the same point about the sittings of the House applies.

The BBC claims that the proposed changes represent a net gain in parliamentary coverage. Overall, there will be an additional 55 hours of parliamentary and Westminster-related programming a year on radio and an additional 24 hours a year on television. However, much of that radio coverage will be on long wave.

Arguments expressed in the debate have tested the effect of the new schedule. Will there be a net loss of listeners in the shift to long wave? The answer is clearly yes. On the BBC's own projections, the audience for "Yesterday in Parliament" is likely to fall from 1.3 million to 700,000, so a 50 per cent. increase in programme time will be offset by a near 50 per cent. fall in audience.

The move of "The Week in Westminster" from Saturdays, following Ned Sherrin's "Loose Ends", to 8.30 pm on Thursday evening, is likely to produce a fall in audience from 732,000 to—probably—nearer 300,000. As hon. Members have made clear, that is a particularly strange change as the week ends on Thursday evening for very few of us, especially not in the House. As much as hon. Members like getting away quite early on Thursday evenings, the House has been sitting and working hard until late on Thursday evenings—and last week one of the most significant debates of the year, which reflected the concern of people who live in the countryside and touched many people, occurred on a Friday. It would have been missed by the new programme on Thursday evening. The answer to the question about loss of listeners is therefore clear.

Will the quality fall? The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden and my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne made important points about the loss of "In Committee". Although the multi-item, magazine format programme, "The Westminster Hour" will run for 50 minutes—instead of the 30-minute "In Committee"—will that compensate for hard, detailed reporting of Committees? It is not comment on that work that the public ought to have the opportunity to hear; the question is how the PAC and other Select Committees are scrutinising the work of government. That is why Select Committees were set up in the first place.

Mr. Tyler: The Minister has already referred to the curious fact that some of the programmes will be broadcast when Parliament is not sitting. Have the governors and the chairman of the BBC given Ministers any indication of exactly what reportage they intend to include in "The Westminster Hour"? Will not it simply be speculative comment?

Mr. Fisher: They have not done so yet; that remains to be seen. As hon. Members have said, it is likely that the programme will talk about politics generally—perhaps the work of Whitehall particularly. Although such general political comment is important all 52 weeks of the year, it is rather different from the BBC's charter obligation to cover the House day by day.

Mr. Gale: Unless broadcasters provide the dedicated channels for Committee work and proceedings on the Floor of the House that I and others have advocated for a long time, there will be some selection. The Minister is being slightly churlish. If the programme continues when the House is not sitting, one of the criticisms—which we have all made—that an enormous amount of Committee and other work is never covered, may be addressed. There is no reason why, in hindsight, a look at some of the very important work in Select Committees and other Committees should not be taken. I would hope to hear and see such material used when the House is not sitting.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. Gentleman makes a point. In fact, although Select Committees do some work when the House is not sitting, they are notable for their work load during such times.

Mr. David Davis: I should make clear that my concern is not for the PAC, which gets enormous coverage on a weekly basis, but for the sterling work done by other Select Committees, which is not often covered on any other medium but "In Committee" and will be lost in an hour-long, magazine format programme designed to cover something exciting rather than valuable.

Mr. Fisher: Behind all this there is a general concern about dumbing down. The hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) made a good point about a dedicated programme, which would be possible now. Further opportunities will be possible once we have digital broadcasting. However, the problem of reach also applies to digital broadcasting. Is the charter obligation fulfilled by digital broadcasting to a very small audience, or are we talking about a more complicated matrix of reach and quality?

In some areas, reception on long wave, which is crucial to the changes is, according to the chairman of the BBC governors in a letter to Madam Speaker, "poor". Additional medium wave transmitters are used in Northern Ireland, northern England, east Scotland, Devon and Cornwall.

Mr. Bannister, who has been referred to, believes that the package taken in the round will enhance coverage of the proceedings of Parliament. It is clear that the strategy does not commend itself to the Public Accounts Committee—its Chairman has expressed his view forcefully—Madam Speaker or the House.

Mr. Spring: In the remaining few seconds of the debate, will the Minister indicate clearly his view and what he will say on behalf of the Government and his Department in discussions with the BBC about the future broadcasting of proceedings of the House?

Mr. Fisher: I make it clear that the Government's proper concern is the fulfilment of the charter and the charter agreement, which is what we are debating today. It is a complicated matter and I shall turn to it precisely.

Do the changes satisfy the obligation in the charter and the agreement? Does the way in which the BBC has proposed the changes satisfy the obligation to be accountable to Parliament? The answer to the first question must be yes. The programmes fulfil the obligation to transmit an impartial account day by day—even if that account is consciously scheduled so as to attract a smaller audience. The wording of the charter is about whether there is reporting day by day; that obligation is fulfilled. However, it is a matter of the spirit as well as the letter of the agreement, and that is what we are debating today.

Tomorrow, Sir Christopher Bland will hear in person the views that have been expressed today. In the next two weeks, before the Radio Times schedule is printed for 6 April—when the new programming is due to commence—he will have the opportunity to listen to the clearly expressed views of Parliament.

Broadclyst New Town

12.30 pm

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): My constituents who live in the district of East Devon have for some time faced the prospect of a new town being built immediately adjacent to the village of Broadclyst, which is quite close to the Exeter city boundary. When the Devon county structure plan first review deposit version was published in 1996, I sent—as the Member of Parliament representing the area—a written submission in response to that plan. In the main, I supported the views of East Devon district council. In my letter to the county environment director in December 1996, I said that my views reflected those of the district council in that I felt that a new town would be highly inappropriate, and I expressed some sympathy with the proposal for a limited village.

We all accept that there must be new housing—I do not approach the debate from the point of view that we do not need new housing. However, I hope that the debate will identify what is appropriate in terms of the number and location of houses. I said in my submission that the decision to build a new town in my constituency should be deferred for five years while a full audit of brown-field sites throughout the county of Devon was conducted. The term "brown-field sites"—which is common parlance these days—refers to disused land that was used for domestic or commercial purposes and can be recycled.

My view remained unchanged in September last year when the examination in public met at county hall for three weeks. I spent three days giving evidence to the public inquiry on behalf of my constituents about the overall number of new houses proposed in the county structure plan for Devon, and specifically about the proposed new town at Broadclyst. I repeated to the inquiry my request for a deferment of the decision to build the town until a full audit of brown-field sites throughout Devon was completed.

The inquiry heard evidence from many representatives, including some from the city of Exeter and from Torbay—I see that the hon. Members for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw) and for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) are both in their places. Perhaps not surprisingly, the representatives of the two local authorities declared that they had virtually no brown-field sites within their boroughs and that there was no alternative but to begin to encroach on the green-field sites in my constituency.

We must address two key questions when identifying housing need in Devon. The first is the assessment of total future numbers. An imperfect science seems to determine how many houses will be needed well into the future—in this case, we are looking beyond 2011. The Liberal Democrat-controlled county council has used inward migration figures of 7,330 a year to support its claim. In fact, the average over the past seven years has been just 5,000 a year, so there is already a difference of opinion in anticipating housing need.

At the examination in public, all parties around the table spent a great deal of time examining changes in social patterns within the region and discussing why we now needed more, and a greater variety of, housing. The inquiry engaged in constructive discussion, but there is always a thorny issue. Devon is a popular part of the country, where I am fortunate to have lived for 30 years. Other hon. Members will know Devon through their visits to that county. Devon is the sort of place where people from other parts of the country want to live. They often cannot fulfil that ambition until they retire, so Devon is known as a retirement area.

I do not wish the House to suppose for a moment that I am one of those who think that we should "keep those foreigners out" or that I am not receptive to the idea that others would like to enjoy the Devon life style. I do not want anyone to misinterpret the case that I am making. However, there is a difference between natural inward migration by people who choose to live in Devon and what I would describe as an out-and-out marketing campaign by those who have a vested interest in persuading people to move to Devon. As I said at the examination in public, I believe that such action distorts the figures.

The county believes that we must accommodate inward migration of 7,330 a year, but the historic figure is 5,000 a year. The difference equates to about 1,000 homes a year. If we apply the 5,000-a-year formula, we see that we would not need a new town in numerical terms—and certainly not one at Broadclyst. The second factor that comes into play is location. The East Devon district has no indigenous need for new housing on this scale. The location, which is adjacent to the Exeter city border, is an important reason why Broadclyst has been chosen: it is intended to accommodate the growth and overspill of the city of Exeter.

I have every sympathy with Exeter's need for housing. My constituency shares services and facilities supplied by Exeter, including the general hospital, and the city provides employment opportunities. We understand the importance of Exeter to our part of Devon. I am very fond of Exeter: both of my sons were born there, so what more can a mother say? I can pay no greater compliment to the city of Exeter. However, I do not believe that it is in the interests of my constituents in neighbouring East Devon to accommodate Exeter's problems on such a large scale. It is proposed that 3,000 homes be built in the new town to accommodate 8,000 people eventually.

The Liberal Democrat county council and the examination in public have ignored what local people want and the views that they reflect through me, their democratically elected representative. Before the examination in public response was published recently, I was advised by the county council that the lobby groups would not be pleased by the result of the inquiry. I was obliged to inform the council that I am the lobby group in my area, so I have no problem with the Council for the Protection of Rural England or any other lobby group approaching me and saying, "Look at this terrible result from the examination in public". I argued against the new town during that hearing, and I shall continue to lobby against it.

In the Western Morning News on Monday, deputy leader of the town council Rod Ruffle said:

"The view that I and some others in the group take is that providing two new towns in East Devon and the South Hams"—

a second town is planned for Devon—

"will create less damage to the countryside than expanding existing towns and villages."

Let us examine that claim. If he meant that the way forward was to expand on to green-field sites around and within existing towns and villages, he might have a point.

However, I and others have called for an independent audit of brown-field or recycled land to identify land suitable to accommodate new houses. If, at the end of such an audit, it was found that those sites would not accommodate a sufficient number, there might be a case for saying that we should consider having a bigger settlement. Areas of land in my constituency would then need to be considered, as would land in other constituencies.

However, that is not what has happened. At the EIP, we heard that Exeter city council had carried out an audit. Indeed, certain developers attended the EIP and said that they had also carried out an audit of brown-field sites. I am asking the Minister for an audit carried out, or certainly scrutinised, by a body that does not have a vested interest in the outcome. Clearly, if developers have their eye on a certain piece of land, they have everything to gain and nothing to lose by carrying out an audit that does not really reflect the full potential of brown-field sites elsewhere. I and many of my constituents are not convinced that a proper independent audit to determine potential brown-field sites has been carried out in Exeter or around it—certainly not in the county of Devon.

Surprisingly, and probably for the first time in my life, I found myself agreeing with the Deputy Prime Minister, when he said in a recent statement to the House:

"In future, we shall expect each regional planning conference to make a proper assessment of land availability and set regional targets for the use of recycled land. That has never been done before. It is an important change."

When the right hon. Gentleman tells us at the Dispatch Box that that has never been done before and is an important change, it begs the question of what sort of audit was carried out in the evidence to the EIP last September at county hall, Exeter. I welcome that news from the Deputy Prime Minister. He continued:

"it will sharpen the focus of policy and action on the ground", and that is exactly what this debate is about. He went on to say:

"Last week, I asked my Department to work with English Partnerships and local government to create a national database of land use, which will give local authorities reliable information on the amount of recycled land available for housing."—[Official Report, 23 February 1998; Vol. 306, c. 23.]

Clearly, since the Devon county structure plan was laid and we all took part in that examination in public in September, certain things have changed. In that spirit, I ask the Minister to intervene by giving me his support today for my original request. I am asking him to give guidance in cases such as that of Broadclyst, where we are caught between the devil and the deep blue sea. The county structure plan has been laid, we have had the examination in public and yet a useful policy is about to come forward that could affect the outcome. I repeat my request to the Minister to give guidance and to intervene, and to support what I asked for in 1996, which was a moratorium while the exercise is carried out. When we have examined fully exactly how much brown-field land there is in Devon and whether it is appropriate for the new housing need, a decision can be taken about whether to proceed with a new town.

Many people may think that no real decisions are taken until the democratic process—whereby all those different stages in the county structure plan invite people such as myself and others to participate, to make proposals reflecting our local views and to explain what residents think—is completed. I will, therefore, now turn to the examination in public held at county hall last September. Just after the first deposit version of the county structure plan was laid, a company called Wilcon Homes—

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): Surely the plan stems from a planning conference in 1992, when the Conservative party was in control of county hall as well as central Government. I agree with much of what the hon. Lady has said, but she is not going back far enough to find the origins of the plan. I hope that the Minister will impose certain duties on Devon to look at more brown-field sites, which could be done. However, the origins of the plan are not as recent as she is leading us to believe.

Mrs. Browning: I am about to read some correspondence from the previous Administration, as I took the matter up with them as well as making my representations to the Minister this morning.

As I was saying, in November 1996, Wilcon Homes put out literature and held a travelling road show to promote "Clyst Hayes". I had never heard of the place, but I have a leaflet here describing it and Clyst Hayes turns out to be the name that the developers had already given the new town. As is evident, this leaflet is not some cheap piece of literature—it is in full colour and glossy.

The road show went round many towns in east Devon, travelling as far away as Sidmouth and Axminster, which may not mean much to people here, but they are some little way from Broadclyst. Wilcon Homes asked people in neighbouring towns whether they wanted a new town at Broadclyst. Of course, they were told that without it, their own towns and villages would be developed further, so it is not surprising that they ticked the yes box in support. That was presented to the EIP as evidence of local support.

I wrote to the then Minister of State, Department of State for the Environment, who replied on 27 January 1997:

"It would not normally be appropriate for detailed discussions about the merits of a particular site to take place at an examination in public. The need to respect local preferences means that specific proposals for new settlements should normally only be promoted through district wide local plans. If, following the examination," which had yet to take place,

"the new settlement strategy is retained"—

we are talking broad principles and not specifics—

"then it would be for the East Devon District Council, as the local planning authority, to consider whether the location proposed by Wilcon Homes is acceptable."

However, the EIP was specific. The land in question—Clyst Hayes, the town named by the developers although they had not gone through the full democratic process—is mainly farm land and stretches from Broadclyst station to the A30, where it meets Exeter airport.

Mr. Ben Bradshaw (Exeter): Is the hon. Lady aware that one of the farmers who could make much money out of this project is the chairman of one of her local parish councils and was a leading light on the recent Countryside march? Does she not think that a little hypocritical?

Mrs. Browning: I am aware, as I was about to get to that point in my speech, that Wilcon Homes had taken options on the land some period beforehand and said so at the EIP. So the site was not being discussed in general terms. The EIP was site specific. In fact, it was so much so that technical experts were called to give evidence about the noise of ground testing aircraft engines as the proposed land runs up to the perimeter of Exeter airport, where some companies service engines. Exeter airport falls in my constituency, as the hon. Member for Exeter will know.

When it was revealed that the developers had already secured options on the land, as the hon. Member for Exeter said, and that the democratic process of the EIP was taking evidence from people whose businesses could affect the noise distraction for houses on a specific part of that land, I was extremely suspicious. What price democracy if democratically elected representatives such as myself take the trouble to go through the process of the county structure plan, make written submissions, consult constituents and give up three days in September to give evidence on their behalf, only to find that all that has gone on in the background?

The EIP found in favour of the new town—I was not terribly surprised. Moreover, it recommended that east Devon should accommodate 1,500 houses over and above those proposed in the structure plan. Frankly, I hold out little hope in either county hall or the results of the so-called democratic process of the county structure plan review.

Although I have written to the chief executive, again requesting that a moratorium be placed on the decision to build the new town, I would appreciate—especially in the light of the Government's recent announcement—the Minister's help and support, as I do not think that the democratic process has been properly observed. I believe that my constituents, particularly those who live in the Broadclyst area, deserve better.

12.50 pm

The Minister for London and Construction (Mr. Nick Raynsford): I congratulate the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) on securing this Adjournment debate, as I know that she has maintained an interest in this subject for a considerable time—indeed, since Devon county council first proposed its strategy for two new communities to help to provide for the county's housing needs. I noted her comments on both her constituency and the adjacent town of Exeter, which I know well. I entirely endorse her view that it is an extremely attractive town—

Mr. Bradshaw: City.

Mr. Raynsford: It is an extremely attractive city—I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw) is present for this debate.

The debate is very timely, following so closely the publication on 23 February of our paper, "Planning for the Communities of the Future", to which the hon. Lady referred. The paper sets out the results of our analysis of the system that we inherited for calculating and providing for the country's housing needs. It sets out our strategy for promoting more sustainable patterns of development and for encouraging urban renewal. We want to ensure that, where development is needed outside or adjacent to urban areas, it is sustainable—it must be combined with an active approach to the protection of the countryside.

That differs from the previous system, which has been seen as top-down, inflexible and too rigidly wedded to the principle of predict and provide. Our proposals represent a sustainable, democratic and comprehensive approach to meeting the country's housing needs—which, as the hon. Lady rightly stressed, is an important issue—while respecting the need to protect the countryside.

On the specific subject raised by the hon. Lady, my understanding is that the only proposal currently in the public domain for a new community in east Devon relates to the county council's strategy that was set out in the structure plan. The local planning authority has, as yet, no firm proposal to build a new town at Broadclyst. East Devon district council has not yet progressed its local plan to a point at which specific sites have been identified to accommodate growth in the district to 2011. Moreover, to my knowledge, no application for planning permission to build a new town has yet been submitted to the local planning authority.

I am aware, however, that in 1996, shortly after the Devon structure plan was placed on deposit, Wilcon Homes identified an area of land between Broadclyst railway station and Exeter airport on which it suggested that it would be possible to locate a new settlement of some 3,000 houses to be known as Clyst Hayes. The hon. Lady referred to some of the publicity that was attached to those proposals.

A new community in east Devon is a key element of the county council's strategy for accommodating growth, but the structure plan contains no site-specific locations—indeed, that would not have been appropriate for such a document. All the parties involved in the structure plan process accept that the appropriate place to identify site-specific locations is the local plan, which is to be prepared by the district council.

Mrs. Browning: I hope that the Minister heard even a small portion of the discussions about the site at the EIP.

Mr. Raynsford: I assure the hon. Lady that I shall mention the EIP in a moment.

Proposal N2 of the structure plan states:

"A new community should be provided for within East Devon District, within the Exeter Area of Economic Activity as shown on the Key Diagram. The new community should include provision for about 3,000 dwellings, associated employment land provision and a range of community and other associated facilities."

The proposal also sets out the general criteria to be met before the community could be permitted. Those criteria provide for the community to be located where it can, first, be assimilated into the landscape of the area; secondly, avoid as far as possible the use of significant areas of the best and most versatile agricultural land; thirdly, be related to, but separate from, existing settlements; fourthly, access the Exeter-Waterloo rail line by means of a new railway station; fifthly, be accessible to the high-quality road network and the local highway system; and, sixthly, be developed without adversely affecting the operation of Exeter airport—it should not be affected by unacceptable levels of aircraft noise.

The county proposed to provide in East Devon district some 9,700 new dwellings, of which some 3,500 should be in the main area of economic activity—about 5,600 new dwellings were proposed for Exeter. The Exeter main area of economic activity was identified by the county council as a key location for the future development of the county's economy, which was reflected in the provision for 9,100 dwellings in the area between 1995 and 2011.

The county considered that there was insufficient capacity in existing settlements to meet such provision. It found that expansion on the periphery of Exeter was severely restricted by topography, agricultural land and other physical constraints, that opportunities to expand other settlements in the area were limited, and that the scale of such expansion would in any case be such that the character and setting of an expanded settlement could not be retained.

Mr. Bradshaw: That is the problem—Exeter has expanded to its limits. It is surrounded by lovely green, rolling hills, and further expansion on the periphery would alter the character of the city out of all recognition.

Mr. Raynsford: I entirely accept my hon. Friend's point, which highlights the dilemma of trying to ensure that development pressures are accommodated in such a way as to respect the character of the area and the countryside, and to avoid creating an unnecessary urban sprawl that would damage people's enjoyment of the countryside.

Mrs. Browning: I cannot let the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw) get away with his comment. Those lovely green, rolling hills on which his constituents look out are all mine.

Mr. Raynsford: I am delighted that there is unanimity across the Chamber on the attractiveness of the countryside in that area, which, as a regular visitor, I entirely endorse.

To meet the identified need, the county believed that a new community offered the only satisfactory and sustainable solution. To accommodate the proposed level of development for the Exeter area, it considered that the new community would need to provide for 3,000 dwellings and land for any associated employment. That provision was considered the minimum at which a new community could achieve some self-sufficiency and support an adequate range of local facilities and services.

The county accepted that new communities represented a major new approach to development in the county. It wanted sustainable development of the highest-quality design; an integrated transport system that would promote the use of modes of transport other than the private car; and development that would minimise not only the need to travel, but waste and pollution.

After the structure plan had been placed on deposit in November 1996, there was a six-week period for objections and representations to be submitted to the county council. A panel was appointed, led by an independent chairman, Professor Graham Shaylor, to conduct the examination in public to which the hon. Lady has referred. The EIP was held between 16 September and 9 October 1997. The panel submitted its report to the county council in January 1998—it was made public shortly afterwards.

A number of key issues were debated at the examination by selected participants with a range of interests—I know that the hon. Lady took a close interest in that process. Relevant discussions included the strategy, the countywide provision for housing and the distribution of development in the Exeter, east Devon and mid-Devon areas. In those discussions, the county council's proposals for the overall level and distribution of housing provision and the proposals for two new communities were debated in considerable depth.

Having heard all the representations to the EIP, the panel concluded that the overall housing provision for the county should be increased, in line with household projections, from 74,500 to 79,000, which was some 4,000 less than the figure that was given in the regional planning guidance for the south-west. The allocation for Exeter city was recommended to be increased by 800 to 6,400.

The panel felt that, in east Devon, there was sufficient scope for new development to be assimilated into the landscape and that the existence of a good road and rail infrastructure would help to ensure that new development was not entirely dependent on the private car. It therefore recommended that housing provision be increased by 1,500 to 11,200.

While the panel supported the concept of a new community east of Exeter, arguments about the specific location were not part of its brief. The panel felt strongly that the strategic importance of this area to the county as a whole, its benefits in locational and economic terms and the high level of unmet need in that part of the county should be considered.

The structure planning authority for Devon currently comprises the county council, along with Dartmoor and Exmoor national park authorities, and, with effect from 1 April, they will be joined by Plymouth and Torbay unitary authorities. Together, they will consider the additional information provided by the examination in public, along with the written objections and representations received, and decide whether a new community is the most sustainable solution to provide for the housing needs—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. We now come to the next Adjournment debate.

Health Services (Birmingham)

1 pm

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise with the House and with my hon. Friend the Minister important questions that face health services in England's second city. It is particularly appropriate that the debate takes place today, as Birmingham health authority is in the middle of a major review aimed at developing a strategic framework for health care in the city into the new millennium. In putting behind us the destructive, dog-eat-dog days of the internal market, the Government have urged health authorities to take on a strategic and visionary role. I welcome the fact that Birmingham health authority is attempting to do that and I emphasise the importance of a full partnership with the people of the city.

It is difficult to look to the future of health care in Birmingham when the legacy of the past hangs over us so much. In the last Parliament, I had several Adjournment debates on bungled reorganisations and financial scandals in the then South Birmingham health authority and West Midlands regional health authority. There were Public Accounts Committee reports on those authorities. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) was also very vocal on the issue. A climate of mistrust remains about any proposals for change and for the future of health care in the city. I understand that. As well as addressing my hon. Friend the Minister today, I address people in Birmingham. The time has come to put that mistrust behind us.

The services offered by health service staff in Birmingham are nationally and, in many cases, internationally renowned. The work of Birmingham Children's hospital and of the burns unit at the University Hospital Birmingham NHS trust, and that hospital's work on cancer and renal disease, are all internationally renowned. The University Hospital Birmingham NHS trust, Birmingham Women's hospital, Birmingham Children's hospital, Birmingham Heartlands hospital, the City hospital, Royal Orthopaedic hospital and Good Hope hospital are internationally and nationally renowned, and that remained the case throughout the scandals. As far as the health authority is concerned, those days of financial scandals and deficits are over. It was painful, but the problems were faced and dealt with.

Now pioneering work is being done in Birmingham on the local commissioning that forms the cornerstone of the Government's policy and is a consistent theme running through the recent White Paper and the Green Paper. Birmingham health authority, in conjunction with the voluntary sector and the city council, has recently made a bid for a health action zone.

We are getting things together in Birmingham, but our needs are still acute. The care provided by staff is second to none, but all too often it takes place in buildings and surroundings barely fit for this century, let alone the next. The last hospital built in Birmingham was Queen Elizabeth hospital. People in Birmingham sometimes think that the name refers to the present Queen, but it does not. The hospital was built in 1938.

I crossed swords with the former regional health authority on several occasions over its bungled reorganisations, but one matter about which it was right was Birmingham's major capital investment needs. It estimated that about £500 million of capital investment was needed in Birmingham's health infrastructure over 12 years. We have seen between £120 million and £130 million of that so far. We still have no news about the rest.

Let us take the example of breast cancer services at the University Hospital Birmingham NHS trust. The services are first class and Calman accredited. An integrated approach is taken to breast care. However, if a woman goes for a mammogram in a hut at Selly Oak hospital and there are more patients than chairs in that hut at any one time, there is nowhere for her even to sit down. That is not appropriate in this day and age. If she needs a biopsy, that will be done the same day and she will get the results the same day. That is great, but she will probably have to sit in a corridor at what may be the most stressful and distressing time of her life. If she then needs breast surgery, she will go Queen Elizabeth hospital. She will be treated on a ward where the staff are first class, but there are simply not enough toilets for the patients.

The £200 million that the Government have made available to improve breast care is welcome. It will significantly improve radiotherapy services in the city and at the trust, but there is still a massive job to be done to tackle problems such as those that I outlined. Breast care is just one example. Many other examples could be given.

We need new investment; of that there is no doubt. We need a major programme of building refurbishment and replacement in Birmingham's hospitals. The health authority has some ideas and others have come from many quarters. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to speak to his right hon. and hon. Friends in the Government and recognise the real needs in Birmingham.

On the framework in which any future investment will take place, I understand that the private finance initiative remains the cornerstone of major capital investments under this Government. Under the previous Government, there was one major problem with the PFI. Whatever else could be said about it, it did not produce any hospitals. At least under the new Government it is working far better.

However, the PFI can be a straitjacket to investment. In meeting investment needs not only in Birmingham but elsewhere, my hon. Friend the Minister must ensure that the needs of the service and of patients are put first and the investment framework is built around it, rather than trying to shoe-horn the needs of patients and services into a given investment framework.

Not only hospital development is important to Birmingham's health services. One of the strengths of the local health authority's review is that it places hospital development in a context and reinforces and embodies the vision in the White Paper. Unless primary care works, the rest of the health service cannot work properly or effectively. Pioneering work has already been done in Birmingham in developing locality commissioning. A multi-fund has been set up. Fundholders got together, even under the previous Government, perhaps to the embarrassment of the Conservatives, to work co-operatively and pool their resources in the interests of patients.

The problems that we face are still huge. In Birmingham, life expectancy is below the national average. We have one of the highest perinatal mortality rates in the country. We have one of the highest proportions of babies of low birth weight. We are in the worst quartile for coronary heart disease. Birmingham is the seventh most deprived health district in the country. Integrated primary care and anti-poverty strategies are therefore vital. That is why I welcome the White Paper, the Green Paper and the new deal. That is why it is so important that we have a national minimum wage to tackle poverty. However, if those policies are to work, we also need to tackle the problems of the infrastructure of primary care in our city.

In the next 10 years, between 35 and 40 per cent. of general practitioners who serve the most deprived areas of our city will retire. Unless we tackle that problem, we cannot develop the type of primary care that we need in our city. The health authority, GPs and other health professionals are adopting imaginative and innovative approaches to developing primary care, but they need support. They are getting that through the White Paper and the Green Paper, but they need infrastructure support and resources.

I shall deal briefly with the way in which resources are allocated in the health service and the problems that that creates for Birmingham. Sadly, the current resource allocation formula does not meet Birmingham's needs. As I said, the city suffers from multiple deprivation. The great flaw in the resource allocation formula is that age-related need is not related to deprivation in the city.

The formulas are rather complicated, but the effect is real enough. As we know from the days of the Black report onwards, if substantial parts of the population are poor, that means lower life expectancy: people die in greater numbers before they reach old age. The current allocation formula can mean that such a city gets relatively fewer resources, rather than more. The result is that in Birmingham the health service gets about £533 per resident, which is less than many other cities and less than Kensington and Chelsea, and Westminster.

Studies undertaken by Birmingham health authority show that if the age and deprivation measures were taken into account in the same formula, the city would get an extra £17 million in resources to support its health care.

I welcome the Government's approach to the national health service. We are putting the days of the internal market behind us. The Government have shown that we are prepared to put more resources into health care and to give the NHS the priority that it needs, which is especially appropriate this year, the 50th anniversary of the NHS.

In Birmingham there is a climate of mistrust and problems from the past, but we as a city must come to terms with them. We must come to an agreement about the kind of health care that we want and how to develop it. We are making a start and looking towards a primary care-led national health service, with clear pathways to quick diagnostic treatment where that is appropriate, and stays in hospital for the necessary time, without keeping people in hospital if that is not the most suitable place for them to be. The necessary support must be provided, whether through intermediate care or home support. Where medical conditions require specialised treatment, we have the people in Birmingham who can provide that in tertiary centres in our magnificent hospital services, but the buildings are not up to scratch.

We need to develop innovative plans to take those services into the next century. We are prepared to do that, but we need support from Government. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will study closely what is happening to the health service in Birmingham. We welcome the reviews that are taking place, but we recognise that for those reviews to result in agreement among Birmingham people and to overcome the climate of suspicion that has lasted too long, the resources must be made available to ensure that we have the primary care networks that will be vital to health services in the future, and the investment in our hospital services that Birmingham needs.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): My hon. Friend is right to refer to the climate of mistrust that has developed in Birmingham whenever we consider proposals for the reconfiguration of our health services. That is largely because people feel that change is finance driven to make savings and cut hospital resources. If we are to overcome that mistrust, it is essential that the health authority brings people along with its plans. Because of the perception that private finance is the only way to get capital resources into the health services, only schemes for which private finance is obtainable will be promoted, rather than schemes that are genuinely needed. That problem must be addressed if we are to get confidence in Birmingham—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The intervention is far too long.

Mr. Burden: My hon. Friend makes an important point. The debate around private finance will go on.

It is important for my hon. Friend the Minister to hear what I am about to say, and for it to be heard outside the Chamber. The climate of mistrust is understandable, as my hon. Friend and I have acknowledged. As the debate continues, people must listen to what is being said, whether by the health authority, the trusts or the other stakeholders, rather than the worst possible construction immediately being put on every document and submission. That results in trench warfare that sends all the wrong messages to Government and does not move the health debate forward in Birmingham.

My hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak has adopted a highly constructive and positive view of health services in the city and has worked on that for a long time. My other hon. Friends in the Birmingham group of Labour Members have also done so. It is important that, as a city, we get ourselves together, work out what we want and go for it. If we do that, I am sure that we will get support from the Government.

1.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Paul Boateng): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) on securing time to debate this very important subject. In a health authority area that encompasses seven acute trusts, two community trusts and two mental health trusts, and spends over £500 million annually on health services, it is critical that the long-term strategy for those services is robust. My hon. Friend's interest in the matter and his contribution over a number of years enormously assist us in taking forward the health interests of Birmingham constructively, as does the involvement of several of my other hon. Friends from Birmingham in the debate.

[Mr. Paul Boateng]

It is important to note that the debate—the tenor of which we got this afternoon—and the discussion are far from over. The conclusion of Birmingham health authority's recent public consultation on 2 March was an important starting point in developing a long-term strategy. The term "starting point" is probably a misnomer, because, as my hon. Friend mentioned and as anyone who takes an interest in the matter will know, there is a lively history of such reviews in Birmingham.

We must make sure that we do not end up with a bungled or botched job. That characterised the activities of the previous Government in relation to the health service in Birmingham. We must move to a sustainable and sustaining settlement of the outstanding issues.

A previous plan developed in the late 1980s, entitled "Building a Healthy Birmingham", failed because of the sheer scale of the capital investment that was required and its tendency to exclude primary care. It required an investment of £550 million, mainly for acute services, and a significant increase in acute beds. The previous Government's obsession with the market, the introduction of capital charges and the way in which health care was developed meant that the scale of the investment required became unsustainable.

My hon. Friend graphically described the need to invest in Birmingham, not least in a respect dear to this Government—the importance of ensuring that we tackle the scourge of breast cancer in a way that does not add to the suffering and pressures of those experiencing this condition. There is a need for more investment and to take forward proposals capable of commanding the support of the entire community.

The debate in Birmingham is taking place against a background of what my hon. Friend described as mistrust and suspicion, but we must look at the positive aspects. The relocation of the cramped and rundown Birmingham Children's hospital to the site of the former Birmingham general hospital—which will be completed in May 1998, and forms an investment of some £30 million—is good news and will deliver health gains.

There have been achievements in terms of the reprovisioning of the existing single-specialty hospitals on to acute hospital sites, where they would have all the clinical and support service back-up needed for modern health care. This has taken place after public consultation and—excluding the Royal Orthopaedic hospital, where special considerations applied—has been achieved with success.

The newly merged health authority in Birmingham must ensure that momentum is not lost, and it will ensure that steady development, year on year, keeps pace with the changing NHS. Birmingham health authority held a series of stakeholder conferences in June and July last year, each one based in the catchment area of one of the cities for main acute trusts. The contribution from those conferences formed part of the strategic planning which culminated in the consultation document.

The document sets out a number of choices, each reflecting an aspect of health care and looking at the effects of social deprivation on health. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to Birmingham's specific problems. We have seen a positive change in the introduction of the needs element of the weighted capitation formula. Birmingham was the eighth highest gainer in the country and is now within 0.03 per cent. of its weighted capitation target.

My hon. Friend referred to the problems associated with providing high-quality primary care and the reliance on single GP practices and aging GPs, and the retirement which inevitably follows. Those will require careful managing. Inevitably, that must take place within the key principles laid down in the White Paper. The emphasis is very much on partnership.

The days in which the NHS was bedevilled by the obsession with competition and the market, which characterised the previous Government, are over. The emphasis in the new NHS is on co-operation and collaboration. That is good news. We want to maximise care for patients and shift the focus on to the quality of care, so that excellence is guaranteed to those patients.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Will the Minister take account of the lack of GP recruitment within Birmingham? Simply saying that that "needs careful management" may not be adequate, given the tremendous need in some parts of the city—particularly around the city hospital.

Mr. Boateng: My hon. Friend speaks with authority on these issues, and she is right to draw the attention of those with responsibility for recruitment in Birmingham to the need to ensure that the requirements she has highlighted are taken on board.

In responding to the needs of the times, we must look at a number of models for primary care and the possible creation of ambulatory care and diagnostic centres. We must examine acute assessment, emergency admissions and intermediate care facilities for rehabilitation. The consultation document addresses those issues, which are important—particularly to the care of the elderly. We want to make sure that the lives of elderly people in Birmingham are improved in terms of their capacity to contribute actively to the community.

Dr. Lynne Jones: On rehabilitation services, there is a worry in Birmingham that the use of nursing homes and other facilities for care which was previously provided in hospital could lead us down a slippery slope towards charging. Will my hon. Friend assure us that the Government will reject that approach?

Mr. Boateng: I am anxious to make sure that we have a mixed market. We must recognise the contributions of the voluntary and private sectors, and we need to make sure that managers are innovative and prepared to look at new ways of delivering rehabilitation and recuperation. I strongly urge Birmingham health authority and the local authority to think boldly and imaginatively. They must work together to meet the needs of this vulnerable section of our society.

We have issued guidance to the health authorities as part and parcel of the White Paper principles and how we intend to implement our proposals. The integrated programme of action that we set out in "The New NHS" and those elements of the Green Paper "Our Healthier Nation" is where early progress needs to be made. That is the background against which decisions will be made about health care in Birmingham.

My hon. Friends will understand that it is not my place, or that of any other member of the ministerial team, to comment on the health authority's specific proposals. There may come a time when that is necessary, but it is not now. The Government expect all strategic plans to take forward the interest of patients and health and social care, and to take into account the principles outlined in the White Paper. We want to make sure that we work together in a way that puts the patient at the heart of all that we do. The primary care groups and their development are important, and we must make sure that the local authority and the health authority work ever closer together.

On a recent visit to Birmingham Heartlands, I was enormously impressed at the way in which the NHS and the local authority are working together, and the real contribution that is made by social workers and clinical professionals alike. It is in that spirit of co-operation and collaboration that we will best serve the interests of all the people of Birmingham.

I am grateful to hon. Members who have contributed to the debate, and to my hon. Friend the Member for Northfield for taking the lead in bringing this important matter to the attention of the House.

Animal Testing

1.29 pm

Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): I welcome the fact that we are having the first debate this Session on the important matter of animal experimentation, which is of considerable importance to many people in this country and to many hon. Members from all parties. I hope that the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, during the debate.

I have given notice to the Minister's office of one or two of the points that I intend to raise. I hope that he will find that helpful, and that it will mean that the debate is fuller than it might otherwise have been.

In the United Kingdom, 2.7 million Home Office-approved animal experiments are carried out each year. These are "likely to cause . . . pain, suffering, distress or lasting harm."

according to the "Statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals". In addition, the Ministry of Defence conducts around 11,000 experiments a year, a figure which has almost trebled since 1992, when the present right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark) was Minister of State.

Mr. Alan Clark (Kensington and Chelsea): I intervene to clarify for the record that it was after I had left the Ministry of Defence that the number of experiments trebled. As the hon. Gentleman put it, it might have sounded as though they increased during my period of tenure. While I was there, I did my level best to keep them to an absolute minimum.

Mr. Baker: I am grateful for that clarification. I was going to make the point that the number of experiments has risen—unduly, in my view—since the right hon. Gentleman left his post.

Can we as a human race feel comfortable that we are using animals in this way to such an extent; that we place them in unfamiliar surroundings and often subject them to painful and gruesome experiments? I intend to show that the experimentation carried out in this country is excessive, the results are unreliable, and that alternatives exist that have yet to be fully and properly exploited.

I welcome the Government's decision to end the testing of cosmetics products, but, in reality, it has made virtually no difference to the numbers, stopping only about 800 procedures out of 2.7 million. What is more, cosmetic ingredient testing has not been banned, and it accounts for most cosmetic testing on animals. Almost 2,000 cosmetic ingredient tests took place in 1996. A supplementary note from the Home Office, published in November last year, talked about cosmetic ingredient testing. I would welcome clarification from the Minister about whether the Government have reached a conclusion on that matter.

As all cosmetic products can be classified as vanity products, do the Government agree that a comprehensive ban on all cosmetic ingredient testing is essential?

Will the Government set a target to reduce the number of animal experiments that will be carried out during the lifetime of this Parliament, and give an absolute guarantee that fewer experiments will be carried out each year at the end of it than at present? That commitment is terribly important, and I hope that the Minister will respond to it when he replies.

At a fundamental level, animal experimentation rests on a view of reality that sees living beings, in all their individuality and unpredictability, as a set of interchangeable and predictable machine parts. It examines one aspect of the body in isolation from the huge range of influences, both environmental and subjective, that affect it. It ignores the whole picture and focuses on a small detail.

That strictly limiting and short-sighted viewpoint seeks to justify the extrapolation of data from one species of animal to another. I question the very basis of the value of animal experimentation in certain circumstances. There are plenty of examples to show that the logic is fundamentally flawed. All animals are different. It is patently obvious that a mouse does not resemble a human; neither does a rat or a rabbit, yet all those animals are used in experiments, in the claim that they will benefit humans.

The fact is that all animals, including humans, react differently to different substances. They metabolise substances in different ways. They can tolerate different levels of any given substance. They obtain and need vitamins in different ways. They have different life cycles. They have different digestive and circulatory systems. Most important, all species suffer from different diseases. So how can we be sure that the experiments are reliable?

I give the Minister examples of where these experiments are unreliable: lemon juice kills cats; parsley kills parrots; penicillin kills guinea pigs; strychnine is harmless to monkeys, as is arsenic to sheep; insulin causes malfunctions in chickens, rabbits and mice; aspirin causes birth defects in monkeys; and thalidomide is safe to guinea pigs. The list is substantial and clearly demonstrates that we are foolish to rely on the reliability of animal experiments. What will the Minister do to tackle the uncertainty of the results of animal testing?

I deal now with some of the animal experiments that take place, and will look at the matter from not a human-centred but an animal-centred point of view. One of the common procedures is the LD50 test. Animals are dosed with various quantities of a substance to find out how much is needed to kill half the animals in a particular batch. The test is crude and unscientific, and causes immense suffering to animals, yet such tests have risen dramatically in recent years, to almost 200,000 in 1996.

The Government said in November that they would press for the LD50 test to be used only when "absolutely necessary". What does absolutely necessary mean? What steps is the Minister taking to eliminate that test? Why can he not simply ban it? When is it necessary? I am not convinced that it is at all necessary. The Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 requires animal suffering to be weighed against the benefit of the research before a licence is made. I suggest that, on that basis alone, the LD50 test should be banned.

Another common and particularly painful experiment is the Draize test, which is used to measure irritation. As the Minister will know, rabbits are often chosen for eye studies because they cannot blink. How appalling that animals that cannot blink are used to measure irritation in the eye. Guinea pigs are used for skin experiments. Other tests are simply beyond belief. One has to ask what on earth is the motivation behind them. Rats are forced to breathe smoke bomb fumes to investigate the effects on the lung to see whether oxygen treatment is beneficial. It is beyond belief that such tests continue.

Animals suffer not only during the tests but before and after. I draw the Minister's attention to early-day motion 802, which I tabled, with other hon. Members who are present today, to draw attention to the fact that primates have been transported to this country from Indonesia and other places, with journeys lasting up to 58 hours, in small wooden crates in aeroplane holds. The animals suffer considerably before they even arrive in a laboratory. That early-day motion has been supported by 61 hon. Members from all parts of the House.

So what great human endeavour justifies the imposition of this suffering? Forty-nine per cent. of experiments are carried out for commercial gain, not for health purposes but to produce a washing-up liquid that is more competitive, or a "new improved" scourer, or a shoe polish that cleans more effectively. The other main source is university work, which accounts for a further 29 per cent. A great deal of university work is, of course, funded by commercial concerns. In other words, animals are being made to suffer purely to improve the financial profitability of private companies. That is totally unethical.

Furthermore, the drug industry's involvement cannot be overstated. The structure and context of medical research are such that its fundamental priority is to satisfy the pharmaceutical industry's thirst for profit, which is now the largest in the world. That is the motivation. It seems that, as far as the drugs companies are concerned, a pound of flesh equals a pound of profit.

Large numbers of experiments on animals, many of which are repetitive, are carried out to test weapons—experiments such as firing a bullet into the skull of a monkey or blasting body armour worn by a pig. I have already mentioned the near trebling of the number of experiments by the Ministry of Defence at Porton Down.

Here is another question for the Minister. Will the Government honour their pre-election pledge to forbid the use of animals in the developing and testing of weapons? I hope that he heard that question. It is most important, and it is a matter of ethics.

As I have said, we as a human race are foolish to trust the reliability of medical experiments on animals. I also want to draw attention to the fact that many of the experiments are geared towards the elite end of the market, designed to perfect expensive operations such as organ transplants, from which most of the world's population will never benefit.

Such experiments are for the benefit of a small minority, and do nothing for the basic human health of most people, either in this country or in the rest of the world. While we are busy experimenting and perfecting organ transplants, millions of people lack clean water, basic shelter and food. Perhaps we should devote more of our resources to those purposes.

The Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 has been subject to some review, but I am still concerned about the work load of the inspectors. In 1996, there were only 17 inspectors whose work load included monitoring 14,870 licence holders, granting 2,202 new licences, assessing progress in 3,869 projects, assessing and approving 667 new projects and inspecting 300 establishments covering 2.7 million experiments.

It seems to me that we need a new super breed of inspector to carry out all those functions. If the 1986 Act, flawed as it is, is to work properly, we need to appoint more inspectors and ensure that they are given the proper resources.

To be fair, I must admit that the Government have recognised the problem. I believe that something is being put back into the budget.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth) indicated assent.

Mr. Baker: I welcome that; the cuts have not gone ahead. Credit where credit is due—but, even with that restoration, there will still be a great shortage of inspectors under the Act.

I have other concerns about the openness of the system, and I am unhappy that so much of the information on animal experiments is secret. We are not allowed to know details about the establishments and individuals licensed under the Act. The Government's commitment to freedom of information, which I greatly welcome, means that we should open up the process far more. How does the Minister intend to combine the freedom of information commitment with the secrecy inherent in the 1986 Act?

I must wind up my speech now, because the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) and the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea want to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. They have cleared that with me, and have my permission to intervene in the debate.

We must aim for animals to be respected, with the legitimate rights to dignity and protection that we, as human beings, would expect. They have real feelings and can experience real pain. It is unethical for animals to be seen as a resource to be used as we please, and I await the day when all except the most essential experiments have been brought to an end. The Government should make a clear commitment to starting towards that aim now, by setting a target for reducing animal experiments.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West) rose—

Mr. Alan Clark rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Is the Minister happy to allow the two other Members to be called?

Mr. George Howarth indicated assent.

1.41 pm

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): I congratulate the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) on securing the debate and thank him for his generosity in allowing me to take part in it. I also congratulate him on his skilful and persistent use of parliamentary questions to reveal much new knowledge about the secretive business of animal experiments, especially those taking place at Porton Down.

I, too, exonerate the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark) as regards any suggestion that I might have made that he could have been responsible for any increase in experiments. Indeed, as I understand the figures, he was entirely responsible for a decrease in the number of experiments during his period in office, when he had some influence over such matters.

As someone who worked in laboratories all my life until I entered Parliament, I emphasise that animal experiments are poor science; they are unreliable and ineffective. I agree with every word that the hon. Member for Lewes said, and I advise those who claim that animal experiments give reliable results to consider any one of dozens of cases that I could cite.

I could mention Eralden, Opren and other drugs, but it was thalidomide which caused one of the most painful experiences that we have had with a chemical drug. Thalidomide came on the market having been tested not only on many other animals but on rabbits, which are regarded as being more sensitive, and even on pregnant rabbits, with no sign of difficulty. Only when, after the terrible deformities occurred in human babies, the scientists went back and tried the drug on another breed of rabbit did they reproduce the fault. It is nonsense to believe that there is any kind of exact science involved in that. Far more reliable alternatives already exist. There are simulations and the use of tissue outside the body, both of which are far better science.

We all agree that those experiments represent the abuse of animals on a scale that dwarfs all the other animal abuse about which we get so excited. We have no right to conduct them. It is true that a tiny number of experiments can be defended, but that is all. The scale on which experiments are practised, mostly for commercial purposes, cannot be defended.

As an intelligent species, we stand accused of using defenceless animals as though they were inert chemicals with no feelings. We have no right to do that, and I hope that the Government will hear the debate and there will be a practical and swift response.

1.45 pm

Mr. Alan Clark (Kensington and Chelsea): I join in the tributes to the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker), who has a good record on this topic. I always listen to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) with interest and enjoy his contributions, even when they relate to subjects that we are not allowed to talk about or expand on in the Chamber. I was interested to hear that his comments today were founded on personal and scientific experience, and they are all the more valuable on that account.

I have two questions to ask the Minister. The first is about the so-called commercial confidentiality, which was raised by the hon. Member for Lewes, and which involves tremendous and horrendous repetition of experiments. There should be some way of ensuring that a particular experiment occurs only once, and the results are then put into a pool from which anyone can draw by paying a fee—preferably to a Government agency to fund more inspectors. Results should not be kept private within whatever corporation funded the experiment, so that the experiment has to be repeated 10, 20, 30 or 100 times to produce the same result on 10, 20, 30 or 100 wretched animals to verify what may happen if an identical or a similar product is marketed.

[Mr. Alan Clark]

My second point is about the conditions in which animals are kept. The hon. Member for Lewes talked about primates being brought here in crates in holds on 55-hour journeys, but many of the conditions in which animals are kept in laboratories are by no means perfect, either. Conditions are inhumane both before and after the experiments, when animals are usually simply destroyed.

A serious lack of humanity creeps into the treatment of animals the moment they are regarded as something for commercial and industrial exploitation. They lose their identity as living creatures. Surely this area should be better regulated?

The Minister and his party gave assurances in their election manifesto, which were greatly welcomed by many people in the electorate, including myself, that they would do something about the problem. I cast no aspersions on the way in which the Minister plays his part in the Department, but I know about the pressures that exist when one is behind a ministerial desk, and the way in which officials produce arguments along the lines of "On the one hand . . . on the other hand . . . but in conclusion, Minister, we really feel that . . . ".

Those views are reproduced in documents, and I hope that the Minister will be strong enough to override them and discharge the obligation that his party undertook in its manifesto, which gained it many votes. I hope that, in the 12 minutes that remain, we shall not be treated to the Minister's simply reading out a brief composed by his officials to cover everybody's tracks and to explain that "There is really nothing much that can be done for a bit—because . . . "

1.48 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): That might have been the kind of response that the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark) gave when he was a Minister, but I hope that I shall not fall into that trap.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) on his success in obtaining the debate. He has asked 27 written parliamentary questions this year alone on animal experimentation. I make no criticism of him for that; it is a measure of how assiduously he pursues his interest in the subject. My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) is also a regular correspondent with my Department on the subject.

I am not entirely confident that, in the time available to me, I shall be able to cover all the points that have been made, so I issue a public invitation to the hon. Member for Lewes to come to the Home Office to discuss the issues that he has raised. My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State, Lord Williams of Mostyn, and I would welcome such a meeting, and I hope that he will take up that invitation.

I acknowledge, as I am sure will the hon. Gentleman, that my noble Friend, who has prime responsibility for this area, has assiduously pursued the Government's agenda and we are making some progress. The hon. Gentleman was good enough to acknowledge that with regard to a couple of areas.

We seek to ensure that the highest possible standards of animal welfare are implemented and that animals are used in scientific procedures only where there is a clear justification for so doing.

We are promoting what the Department calls the three Rs—reducing the number of animals used, refining procedures to minimise suffering and, where possible, replacing animal use. In particular, with respect to primates, we are making progress on LD50 testing and cosmetic testing.

As the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, we have increased the budget that has been made available to the Animal Procedures Committee to develop alternatives to the use of animals from £182,000 to £259,000. In the greater scheme of things, that may not be an enormous sum of money, but it is a considerable increase in what was a quite small budget. It is fair that that should be acknowledged.

We also intend to pursue relevant measures throughout Europe rather than risk exporting animal experimentation to countries with less rigorous controls than ours. We must ensure that measures are sustainable and do not unnecessarily disadvantage United Kingdom research, medicine and industry or compromise public safety.

The hon. Gentleman acknowledged that we have secured an end to the testing of cosmetic products on animals and we are now exploring the possibility of extending that ban to the testing of cosmetic ingredients intended primarily for vanity products. No new licences to test cosmetic products or ingredients have been issued since May. Our legal advisers have cautioned the Secretary of State that he has no grounds, at this time, to revoke the existing licences.

No new licences to test tobacco or alcohol products have been issued since 1 May, and no new licences are in force which would allow such testing. On 6 November, we announced a ban on the testing of tobacco and alcohol products.

Three new inspectors have been recruited since June and further funding has been secured for a further three inspectors, bringing the complement to 21.

We have announced that some form of ethical review process will be required in all establishments from 1 April 1999.

The review of biotechnology and the patenting of animals is a matter primarily for the Department of Trade and Industry, but it follows such matters closely.

In addition to the pre-election pledges to which the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea referred, we have also announced a ban on the use of great apes, that the use of ascitic animals in monoclonal antibody production will be phased out, and that the number of animal welfare experts on the Animal Procedures Committee will be increased. New appointments are expected shortly.

The hon. Member for Lewes asked about the transportation of live animals. We shall allow the catching of wild primates only if there is a specific and exceptional justification for so doing. Therefore, the onus is on proving that that is necessary. If shorter journey times are possible and animals can be flown directly to the UK, we would welcome that. As the hon. Gentleman will know, many airlines have already stopped such work as a result of public pressure.

The hon. Gentleman, like the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea, referred to the commercial gain of companies engaged in such work. Some suggest that nearly 50 per cent. of experiments are carried out purely for commercial gain. Nearly 50 per cent. are carried out in commercial establishments, but, in many cases, company profitability is not the factor most often taken into account in making a cost-benefit assessment. Hon. Members will be aware that that process goes on. Many experiments carried out in commercial establishments are to meet the requirements of international regulators that products be proved safe for use, manufacture and distribution. Most commercial organisations exist to make a profit—they would not be developing new drugs or other products if they were not profitable—but that fact militates against the argument that such commercial undertakings are entirely profit driven.

With regard to cosmetic ingredient testing, the hon. Member for Lewes referred to previous undertakings. We are exploring the possibility of a ban on ingredient testing, on which I hope to be able to make an announcement in due course. That is a complex area, but one which we are taking forward.

We are considering whether section 24 of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 should be amended, but no decision has yet been made. We are pressing international regulators to dispense with the need of LD50 tests, but, at the moment, they are, more often than not, almost entirely the requirement of international regulators.

Mr. Alan Clark rose—

Mr. Howarth: In view of the time, I shall not give way, but the right hon. Gentleman may wish to correspond with me.

Mr. Clark: Will the hon. Gentleman give way for just half a second?

Mr. Howarth: For half a second.

Mr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman said that the Government were considering the argument. Why cannot the Minister share the arguments, pro and con, with the House? I should have thought that the whole matter could be settled in a matter of hours.

Mr. Howarth: I have only three minutes to respond to the points that have been made, and it would not be sensible for me to pursue all the arguments in the sort of detail that the right hon. Gentleman might like.

The number of procedures have been reducing steadily since the 1970s. However, in recent years the use of transgenic animals has put pressure on the total number. Transgenic animals allow new lines of important research to be followed. We are aware of the target set in the fifth European environmental action plan to reduce the number of animals used by 50 per cent. by 2000. We have made considerable progress in reducing the number of animals used over the years.

In only 10 months, my noble Friend the Under-Secretary has set out on an ambitious and, I think most people would accept, caring agenda. I hope that hon. Members will agree that a great deal has already been achieved and, characteristically, my noble Friend has done that in a thoughtful but usually effective manner.

Mr. Baker: May I ask the Minister a question?

Mr. Howarth: I have one minute left and it would be impossible.

There is more to do, but I am confident that we shall continue, as we have begun, to deliver positive improvements to the supervision and regulation of animal welfare. I assure the House that we take that commitment seriously and I ask hon. Members and the wider public to judge us on what we achieve over a reasonable period of time. We are serious, and we appreciate the interest in the subject in the House and among the general public. I hope that the hon. Member for Lewes will take up our intention and that we can make progress and reach a better understanding.

Mr. Baker: Can the Minister guarantee that, by the end of the Parliament, fewer experiments will be carried out each year? Yes or no?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Sitting suspended, pursuant to Standing Order No. 10 (Wednesday sittings), till half-past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Peace Process

1. Dr. George Turner: What progress has been made in the peace process in Northern Ireland; and if she will make a statement. [32127]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Marjorie Mowlam): The inter-party talks are making good progress. All participants are committed to reaching a settlement. It remains the Government's intention to strive for an early agreement by Easter and to put the outcome to a referendum.

Dr. Turner: Have not fairness and equality of opportunity been at the core of the problems faced in Northern Ireland for many decades? Can my right hon. Friend assure the House that the peace process can satisfactorily address those issues and ensure that future generations in Northern Ireland, whichever side of the divide they are born and live, have equality of opportunity and fairness in their lives?

Marjorie Mowlam: Our manifesto included a commitment to an equality agenda on the basis of fairness, justice and equality of opportunity. The Government are introducing the European convention on human rights and, in relation to Northern Ireland, yesterday we launched a White Paper for consultation on equality issues, based on the principles of equality of opportunity and addressing, in particular, the question of long-term unemployment in both communities. It contains a host of recommendations based on the report by the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights, and copies have been placed in the Vote Office and in the Library.

Mr. Trimble: I shall not pursue the previous question, except to say how disappointed we were by the refusal of the Secretary of State to consult us before the publication of the report.

I wish to draw the Secretary of State's attention to the statement, in the European charter on local government, that local government is one of the main foundations of any democracy. Does she share with me a sense of discomfort that the United Kingdom proposes to ratify that charter purely on a Great Britain basis, without extending it in any way to Northern Ireland? Does not doing that at this juncture send people the message that the Government are not interested in ensuring democratic local government in Northern Ireland? Should not the Secretary of State bring forward—because she has not yet done so in the talks—some proposals to enable the United Kingdom to ratify the charter on a United Kingdom basis?

Marjorie Mowlam: The right hon. Gentleman began by referring to the previous question. Consultation is written into the document that was published today so that the recommendations that it contains can be consulted on and the views of parties, voluntary groups, businesses and trade unions can be consulted on the major proposals.

As to local government and the European charter, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the democratic deficit in Northern Ireland is a serious issue which needs addressing. We shall consider it. We have put together papers on quangos, but the questions will be addressed in the talks in partnership. In the process of the talks, the questions can be addressed. If people want papers on subjects, we shall submit papers on those subjects, as we have done for the past three weeks, so that we can obtain a structure for Northern Ireland, with the consent of the parties, that deals with the serious problem of the democratic deficit.

Mr. McGrady: I welcome the Secretary of State's statement on the proposals for a commission to monitor equality, and especially the extension of the statutory obligation to provide equal opportunities. I draw her attention to the fact that, although the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989 has been in place for nearly 10 years, unemployment among Catholics is twice that among Protestants. Will she suggest targets and timetables for the eradication of that anomaly, which is offensive to the Catholic minority? I am sure that she disagrees fundamentally with the official Unionist party's comment that her programme extended false hope to the Catholic community.

Madam Speaker: Order. Before the Secretary of State replies, may I remind the hon. Gentleman and the House of my instruction only recently that I want Secretaries of State and Ministers to be asked direct questions, with no long comments?

Marjorie Mowlam: Briefly, then. The statutory obligation applying to public services and to goods and services is covered by the document. The paper makes the important point, which came out of the SACHR report, that progress has been made on tackling long-term unemployment since the enacting of fair employment legislation in 1989. We agree with the report's conclusion that systematic discrimination is not the main cause of twice as many Catholic as Protestant men being long-term unemployed. The causes of long-term unemployment are manifold, and related to the multiple causes of deprivation. In the report, we are addressing the issue of equality of opportunity to ensure that the progress that has been made under the fair employment legislation continues. At the same time, we want to target and address long-term male unemployment, which is the root of problems for both communities.

Mr. MacKay: Is not the message that must come across after the shocking and sinful murders at Poyntzpass last week that the two Governments and the constitutional parties must redouble their efforts to find a lasting settlement in Northern Ireland? Will the Secretary of State confirm that she does not intend to go over the heads of the political parties and impose a solution on the Province?

Marjorie Mowlam: I concur with the hon. Gentleman's opening comment. The soul-destroying murders of Mr. Trainor and Mr. Allen—I believe that people have been charged this morning in relation to them—will, I hope and believe, make all those involved in the talks process and the peace process as a whole redouble their efforts. We must be sure that there is a commitment to finding some kind of accommodation. I again confirm that we have no intention of imposing any accommodation or settlement on the participants in the talks. They must own some kind of agreement, and the triple lock—gaining the consent of the parties, of the people in the referendum and of us in Parliament—is still in place.

Mr. MacKay: Will the Secretary of State confirm categorically that there will be no referendum in which the people of Northern Ireland decide on a settlement that has not been agreed by the majority of the parties in the political talks?

Marjorie Mowlam: Yes.

Mr. Öpik: Given the Government's evident commitment to holding a referendum in May, are they equally committed to holding elections in the Province in June? If elections are not held in June, when does the Secretary of State intend them to be held?

Marjorie Mowlam: It is difficult to give a specific answer. We are consulting the parties, and we must achieve a positive vote in the referendum. We should then have to find a period long enough for the election campaign and the procedures to be put in place. My view—it is not agreed with the parties, and we are still consulting them and others involved in the process—is that, the sooner elections are held, the better. The parades period and a long summer are coming up, and logistics have to be taken care of, so I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a specific answer.

Mr. McDonnell: My right hon. Friend will have noted the statement made by the president of Sinn Fein at the weekend, and appreciated its significance. Does she agree that, while we all hope for—and are working for—a settlement of some sort, an agreement or a conclusion to the existing talks, the process is on-going, regardless of any conclusion? Does she also agree that we want all the communities to achieve their respective ambitions and respect each other's views?

Marjorie Mowlam: I thank my hon. Friend for that important question. I sometimes do not emphasise enough the importance of the process in which we are involved in saying that I want to aim for the referendum on a particular date in May, but I think it important to see it as a process. There is random violence from splinter groups, which I believe will continue until the referendum, and I think that things will be difficult afterwards; but the more we view this as a process in which confidence and trust are built up as we go along, the better.

2. Mr. Flight: What assessment she has made of the objectives of the Government of Ireland with regard to the Northern Ireland peace initiative. [32128]

Marjorie Mowlam: The British and Irish Governments share the common objective of achieving a widely acceptable political settlement and a lasting peace in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Flight: What discussions have been held with the Government of southern Ireland about joint security following a settlement? May I suggest that that is a crucial ingredient of both the achievement of a settlement and its success thereafter?

Marjorie Mowlam: I agree that security co-operation across the border is an important element. We have seen two very good examples. The Garda Siochana in both County Louth and County Cavan found large bombs that were not where everyone expected them to be—north of the border. I pay tribute to the Garda Siochana for the help that it has given us in the last couple of weeks, and assure the hon. Member that such co-operation goes on now and, I believe, will continue.

Mr. Mallon: Does the Secretary of State agree that the joint action by the two Governments—as represented by the joint declaration, the joint framework document and the two Governments' participation in the talks—has allowed the talks process, and enabled the participants to move towards a solution? Does the right hon. Lady also agree that, if we are to see the end of the remnants of terrorism in both the north and the south of Ireland, that joint approach must continue—hopefully with a new administration in the north?

Marjorie Mowlam: I agree that joint action between the two Governments is crucial. History shows us that, when they have not worked together, the process has run into trouble.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned some papers. There is the framework document, and a host of papers have now been submitted by the Governments in strand 1 of the talks process, at the request of the parties, and in strand 2 by the chair of the process. I believe that, as we synthesise those papers, the areas of agreement and disagreement are becoming much clearer as the weeks go on.

Mr. Peter Robinson: The Secretary of State says that the talks process is making good progress. As it ends its two-year lifespan in May, will she spend a minute or two outlining something to the House? The process was built on the premise that decommissioning must take place during it. Will the Secretary of State tell us how many handguns, rifles, rocket launchers, machine guns, explosives and detonators—and how much ammunition—have been handed in either to this Government or to the Government of the Irish Republic?

Marjorie Mowlam: Both this Government and the Irish Government take decommissioning seriously. We have agreed with the Mitchell principles. I should like decommissioning to take place tomorrow, but we have agreed with the Irish Government that it must proceed in parallel with the current process. We have a decommissioning body working, and on 25 February we published a document outlining decommissioning methods. An order on the decommissioning timetable will be dealt with in the House later. I assure the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members that we all want decommissioning, which would be a very positive step, and a vote of confidence in the process. However, as I have told the House so many times before, I cannot force people to do it. Nevertheless, I assure him that we are doing everything that we can to encourage it.

Mr. Robert McCartney: Will the Secretary of State confirm that the type of mortar bomb used to attack

Armagh police station has never before been used in Northern Ireland by any terrorist organisation other than the Provisional IRA? Will she confirm whether there is any intelligence of any group utilising such mortar bombs for terrorist activity other than the Provisional IRA?

Marjorie Mowlam: As the hon. and learned Gentleman is aware, after the mortar attack in Armagh, one of the local police officers implied exactly that—that the only group identified with such mortars is the Provisional IRA. However, I am sure that the hon. and learned Gentleman—as a lawyer and as a Member of Parliament—will agree that one must have pretty conclusive evidence before acting—[Interruption.] I do not have conclusive evidence on the mortar attack at Armagh.

Mr. Thompson: Will the Secretary of State confirm that, irrespective of the objectives of the Irish Government or the outcome of the talks, the supreme authority of this Parliament will remain over all persons, matters and things in Northern Ireland, as part of the United Kingdom?

Marjorie Mowlam: The hon. Gentleman will know that, ultimately, part of the answer to his question lies with the parties and the people of Northern Ireland, which is where, in the talks and in the referendum, some of those decisions will be taken. I should like to add—because of some of the barracking after my previous answer—that there is not conclusive evidence. I cannot make a decision based on one person's view on who they believe did it. I need to have evidence and security advice. Then, as I acted in relation to the UDP and Sinn Fein, I shall act again.

Mr. Moss: Has the Secretary of State had any contact with the Irish Government in the light of the very serious allegations that Roisin McAliskey's fragile mental state—on the ground of which the Home Secretary refused to extradite her to Germany—was attributable to her treatment at the hands of RUC officers at the Castlereagh holding centre? In view of the seriousness of those allegations, does the Secretary of State plan to instigate an inquiry? Conversely, if she believes—as we do—that those allegations are completely without foundation, why has she not issued a statement unequivocally repudiating them?

Marjorie Mowlam: The Irish Government, like many parties involved, strongly expressed their points of view on Roisin McAliskey's situation to the Home Office and to my Department. However, as the Home Secretary made clear last night in his announcement, his decision was taken independently and was based on medical grounds, not on lobbying. The allegations that the hon. Gentleman mentions are still only allegations. The Home Office has informed me that it has received no specific submission from Miss McAliskey on allegations reported in the press, but has said that if it receives such a submission, it will not only respond to it but place it in the public domain.

Dangerous Wild Animals Act

3. Rev. Martin Smyth: If she will extend the Dangerous Wild Animals Act 1976 to Northern Ireland. [32129]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tony Worthington): Yes. The Government propose to introduce legislation equivalent to the 1976 Act under the Order in Council process.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I welcome that answer, but will legislation be introduced very soon? Although some of us believed that the days of Buck Alec's wee lion were over, we discover now that—in Seskinore and in other parts of Northern Ireland—people are keeping wild animals in abysmal circumstances, which are detrimental to animals and dangerous for people.

Mr. Worthington: Yes, it is a disturbing case and I have discussed the matter with the noble Lord Dubs, who is the Minister responsible. He is doing everything he can to bring forward legislation as quickly as possible.

Devolution

4. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: What representations she has received on the devolution proposals contained in the framework documents; and if she will make a statement. [32130]

Marjorie Mowlam: Those issues remain under intensive consideration within strand 1 of the multi-party talks.

Mr. Winterton: While many people believe that the devolution proposals for Scotland and Wales are designed to bring government closer to the people, will the Secretary of State agree with me that the devolved assembly under the framework is seen by many on both sides of the water as being for the purpose of taking Ulster out of the United Kingdom and putting it under the control of a foreign country?

Marjorie Mowlam: No. The devolution procedures are there to increase accountability and increase transparency and, as I made clear in answer to the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss), they will be made only with the consent of the parties, and of the people, of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Maginnis: Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that the Ulster Unionist party has made it clear from the beginning of 1995 that the framework documents do not define a way forward in terms of the future of Northern Ireland; and that we have not negotiated on the basis of the framework documents, because they actually stymie negotiations and one cannot negotiate from a fixed position? Will she further acknowledge that, that apart, my party has done everything possible and made no unreasonable case to hinder negotiations, but that hindrance has come, almost exclusively, from the IRA, which refuses to move forward the parallel process of decommissioning and has had the connivance of two Governments in hindering it in that way?

Marjorie Mowlam: As I said in answer to an earlier question, a number of documents are on the table—the framework document, the Downing street declaration and papers submitted by different parties—and the point to which everybody around the table is trying to get is to reach an accommodation, whether or not that is in line with one of those documents. If it reflects consensus among the parties, we shall readily accept the decision of the parties.

In answer to the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I acknowledge the courage and determination of all the parties in the talks. They have all made changes and have all tried to move to find an accommodation and I hope that that continues in the weeks ahead.

Mr. McNamara: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that, whatever the outcome of the talks, the aspiration to a united Ireland will still be permitted, allowed and, hopefully, attainable for those people who argue and work for it democratically? Will she inform the House of the number of occasions on which the Ulster Unionist party has sat down with Sinn Fein to discuss the various proposals in strands 1, 2 and 3?

Marjorie Mowlam: The answer to the first part of my hon. Friend's question is that it is about democratic participation by all in the talks, and that is where we want to arrive. As for parties siting down with each other, there has been sitting down between some parties in various locations. I am unable to give the time and place of all those occasions, but I can tell the House that, in a poll last Thursday, a majority of both communities in Northern Ireland wanted the parties inclusively to sit down and try to find an accommodation.

National Minimum Wage

5. Mr. Boswell: What assessment she has made of the local economic implications of the introduction of a national minimum wage. [32132]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Adam Ingram): In Northern Ireland, as in the rest of the United Kingdom, a sensibly set national minimum wage will increase the incentive to work, will encourage firms to compete on the basis of quality, not just price, will help promote employee commitment and reduce staff turnover, and will encourage investment in training. I am pleased to note that the Bill to introduce a minimum wage has received the formal approval of the House.

Mr. Boswell: The Minister will be aware that the average wage in Northern Ireland is only 60 per cent. of that in Greater London. He will also be aware that a greater proportion of the work force in Northern Ireland is paid less than £3.50 an hour. Will he confirm that he is alert to the implications of that and has drawn those issues to the attention of the Low Pay Commission?

Mr. Ingram: We are aware of those facts and they have been drawn to the attention of the Low Pay Commission.

Mr. Hope: Does my hon. Friend agree that workers in Northern Ireland forced to live on poverty wages deserve the same legal protection and floor under their wage levels that are about to be enjoyed by other workers in the rest of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Ingram: I am sure that all the low-paid workers, and others, in Northern Ireland will say three cheers to that and will fully endorse the National Minimum Wage Bill, which the House has recently passed.

Mr. Beggs: My hon. Friends and I are totally committed to the principle of a fair day's pay for a fair day's work. I urge the Minister to bear in mind the fact that, because of our relatively high levels of unemployment, if the level of the national minimum wage in Northern Ireland is set too high, it could damage existing jobs and the potential for new jobs. Will he assure us that the Government will be cautious, sensible and practical in setting the level of the national minimum wage in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Ingram: That is a fair point, which we have to address. As the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) said, we have to take account of the fact that there is a significant amount of low pay in Northern Ireland. We must be careful not to unbalance the economy as a result of the decisions on the national minimum wage. The Government are fully aware of the problem. We shall work with trade unions and industry to ensure that the Northern Ireland economy continues to prosper in the years ahead.

Mrs. Fyfe: Has the Northern Ireland Office assessed the cost to the British taxpayer of subsidising bad employers that pay terrible wages? The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) alluded to such low wages. Does my hon. Friend agree that the money could be spent in better ways to benefit the people of Northern Ireland?

Mr. Ingram: I have no knowledge of such an assessment, but my hon. Friend has given me an idea that I may work on as we look forward to the findings of the Low Pay Commission.

Peace Talks

6. Mrs. Ann Winterton: What assessment she has made of the Unionist community's reception of the progress and direction of the all-party peace talks. [32133]

Marjorie Mowlam: My assessment of the Unionist community, as with all communities in Northern Ireland, is that change is difficult, but we must all change and no one can have 100 per cent. of what they want. I know that it is not easy, but together we can build a future of non-violence that is different from the past.

Mrs. Winterton: Will the Secretary of State concede that the Unionists in Northern Ireland must feel betrayed and devastated that the peace process, which they joined in good faith, has been hijacked by Sinn Fein-IRA and could now correctly be described as the appeasement process?

Marjorie Mowlam: No, I obviously do not agree with the hon. Lady's interpretation. The Unionist community in Northern Ireland feels a lack of confidence, and fear, because of the bomb at Moira, the bomb at Portadown and the deaths of Mr. Trainor and Mr. Allen. That is what creates fear. We are trying to create a future that does not include such events. I have already referred to last week's poll. The Unionist party leaders who are in the talks had much greater support in that poll than those outside. That is what the Unionist community thinks.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Is it not alarming and disappointing that the hon. Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) has used such language when the Secretary of State, the Government, the Irish Government and the constitutional parties are trying to work for a settlement? Is not the key the fact that the majority of both communities want peace? Should not that be the driving force? Should not Members of Parliament support the Government in what they are trying to achieve?

Marjorie Mowlam: I thank my hon. Friend for that comment. Consent is the over riding principle in our policy in Northern Ireland. I hope that my hon. Friend spoke for the whole House.

Mr. William Ross: Is the right hon. Lady not yet aware that by far the greater bulk of the population in Northern Ireland are astonished, dismayed and horrified that the Government seem unwilling to accept the plain fact that the terrorist wings of some of the parties participating in the talks in Northern Ireland are still engaged in terrorist violence, including murder as the ultimate form of intimidation? Is not she also aware from what has been said today and in recent days that there is great concern in Northern Ireland that the sentence for murder appears to be a three-day exclusion from the talks process? What does she intend to do to increase the confidence of the great bulk of the population of Northern Ireland in the Government listening to the democratic voice of the people rather than the guns of murderers?

Marjorie Mowlam: We have backed wholesale the security forces—they have done an excellent job—in trying to find the people responsible for the terrorist activity that has gone on since Christmas that has been carried out by splinter groups that are not part of the ceasefire and do not support the talks process but, in fact, want to destroy it. It is clear that if any party violates the Mitchell principles in relation to the talks—and we have concrete evidence that paramilitary groups associated with parties in the talks have behaved contrary to the Mitchell principles—we will act. We excluded the Ulster Democratic party when that happened; we excluded Sinn Fein. If it happens again, I assure the hon. Gentleman that we will act accordingly.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [32157] Mrs. Roe: If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 11 March.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall have further such meetings today. This evening, I will be meeting European leaders who are in London for tomorrow's European conference.

Mrs. Roe: Will the Government agree to any request from the German authorities for Roisin McAliskey to be tried in this country for the very serious crimes she is alleged to have committed?

The Prime Minister: We have received no such request. However, if we do, it will be considered by the Home Secretary. In considering it, he will be acting in a quasi-judicial capacity. If any such request is received, he will consider it in the normal way. The decision not to extradite was taken by the Home Secretary alone, in accordance with the powers that are given him and on the basis of the medical evidence submitted.

Mr. Corbett: Will my right hon. Friend assure me that when the Green Paper on welfare reform is published, it will lead to the widest possible debate so that we can ensure that we protect those in genuine need and offer real opportunities to those who have been denied them for the past 18 years?

The Prime Minister: Yes. That is one of the reasons why the Government are already proceeding with the £3.5 billion welfare-to-work programme that helps people on benefit get off benefit and into work. We cannot carry on with a situation in which spending is up but poverty is up, too. That is precisely why the new Labour Government are undertaking the process of welfare reform in the interests of the country and, indeed, of many people who are in need.

Mr. Hague: The Prime Minister will be aware that the human rights campaigner Wei Jingsheng has met the Foreign Secretary today. Does the Prime Minister understand the amazement among such campaigners and in the United States that, for the first time in nine years, the United Kingdom will not support a United Nations resolution on human rights in China?

The Prime Minister: We have on many occasions made clear our position on human rights. We have carried on making that position clear and will continue to do so. We did not think in these circumstances that this was the right thing to do.

Mr. Hague: The circumstances are the same as they have been in recent years. Mr. Wei says that the Government's position is quite stupefying; he says that it has left victims of human rights abuses in the lurch; he says that, in 18 years in prison in China, his conditions were improved only when the international community signed declarations of this kind. Since the Foreign Secretary said that human rights would be at the heart of an ethical foreign policy, should not the Prime Minister reconsider the decision?

The Prime Minister: It is not right to say that we have not raised the issue of human rights in China. We have done so continually, both on our own account and as president of the European Union. That is the position that has obtained throughout—not merely now, but before the election.

Mr. Hague: I am not saying that the Prime Minister has not raised the issue. If he has, it would be consistent to support this resolution. The Government proclaimed an ethical foreign policy with great fanfare and the Foreign Secretary poses unconvincingly as ethics man, yet the first time that that ethical foreign policy is put to the test there is no trace of it whatsoever. Dissidents and human rights campaigners will judge the Government by the Prime Minister's answer. Will he now reconsider that decision?

The Prime Minister: No, for the reason that I have given. We have not merely raised the issue of human rights—[Interruption.] Perhaps Conservative Members will listen to the answer. We have continually raised human rights issues in respect of China and, during our presidency of the European Union, we have received support from other European countries in making the issues at the heart of Mr. Wei's case clear to the Chinese Government. However, we did not feel that this United Nations resolution was the right way to proceed.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the Cambridge benefits agency office on helping its 200th lone parent back into work? One lone father said that the scheme had given him back his self-respect after many years out of work. Will my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming the national roll-out of the scheme, which has the potential to help many parents?

The Prime Minister: Yes. My hon. Friend has played a considerable part in establishing a scheme in her constituency to get lone parents off benefit and into work. The scheme also ensures that lone parents receive the proper skills training—particularly in the area of information technology—that they require to get work. A considerable number of lone parents already on the new deal programme have come off benefit and into work. As a result, they are earning far more money and not costing the state nearly as much as they used to: lone parents gain, the country gains and the state of society gains, too.

Mr. Ashdown: When Mr. Rupert Murdoch sought to purchase The Times newspaper in 1981, the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, Mr. John Biffen, agreed to the purchase without reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on the grounds of eight conditions to preserve editorial independence that he announced to the House. Does the Prime Minister accept that that gives his Government a continuing responsibility to ensure that those conditions are upheld properly?

The Prime Minister: Of course I accept that any conditions entered into should be upheld.

Mr. Ashdown: I am very grateful to the Prime Minister for that confirmation that the Government are now the ultimate monitor of Mr. Rupert Murdoch's stewardship of The Times. I draw the Prime Minister's attention to the recent comments made by the previous highly respected east Asia editor of The Times, Mr. Jonathan Mirsky, that give rise to deep concern about whether those conditions have been met in the case of China. In this case, should not the Prime Minister and the Government satisfy themselves that the conditions have been met? If they are not satisfied, should they not place the matter before the Monopolies and Mergers Commission?

The Prime Minister: I am not aware of the particular incident to which the right hon. Gentleman refers, but I am perfectly prepared to look into it and correspond with him about it. However, the rules that apply to Mr. Murdoch apply to all newspaper proprietors equally.

Mr. Dawson: Will my right hon. Friend join me in expressing sympathy to the Hansard reporters who, on Friday and again in the early hours of Tuesday morning, endured hour upon hour of excruciating banality? Will he also join me in hoping against hope that in future Opposition Members will come up with something interesting to say—and perhaps one or two decent jokes?

The Prime Minister: I know that my hon. Friends have campaigned very hard on this. We of course pay tribute to all those who work in the House and who must stay up and listen to Opposition Members making their points. Is it not extraordinary that the Conservative party opposed the introduction of a minimum wage that, for the first time, guarantees decent minimum standards at work? They will always choose to represent the few rather than the many.

Q2. [32158] Mr. Amess: Will the right hon. Gentleman take a sober look at early-day motion 961 and tell the House whether he agrees with his 50 Labour colleagues who have so lost confidence in the Lord Chancellor that they demand not only an end to his extravagance, but the abolition of the office?

The Prime Minister: No, I will not do that because the Labour manifesto commitment to reform of both criminal justice and legal aid is clear and we are carrying it out with the excellent services of the Lord Chancellor.

Ms Drown: Will the Prime Minister join me in wishing Mr. David Hempleman-Adams, the British explorer who was born in my constituency, the best of luck in his attempt, which he started only last week, to be the first person to reach the north and south poles and the highest peaks of every continent?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I am delighted to do so. It is a marvellous example of co-operation between the Norwegian and British people, and I wish the expedition every success.

Q3. [32159] Mrs. Lait: When will the right hon. Gentleman live up to his promise of rooting out corruption in local government in towns such as my home town of Paisley and in Glasgow, Doncaster, Hackney and now Hull? Is not it obvious even to him that Labour councils are riven with dissent and rotten to the core?

The Prime Minister: Every time there have been allegations of corruption in Labour councils we have investigated them, in stark contrast to a Conservative party, which allowed corruption and wrongdoing to carry on in Westminster council and for years did nothing—but that is the difference between Conservative and Labour values.

Lifelong Learning

Q4. [32160] Mr. Chaytor: If he will make a statement on his plans to increase opportunities for lifelong learning.

The Prime Minister: I know that my right hon. Friend and other hon. Members have taken a keen interest in lifelong learning. The lifelong learning Green Paper was published on 25 February. We believe that it is essential that if we are to create the type of economy that we need in future, people should be able to train and re-skill throughout their lives. Our proposals will make a significant start on that.

Mr. Chaytor: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, last year, more than 50 per cent. of further education colleges—colleges responsible for about 4 million students—experienced financial deficits due largely to the imposition of the internal market and the unfair funding methodology used by the previous Government? Will he assure the House that, after the reform in the financing of university education, the Government will introduce a substantial new investment in lifelong learning, particularly for the overwhelming majority of young people and adults who have never had any prospect of going to university?

The Prime Minister: "I personally believe that" the Conservative

"failure in 20 years to significantly improve the level of public education is one of the areas that" they should be

"most . . . ashamed of."

[HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish."] Opposition Members shout "Rubbish" but I am quoting Steven Norris, who was a Minister in a previous Government. He went on to say:

"you can acquit Labour of the charge of not being prepared to take the issue on."

Mr. Norris is right. What is more, as a result of the additional money that we are putting into further education, the university for industry, the £150 million to help people with training and skilling in the individual learning accounts and the 500,000 extra people who will go into further and higher education as a result of Government reforms in the next five years, we are at last making a start on getting the lifelong learning society that we need for the future.

Mr. Boswell: As I am sure the Prime Minister will want to acknowledge the achievements of the previous Government in giving the further education sector independence and pressing forward to advance adult literacy measures, will he explain his priorities in converting the White Paper that was promised into the Green Paper on adult learning that was delivered?

The Prime Minister: We have always made it clear that there should be a proper process of consultation. Some elements in that—for example, the individual learning accounts and the extra £150 million that we are putting into them—will happen in any event, which is extremely important. I acknowledge that the previous Government made some changes in adult literacy that we would support, but they cut funding drastically—particularly funding for further education, which was cut way below its tenable level. That is precisely why we are spending an extra £100 million on it next year, which I hope the hon. Gentleman will welcome.

Engagements

Q5. [32161] Mrs. Gorman: Given the fact that Conservative Wandsworth, despite a 10 per cent. cut in grant, has introduced the lowest council tax rate in the country, whereas Labour Liverpool, with a 10 per cent. increase in grant, has introduced the highest, will the Prime Minister—who is a canny Scot—recommend people who have their heads screwed on the right way to vote Conservative on 7 May?

The Prime Minister: No, I believe that people had their heads screwed on the right way on 1 May last year. In fact, the average council tax rise in Liverpool is about 5.5 per cent. It is true that Wandsworth has reduced its council tax, but that is largely because of the reserves that were built up under the previous Government. Perhaps the hon. Lady would like to reflect on the fact that, whereas Westminster has an increase of about 7 per cent., Islington has an increase of about half that.

Ms Kelly: Can the Prime Minister confirm that Government borrowing has fallen dramatically in the 10 months since the election? Is not that a clear example of the benefits of stable economic management and an end to boom and bust? Does not it represent an endorsement of the old slogan, "You can never trust the Tories with your wallet"?

The Prime Minister: Conservative Members might like to know that, under the Conservative Government, national debt doubled. As a result of Conservative mismanagement, we shall have to pay out more in interest payments on our debt than we spend on the whole of the schools system. We inherited a structural budget deficit and the return of inflation to the system. By giving the Bank of England independence in the setting of interest rates and by tackling the structural deficit, we have the chance for the first time in generations to end Tory boom and bust and to have prudent, stable management of the economy.

Mr. Hague: Who is to blame for the fact that this year's council tax rises average out at a record—the Government or councils?

The Prime Minister: The council tax rises are precisely those that were forecast by the Conservatives when they were in government. It is a bit of an own goal for the right hon. Gentleman to raise as an issue the very council tax rises that he supported when in government.

Mr. Hague: It is a bit of an own goal to say the opposite of what the Deputy Prime Minister said; he said that council tax increases would have been 7 per cent. under Conservative plans but will be 8.5 per cent. under the Government's plans. When will the Prime Minister start taking responsibility for his own decisions?

The spending plans are his: it has been his decision to penalise the shire counties and neglect the rural areas once again; and it has been his decision to give one of the highest grant increases to Sedgefield, by some happy coincidence. Is it the responsibility of the Government or of councils?

The Prime Minister: It is the Government's responsibility to set spending limits. The point is that the spending limits are precisely the ones that we inherited, which is why it is patently absurd for the right hon. Gentleman to say that all this is the result of a Labour Government. In fact, the bills are rising in exactly the way they would have under the Conservatives. If people look back on Conservative administration of local government over the past 18 years, they will remember most not what the Labour Government have done now or in the past year, but the poll tax, for which the Tories were responsible.

Mr. Hague: People will remember that the Prime Minister said before last year's general election that there would be no tax increases at all. They will remember that they now pay higher council taxes, higher pensions taxes, higher savings taxes, higher mortgage taxes and higher business taxes. Are not people entitled to feel that they were conned at the election?

The Prime Minister: No. First, on council tax, we said that we would abide by the spending limits that we inherited, which is precisely what we did. Secondly, we said that we would not raise the basic or top rate of income tax, and we have kept that promise. The contrast lies in our keeping that promise and a Conservative party that, in the 1992 general election, said it would not raise VAT and that it would cut the tax burden year on year, but then imposed VAT and the largest tax rises in peacetime history. That is the difference between Labour and Tory Governments.

Mr. Burgon: Can the Prime Minister update us on the bid to hold the world cup in England in 2006? Does he agree that if we are to guarantee the success of the bid, one of the venues must be the great city of Leeds?

The Prime Minister: We certainly hope that we shall be able to host the world cup in 2006. We are making a strong bid to do so. About £600 million has been spent on British stadiums over the past period of time. I think that we have all the right facilities to make a successful world cup bid and I am quite convinced that we can do so.

Q6. [32162] Dr. Tonge: Does the Prime Minister agree that taxes are a way of providing good public services? Does he also agree that, as good local services are provided in the Richmond part of my constituency and our council tax rise this year will be of the order of 2.3 per cent., perhaps the electorate would like to consider voting Liberal Democrat?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that they will consider it. Of course it is important that the taxes that are raised go to provide decent public services. I cannot comment on the hon. Lady's particular situation in Richmond, but I can say that as a result of what the Government have done and their prudent management of finances, we are going to get extra money into schools and hospitals this year, extra money for pensioners and we have been able to cut VAT on fuel.

Dr. Desmond Turner: May I bring my right hon. Friend back to the issue of benefits? Despite the assurances that he and other Cabinet colleagues have given, will he reiterate that there is no intention to hit people on disability benefits? People are still anxious. Can he give an assurance to people who depend on disability benefits that they have nothing to fear from the benefits review?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly say that those people who are in need and disabled have nothing whatever to fear from the review. The plain fact of the matter is that the present system, as many who are disabled accept, is over-complex, often does not help those most in need and often does not give people the help that they need to get off benefit into work where they want to do so. Many disabled people would like the chance to work full time or to do some sort of part-time work. One of the reasons the Government have committed an extra £200 million out of the new deal to helping the disabled is precisely to give them that opportunity and freedom. People should pay no attention to the scaremongering, but they should realise that the Labour Government are undertaking necessary reform that will work in the end to their interests.

Q7. [32163] Dr. Julian Lewis: How can the Prime Minister justify the following actions taken by the Government at the end of last year: blocking a Bill to protect women from rape in psychiatric units, stopping due recognition for Sean Connery on account of his support for Scottish nationalism and the different treatment accorded to Professor Eric Hobsbawm, a lifelong communist who just happens to be the father of the business partner of the girlfriend of the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

The Prime Minister: I have now remembered the pedigree of the hon. Gentleman. I have a terrible feeling that he was in the Labour party at one time. He then went to the Tory party. To judge by today's question on Sean Connery, he is about to go to the Scottish nationalists. He was pretty wacky then and he is pretty wacky now.

Q8. [32164] Mr. McWalter: My right hon. Friend will be aware that some health authorities and trusts think that the Conservatives are still in power and are trying to cut services. In some cases, they are contemplating closing over-subscribed hospitals. Will my right hon. Friend emphasise to such health authorities and trusts the Government's commitment to major improvements in health funding this year and in future years so that they can plan on a proper basis for the medium term and give people the assurance that they will receive a much better service from the NHS than they did under the previous regime?

The Prime Minister: We have put into the health service an extra £300 million over Conservative spending plans this year and an extra £1.2 billion goes in next year. That is a tremendous additional investment for the national health service. Of course, decisions about how to spend that money are taken on the ground. Health authorities must take decisions on the basis of local health needs as they see them, but it is important that we make sure that the NHS modernises, changes and adapts. We will get the investment in, but it comes in return for fundamental reform that helps the patients who need a decent health service for the future.

Mrs. Browning: If a Labour Member of Parliament fails to declare a directorship and subsequently becomes a Minister of the Crown, should he resign? If not, why not?

The Prime Minister: Those are matters for the Parliamentary Commissioner, as the hon. Lady knows. I know the case to which she refers. Her question is part of the usual Conservative smear campaign and I have not the slightest intention of getting into it.

Q9. [32165] Mr. Connarty: Has my right hon. Friend seen the National Audit Office report today on water pensions, which confirms what we suspected: that the public were ripped off by the Tories over water privatisation? Following on the scandal of the great rail report of last week, will my right hon. Friend instruct an investigation into all the privatisations that took place, to see just how badly the Tories swindled the public?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that the National Audit Office will continue to make investigations. It is extraordinary that, as a result of Conservative privatisation, literally hundreds of millions of taxpayers' money, which could have been spent on better services, was lost and squandered. The fact that the Conservatives behaved so badly when privatising some of our essential public services is why they must never be allowed back in charge of those services again.

Ministerial Visits

Q10. [32166] Mr. Page: What plans he has to pay an official visit to South-West Hertfordshire.

The Prime Minister: I have no immediate plans to do so.

Mr. Page: I am devastated by that response. I would like the Prime Minister to come to my constituency because I would like him to explain to my constituents the fourth of his six election promises, which he will have at the forefront of his mind—that to reduce waiting lists. I want him to explain to my constituents who use the hospitals in the area why waiting lists have increased, depending on the category, by 7.5 per cent. up to 28.9 per cent. Some people are now waiting more than 18 months, when there was a zero wait before. Can he tell us the value of a Prime Minister's pledge at election time?

The Prime Minister: The value is that the pledge will be met, in precisely the way that we said at the election. The hon. Gentleman is complaining about national health service waiting lists, but they have been going up for about three years. I do not remember his uttering a word about NHS waiting lists before the election. As they are going up as a result of the financial constraints, and as we are putting £1.5 billion more into the health service than the Conservative Government he supported were prepared to do, we will get them down and the public will know that had they left the health service in the hands of a Conservative Government they would have carried on rising and rising and rising.

Engagements

Q11. [32167] Mr. Crausby: Does my right hon. Friend welcome the fact that Britain will soon have, for the first time in our history, a national minimum wage that will protect our people from the low wages that create poverty? Does he relish the prospect of fighting the next general election against an out-of-touch Conservative party that will no doubt campaign on the slogan, "Vote Tory and return to poverty pay"?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. We do not yet know from Conservative Front Benchers whether they will abolish the minimum wage. [HON. MEMBERS: "How much is it?"] Oh, I see—it all depends on the amount; otherwise they will keep it, will they? That is very interesting; we were very near to getting the first policy commitment from the Conservative party.

The Conservative party opposes the minimum wage. The Conservatives would not want anyone connected with them to be working for these poverty rates of pay, but they are opposed to essential fairness at the workplace. We need a minimum wage to save the £3.5 billion benefits bill that subsidises low pay and because a proper minimum wage is an essential basis of a decent, civilised society—but then those are values the Conservatives would not understand.

Mr. Martin Bell: Will the Prime Minister consider the advantages of a Whips' ceasefire on these occasions so that Members might ask the questions they wish to ask rather than those they have been encouraged or instructed by others to ask? Would this not be to everyone's benefit, including his own?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman has just asked me a question—I am not quite sure how he wants me to reply, other than to say that people are free to ask whatever questions they want. As everybody knows, nobody could be a more democratic, open and understanding leader than me. Perish the day that anyone is encouraged to ask any question at all. However, if he listens to the questions asked by Conservative and Labour Members, he will see that the questions about schools, health, pay, living standards and crime are asked by my hon. Friends, and not by Conservative Members.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. On Monday, I took off the letter board a parliamentary reply, dated 6 March, from the Secretary of State for Health. It was a fairly straightforward reply, referring me to an answer that he had given on 20 January. What makes this reply remarkable is that the question was put down on Thursday 15 January. This is the worst but by no means the only example of questions taking an inordinate length of time to be answered, especially when they are totally straightforward. It suggests either that Ministers' offices are in such disarray that we should be anxious about the quality of government, or that they are treating Members of Parliament with considerable contempt. Could we have some guidance to Ministers on treating us properly?

Madam Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me advance notice of his point of order. I have indicated to the House before that I do not intend to comment on the quality of ministerial replies. I regard it as important, however, that Members of Parliament should receive replies to written questions within a reasonable time frame. In this case, it is difficult to discern from what the hon. Gentleman says any reasons for the delay. I expect that he has made his own inquiries—I would hope that he had and would know the reasons. However, I hope that the Minister concerned will look into the matter—there are those on the Government Front Bench who will make a note of this, no doubt—and let both me and the hon. Gentleman know precisely what has occurred. However, I expect hon. Members to make their own inquires and not to expect me to be their administrative officer.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In her supplementary question, the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait)—who has since left her place, unfortunately—read out a list of councils, accusing them of corruption and sleaze, and included among them the city and county of Kingston upon Hull, which I am happy to represent. At no time have the district auditor or the police found any fault in the administration or services of the city and county of Kingston upon Hull. That was a despicable thing for the hon. Lady to say about people of integrity.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I caught your comment about your becoming a guardian and trying to get answers from Ministers.

Madam Speaker: No, I did not say that at all. The hon. Gentleman had better make his point of order to me precise and clear, because I am precise as to my position.

Mr. Bruce: Indeed. As you will know, I have been pursuing with the Leader of the House the matter of getting answers from Ministers. She wrote to me some weeks ago and then had to admit that her office had lost the letter that I had sent, in which I gave chapter and verse on what was going on, so how can we get answers from the Leader of the House without your helping us?

Madam Speaker: Perhaps there should be a new filing system. It was rather better when there were no computers. We all knew where the papers were.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I understand that, last night, at St. Stephen's entrance, it took members of the public 20 to 40 minutes to clear the security procedures and get into the House. Security is important, but so is access. I believe that the delay arose because, after 7 o'clock, the security screening facilities are reduced from three screens to one. Can you examine that matter, because it is important that our constituents have a right to approach hon. Members and to attend meetings and other activities that take place here?

Madam Speaker: I shall certainly look at the matter, as it is quite serious. I see the Serjeant at Arms each morning about such matters, and he would have reported it to me had it been as serious as the hon. Gentleman suggests. However, I shall certainly take up the matter and see what the situation is.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), Madam Speaker. I ask in general terms what your reaction is to those who make unsubstantiated assertions, to the detriment of local authorities and often without any grounds whatever. Will you reflect on whether there should be guidelines on what is said about local authorities in the House, off the cuff and often without any substantiation whatever?

Madam Speaker: There are, of course, guidelines in "Erskine May" on the language to be used in the House. Too few hon. Members pay attention to our procedures, but "Erskine May" lays them down clearly. We have tremendous privileges in the House in terms of freedom of speech. I have always encouraged and tried to persuade hon. Members to temper that privilege with responsibility. The privileges that we have are enormous, but hon. Members must take on board the responsibilities that come with that privilege. I hope that, after this exchange, hon. Members will take to heart what has been said on the matter.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I seek clarification. Am I right that all hon. Members are responsible for what they say in the House? Hon. Members should be concerned and careful about what they say—which may be detrimental to other people or bodies outside the House and do them great damage—when there is no substantive evidence to back up what they may have said.

Madam Speaker: That is precisely what I said. What we say in the House must be tempered with responsibility. Too many hon. Members do not recognise that responsibility.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You may recall that during Northern

[Mr. David Trimble]

Ireland questions there was a passing reference to the White Paper on employment equality, which was one of the three proposals in the Labour party's manifesto with regard to Northern Ireland, and was consequently a significant proposal. The White Paper was, I believe, launched at a press conference in Belfast this morning. I understand from what happened here today that the Government have made no effort to make a statement to the House, so that hon. Members can know the details of this important policy and ask questions.

I draw this matter to your attention because the Government have done that too often, and the people of Northern Ireland have been left with the feeling that the Government are more interested in the two Members who do not attend the House than in the other hon. Members who were necessarily here today, but who were unable to find out about the press conference in Belfast.

Mr. McNamara: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. May I draw your attention to the fact that the White Paper has been available in the Vote Office since early this afternoon? I got my copies long before Question Time.

Madam Speaker: That answers the point of order raised by the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble).

Housing Service Charges (Amendment)

3.38 pm

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Housing Act 1996 to enable certain county court cases initiated on or before 1st September 1997 to transfer to a leasehold valuation tribunal.

I beg your indulgence, Madam Speaker, because it is my confirmed intention to bore the House for the next 10 minutes. In itself, that would be nothing remarkable. Many right hon. and hon. Members have carved out distinguished careers for themselves, by doing little else. A spirit of generosity prevents me from mentioning the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden by name—but I am confident that even he would not have made so bold with you as to confirm at the outset of his peroration that boredom in the Chamber and tedium for right hon. and hon. Members was his express intention.

Please understand, Madam Speaker, that I am not perverse by nature—but I have been informed that for a ten-minute Bill to have any chance of success, it should be plangently unexciting, debilitatingly humdrum and tediously technical. I am told, furthermore, that if one can show that the objective that the Bill would achieve is, after all, only something that everyone already assumed was the case, given that the Bill is properly drafted, the prospects for its passage through the House, if not a Robin Cook hot-tip racing certainty, are at least not impossible.

My Bill is every bit as uninteresting as I have claimed. In introducing it, I must pay tribute to the work of Karen Wolfson of The Independent, Mira Bar-Hillel of the Evening Standard, and the wonderful Sarah Pennells of the BBC "Money Box" programme. All those journalists have sought to highlight the problems of leaseholders and are currently campaigning for total reform of the law in that area.

My Bill is more limited. It refers to section 83 of the Housing Act 1996, which in turn amended section 31 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985. It refers to the Housing Act 1996 (Commencement No. 11 and Savings) Order 1997—statutory instrument No. 1851 of that year—especially to the schedule to that order, which is entitled, "Savings".

As an absolute and ultimate token of my intention to be as uninteresting as possible, I shall even quote a speech made by the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) when, speaking from the Government Benches on 22 July 1996, he accepted the need for such a measure:

"The measures in the Bill to help protect leaseholders of residential properties were prompted by the bad actions of a minority of landlords who were imposing unreasonable, and in some cases outrageous, service charge demands. Any leaseholder who contested those claims was faced in some circumstances with the immediate threat of forfeiture and an action, usually in the High Court. There are measures in the Bill that deal with this abuse and provide that forfeiture proceedings can no longer be taken until the disagreement about service charges is resolved. This is a significant step to help leaseholders, an important part of our package of reforms which will materially improve the lot of leaseholders.

Leaving the problems of forfeiture to one side, leaseholders currently have the right to challenge unreasonable service charges or to seek to have a new manager appointed if they can show fault with the current manager, but these jurisdictions lie with the county court. The second stage of our proposals is therefore to switch these cases to the leasehold valuation tribunals.

This move has been widely welcomed, on the ground that the tribunal will offer leaseholders a much more effective and cheap method of taking action against the unreasonable behaviour of landlords. This is because leaseholders have found it extremely difficult to challenge freeholders' actions in the courts. Although the initial court fee may be low, leaseholders often face protracted and potentially expensive litigation, and if they lose the case they are exposed to the risk of paying the costs of both sides. Even in normal cases that last for, say, two days, the likely exposure to costs can run into thousands of pounds.

The advantages of going to leasehold valuation tribunals are considerable. They have quicker, less formal procedures, and there is no need for full legal representation. The tribunal will include a professional surveyor who is fully qualified to assess the technical arguments that are likely to arise.

The other important point is that tribunals cannot award costs, so the exposure of leaseholders to the risk of costs will be much reduced."—[Official Report, 22 July 1996; Vol. 282, c. 47.]

That is an admirably clear account of the intention behind section 83 of the 1996 Act as it relates to the transfer of cases from the county court system. In passing, I shall endanger the parliamentary career prospects of the hon. Member for Hertsmere, by making so bold as to commend his work on the matter at the time, when the measures were being discussed in Committee and passed into law.

None the less, there is a real problem. The intentions of the House are not always successfully translated into legislation. The right to transfer a case from the county court to leasehold valuation tribunals now exists, but hundreds of people have, in a quite unintended and unforeseen way, been denied access to that right. The reason for that is that the commencement order that brought the section into effect stipulated that it should not have effect in relation to service charges when court proceedings had begun before the commencement date itself.

In all the debates in this House, by their noble Lords in another place and in Committee, neither I nor the staff of the House of Commons Library have been able to discover a single reference that might have implied that such cases should be excluded.

I quote from a letter from a well-known company of solicitors, Messrs Mishcon de Reya, whose experience in leasehold cases is not inconsiderable. Mr. Philip Freedman states:

"I think I am right in saying that the way in which the transitional provisions of the commencement order operate was not generally known prior to the commencement order being made and plainly is operating in a very unfortunate way for those tenants who are the subject of Court proceedings which landlords instituted before the order came into force. Further, it is distinctly possible that landlords who saw the commencement order shortly after it was published may have commenced proceedings in the County Court between the making of the order and 1st September in order to avoid the LVT jurisdiction."

Mr. Freedman called that legal loophole "very unfortunate"; Ms Charlotte Martin calls it something else. In her dispute with her landlord over her one-third share of capital works, a total of some £3,000, her landlord has used the court to run up a bill of more than £20,000. Ms Martin says:

"The law is being used and abused as a blunt instrument wielded by millionaires who exhibit a flagrant disregard for the wishes and intentions of those in Parliament who drafted the 1993 and 1996 legislation . . . The law must be changed in order to properly protect leaseholders from what is in effect licensed blackmail and bullying of the worst kind."

Ms Martin is not alone in being bullied in this way. When Mr. Ray Randall went to court with his landlord over the cost of a new window, the landlord arrived with 11 barristers. The cost of 11 barristers for a two-day court hearing may seem somewhat excessive in relation to the cost of one window, but it may stagger the House more to discover that Mr. Randall is being sued for its cost when he was the only tenant in the entire block of more than 30 flats not to have had a new window fitted.

In another case, Ms Fiona MacMillan was told by her landlords that the cost of painting the communal hallway of her building and the front wall was to be £25,000. She challenged her service charge bill, in which her share was put at £3,900, and she now faces, should she lose her case, legal costs of more than £12,000. She is naturally afraid to pursue the case for fear of losing her entire property.

Tremayne Investments Ltd. of Brighton provides a troubling example of just what form such bullying can take. In a letter to its tenant in relation to a disputed service charge, it states:

"You will also be aware that, in the event of a Judgement against you, every Bank, Building Society and Credit Agency in the UK will be automatically informed and that your ability to borrow money and/or obtain mortgages and credit facilities in the future will be reduced severely or to nothing for many years."

In fact, that letter is not only extremely unpleasant in its tone, but inaccurate. There is no automatic notification of credit agencies. The correct position is that if the money remains unpaid for 14 days, the judgment is registered with the Registry of County Court Judgments. However, if it is paid within the 14-day period, it has no effect whatever on a person's credit rating. Of course, that is always assuming that the tenant does not win the case.

But all that is to pile Pelion on Ossa. The House understands only too well the bullying tactics of unscrupulous landlords. That is why the Housing Act 1996 was amended to introduce the provisions that it did. Sadly, the commencement order provision has denied the intended remedy to many honest people. My Bill seeks to rectify that injustice.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Barry Gardiner, Miss Anne Begg, Mr. David Lepper, Mr. Tony Colman, Mr. Gordon Prentice, Mr. Ivor Caplin, Mr. Andrew Dismore, Ms Karen Buck and Kali Mountford.

Housing Service Charges (Amendment)

Mr. Barry Gardiner accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Housing Act 1996 to enable certain county court cases initiated on or before 1st September 1997 to transfer to a leasehold valuation tribunal: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 20 March, and to be printed [Bill 143].

Orders of the Day

CONSOLIDATED FUND (NO. 2) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Question, That the Bill be now read a Second time, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 56 (Consolidated Fund Bills), and agreed to.

Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put forthwith, and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

School Standards and Framework Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Ordered,

That the Bill, as amended, be considered in the following order, namely, New Clauses relating to Part I, amendments relating to Clauses 1 to 19 and Schedule 1, New Clauses relating to Parts II to IV, amendments relating to Clauses 20 to 106 and Schedules 2 to 25, New Clauses relating to Parts V to VII, amendments relating to Clauses 107 to 130 and Schedules 26 to 31, Remaining New Clauses, New Schedules.—[Mr. Blunkett.]

New clause 8

INFANT CLASS SIZES

'.—(1) This section applies to any local education authority where the average infant class sizes in their area is a number at least three below the limit currently specified for the size of infant classes at maintained schools in their area imposed by regulations set out in accordance with section 1, and where there are no infant classes at maintained schools whose size is more than five above the limit referred to above.

(2) Local education authorities to which subsection (1) applies shall be exempted from the requirements of section 1 (4) and the requirements of section 2.'.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.50 pm

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 79 and 80.

Mr. Dorrell: I welcome one of the Government amendments that is grouped with new clause 8. It is nice to begin on a positive note, although I am not sure that we shall return to it too often.

Government amendment No. 80 substitutes the word "shall" for "may" at the beginning of clause 3. It is a simple amendment, and the idea behind it is not complex. The issue arose in Committee, when we sought to argue with the Government that they should be under an obligation to provide local education authorities with the money necessary to redeem the infant class size pledge. In arguing that case, we reminded the Government that they had given a firm commitment on that point as the background to the infant class size pledge. I was pleased when the Minister for School Standards responded to the debate by saying that he had some sympathy with the amendment that we had tabled, but that he needed to improve the drafting of it. I welcome the fact that the Minister has brought back the idea that the Committee approved, and the drafting has, no doubt, been much improved, although quite how eludes me. The amendment that I tabled in Committee was withdrawn at the Minister's request, but precisely the same wording has been brought back to be approved by the House. I congratulate the Minister on the improved drafting that that represents; after the debate, he might explain behind the Chair how that improvement was achieved.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): I appreciate that the right hon. Gentleman was up late last night, in Durham, but he seems to have had a memory lapse. I clearly recall that it was my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) who made the suggestion to which the Minister for School Standards responded.

Mr. Dorrell: I shall consult the record, but I have no doubt that the same thought occurred to us both and was supported on both sides of the Committee. I merely wished to congratulate the Minister on the improved drafting of a single word.

More seriously, I wish that I could be more positive about the way in which the Government have reacted to the arguments that we made in Committee about the need for the delivery of their class size pledge to be made more flexible in the Bill. I want to be clear about what I think should be the attitude to class size in infant schools. Of course, I accept that, if all else is equal, it is better to be taught in a smaller class than in a bigger class. That is simple common sense and has never been the subject of any argument. Furthermore, I accept that research by the Office for Standards in Education has shown linkage between late educational attainment of individual children and class sizes in infant schools, which is why the Government have focused class size policy on five, six and seven-year-olds and have not, as Liberal Democrat Members argued in Committee that they should, extended that principle higher up the age range.

I accept the Government's focus on infant classes, but the key principle is to recognise that class size is not and never can be the only factor to be taken into account when making decisions about the use of resources in individual schools and about which school represents the best educational opportunity for a particular child. The academic proposition that, if all else is equal, it is better to be taught in a smaller class than in a bigger class should always be judged in conjunction with other, conflicting considerations.

Let us consider what parents and teachers must take into account when deciding whether a child's best interests would be served by putting him in a particular class. First, local priorities vary. In certain circumstances, a head teacher may decide to use extra resources to take on extra teachers, to reduce class sizes all the way up the school, but, in others, it may be in the interests of the children to buy extra equipment, to improve buildings or to deal with other priorities that face the school.

It is better to leave decisions on how best to use financial resources to improve educational opportunity for children to the head teacher and governors of a school, rather than to impose a statutory obligation, which would apply in all circumstances, that a class size of 29 is always better than one of 31. Local priorities vary, and it would be over-simplistic to impose a single statutory framework.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): Does the right hon. Gentleman believe that there should be a limit on class sizes? The new clause suggests 35 pupils, but would he accept 40, 45 or 50? Surely a line must be drawn. We are not arguing about whether standards would be improved in a class of 22 pupils rather than one of 20, but does he accept that there is a case for an upper limit?

Mr. Dorrell: As the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, the new clause recognises the case for an upper limit, and would provide a framework to introduce flexibility to local decision making, which is the key to delivering the objective that we all share: ensuring that five, six and seven-year-olds receive the best possible education. The hon. Gentleman was a member of the Standing Committee, and knows that we considered a wide range of amendments. The new clause ventilates the principle that the system should be more flexible than the Government's simplistic legal obligation will allow.

Mr. Blizzard: If the right hon. Gentleman accepts an upper limit, perhaps 35 pupils, why did not his party introduce such a limit during 18 years in government?

Mr. Dorrell: The new clause would allow a local education authority that achieved an average class size of three below the Government target—27, for this target group—the flexibility to have class sizes of up to 35. The new clause would deliver the principle for which the Government have an electoral mandate—focusing on reducing class sizes for five, six and seven-year-olds—in a way that is consistent with efficient use of resources and efficient delivery of the objective that the hon. Gentleman and I share: securing the best possible education, in local circumstances, for individual children. This is merely another suggestion, originating from the same stable as several others made in Committee, of a means by which the principle of flexibility could be introduced.

My first proposition is that local circumstances vary. My second—which must undermine the simple principle that it is always better to be in a class of 29 than to be in a class of 31—is that different teachers perform at different levels. It is patently true that, in a profession the vast majority of whose members are dedicated people doing their best—often in difficult circumstances—to deliver a high-quality service, some will perform better than others. Surely to goodness, when deciding about class size against the background of the different skills and experience of individual teachers, a head ought to take that into account. It is nonsense to say that it is always better to be in a class of 29, even if the teacher is young and recently qualified and has had some difficulty in qualifying, than to be in a class of 31 taught by a very experienced, highly qualified and successful infant school teacher.

4 pm

The third principle on which I base my case for flexibility is that parents' priorities vary when they are choosing a school. As a recent recruit to the Roman Catholic Church, my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) has made a strong case in the newspapers for Catholic parents to be able to choose Catholic education. Some parents will have a strong desire for their children to be educated in Catholic schools; others will have a strong desire for their children to be educated in Church of England schools; others will have an equally strong desire for their children to be educated in secular schools. Although we have an established Church, not everyone wants their children to be educated in schools with a religious ethos. Some people will want their children to be educated in Jewish or Muslim schools, or in specialist schools of other kinds.

The Secretary of State is conferring with the Minister. I suspect that he is recording the fact that this week he used the grant-maintained school legislation to introduce a further principle of diversity in the religious basis of education. I congratulate him on that, and I am pleased that our legislation gave him the opportunity. No doubt he has asked himself how he could have done it without that legislation.

The important point is that parents want, and ought to be able to have, the maximum opportunity to ensure that their choice for their children reflects such considerations. I am not talking about an absolute consideration—the factors that I am citing must be balanced against each other—but those factors ought to be taken into account alongside the Government's doubtless justifiable desire for infant school classes of no more than 30.

Family circumstances are another consideration. Never mind expressions of preference; family circumstances vary. Parents will often be influenced by where siblings go to school. We discussed that in Committee. Parents may want children to go to the same school as their siblings; they may also want them to go to a particular school because the sibling is at another school. That may be more convenient from the family's point of view, because the school concerned is grouped with the school of their choice rather than with their second or third choice. The location of relatives or child care is another consideration. In the real world, parents must bear all those factors in mind when choosing schools.

Finally, there are factors specific to rural areas. It was vaguely amusing to see the Minister for School Standards promoting in Committee a Bill whose effect will be to give the adjudicator power to make decisions—which are currently made by the Secretary of State—on the closure of rural schools, and to see him then, on the day before the countryside march, rush off to a television studio, dressing himself in the clothes of a friend of the countryside, to say that the power that he is transferring to the adjudicator should be transferred back to the Secretary of State.

Later in the debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) will move a new clause to give effect to the Minister's policy, and I look forward to hearing his support for that policy, which he announced from Millbank tower on the day before the Millbank march—the countryside march—[Interruption.] The Millbank march is something that the Minister does quite often.

The Minister has not yet had an opportunity to table a new clause, so we have done it for him. Undoubtedly our new clause is technically flawed, but he will be able to move his own in another place, to give effect to his policy—which I merely wish to endorse. I merely wish to help ensure that he does not miss the opportunity to include it in the Bill.

In the real world, all those considerations have to be balanced against that of class size—a subject on which Ministers, when they are in a corner, betray considerable sensitivity. When the Standing Committee was debating those matters, the Minister issued a press release, which I do not think was circulated to all members of the Committee. None the less, I have—for greater accuracy, as they say—obtained a copy. It stated that "in rural schools, extra money will be provided for a new teacher so that a child can attend their local school in a class of 30 or fewer and not be forced to travel an unreasonable distance to go to a school which has empty places."

Although I am delighted for rural schools, I just wonder why that applies only in rural schools and not in urban schools. I should not have expected to have to remind the Government that a majority of people in the United Kingdom live in urban communities. Presumably the Government's pledge applies equally to urban communities and rural communities.

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Byers): The right hon. Gentleman will know why I referred specifically to rural schools, as the issue was raised on several occasions by himself and by other members of the Committee. The press notice to which he is referring quotes my comments in Committee. The pledge applies not only to rural schools but to all schools, but the quotations in the press notice were in response to issues raised in Committee by himself and other members of the Committee.

Mr. Dorrell: That is perfectly true. However, the Minister made considerable play in Committee of the pledge of extra money, which was to be focused on recruiting extra teachers, to ensure that the choice of parents was respected. In his comments both to the Committee and in the press release, the Minister focused that pledge directly on rural schools.

I look forward to hearing in the Minister's reply to the debate whether he is saying that there will be special protection and assistance to deal with issues in rural schools—which was the implication of his comments to the Committee and of his press release—or whether he is saying that the same principles will apply to schools, regardless of whether they are in a rural or urban community. That is an important issue, and I hope that he will address it directly in his reply.

The press release makes another point, on which I shall conclude:

"This is a popular policy which the Government intends will be delivered in a way which enhances parental preference."

The statement that it is a popular policy designed to enhance parental preference is a form of newspeak of which George Orwell would have been proud. It is simply nonsense to say that the principle is being introduced and that it will have the effect of enhancing parental preference. The reality is that it is a constraint on parental preference and it was always intended to be a constraint on parental preference.

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk) indicated dissent.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but I shall willingly give way to him if he can explain how a limit on class size and a refusal to accept a 31st child into a class, although that may reflect the parents' preference, enhances parental preference. How does it enhance parental preference to deny parents the opportunity to put their child into the 31st place, if that is their choice and if the head teacher believes that it is consistent with the educational interests both of the 31st child and of the other 30? How does the removal of that opportunity enhance parental choice? If the hon. Gentleman wishes to argue that case, I shall give way.

Dr. Turner: During our long debates in Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister made it clear that the Government were going to make sure that the initiative was properly funded and that where parental choice was being thwarted—particularly in rural areas, by the distances that children who were the 31st child might have to travel—the Government were determined that funding would be made available properly to deliver our pledge. Will the right hon. Gentleman explain where his principled objection to a fixed figure sits, when his Government supported and enforced a fixed limit on every nursery class in the land? If his party can support a fixed limit of 26 in that respect, what is wrong with saying that a fixed limit should be observed in respect of other young children?

Mr. Dorrell: What I seek to do with the new clause is to respect the Government's electoral mandate for an infant class size of 30 and to suggest a formula whereby that can be made consistent with the other considerations which, in the real world, have to be taken into account when deciding which school an individual child is to attend. The reality, which the hon. Gentleman did not address, is that if one limits class size in all circumstances, one inhibits rather than enhances parental choice.

The Government's policy, given effect by the Bill, is that it is better for a child to be in a class of 29, in a neighbouring village rather than his or her own village, with an indifferent teacher, in a crumbling building and in a school of the wrong denomination, which was his or her parents' second-choice school, than to be in a class of 31, with an inspirational teacher, in a new building, in a school in his or her home village that is his or her parents' first-choice school and which is in the denomination of the church that the family attends. That is the Government's policy. It is no good Labour Back Benchers shaking their heads: that is the principle on which the Bill is based and the principle that will be translated into law if the Bill goes through unamended.

That is why I seek to introduce an element of flexibility into the provisions of the Bill, to give effect to what I believe should be the key principle in determining which school an individual child attends. That key principle is that, within the overall constraints of policy—I acknowledge the Government's right to do that—if the parent chooses a particular school and the head teacher accepts that that school represents the best opportunity for an individual child, if the parent is happy and the teacher is happy, it is not the Government's role to intervene and say that, even though they are happy, they should not be.

Dr. Turner: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dorrell: No, I have finished.

Dr. Turner: I tried in Committee—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak in support of new clause 8. In Committee, we had a lengthy discussion about infant class sizes. It is important to echo the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) in setting out the framework within which the new clause has been tabled. The Labour Government came to power last May having made a pledge that they would reduce infant class sizes. The figure given at the time was 30 and, although no figure appears on the face of the Bill, we understand that that is the figure which Government will put in the relevant regulations. We accept that the Government came in with that pledge and want to put it into effect in the Bill.

In Committee, we discussed the practical issues involved in trying to implement that pledge at a local level. I hope that the Government will think again about the issues, because it is not just the Conservatives who are raising them—head teachers and others have raised them with me when I have visited infant, junior and primary schools in my constituency. They talk about the problem of putting into effect a pledge to have only 30 in every infant class when the resources may not be available to fund extra teachers and put up extra classrooms. As we know, not every local authority is being given resources initially to meet the pledge.

4.15 pm

In some schools, including some infant schools in my constituency, it is virtually impossible to find space on the site for the extra classroom that would be needed if the pledge were put into effect with an absolute limit of 30. In new clause 8, we suggest that it would be preferable to introduce flexibility, accepting a limit on class sizes, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood made clear to the hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard), but providing a band within which a local authority may operate to allow for situations in which it is physically difficult to accommodate an extra classroom.

Our proposal would also enable extra flexibility on parental preference. I visited a school in my constituency on Monday morning. After a number of appeals went against the head teacher, she now has an infant class with 36 children. She is concerned about how the system will operate. Local education authorities will have to predict that they may have infant classes of more than 30 and put in a bid for funding to accommodate the extra teachers and classrooms that will be necessary. The Government will then decide whether the bid is appropriate, and the funds should be made available.

It is not always possible to predict when extra children will come to a school. If a number of parents move into a school catchment area during the year, the school may suddenly have more than the designated number of children, without the resources to cope with them. The local education authority will not have put in a prior bid and the extra resources to cater for extra classrooms and teachers will not be available. What will happen if the neighbouring schools also do not have room for the children? How will the local education authority cope?

The Minister was asked about that towards the end of the debate in Committee, when he brought back his proposals on funding. He did not answer the questions then. I hope that he will be able to do so now.

We are not suggesting that the Government throw away their pledge to limit infant class sizes. However, practical concerns remain—raised not just by Conservative Members, but by head teachers—about how that pledge can be put into effect, notwithstanding the Government's proposals on extra funding. There is concern about authorities that will not, in the first instance, receive extra funding. There is concern about whether the money available from the abolition of the assisted places scheme will be sufficient to accommodate the pledge in all the areas in which extra resources will be necessary—an argument of which the Minister will be very well aware.

[Mrs. Theresa May]

There is concern that tensions will increase between parental choice of school and the Government's decision to limit infant class sizes. New clause 8 does not do away with the concept of a limit; it suggests a degree of flexibility in LEAs.

Mr. Blizzard: In setting, in effect, a class size limit of 35, would not the hon. Lady, by her own argument, then face the problem of the 36th child—if that is deemed to be a problem?

Mrs. May: If any limit is set, there can be the problem of the extra child. Flexibility in numbers provides greater ability to accommodate children and enables greater parental choice in an LEA. There would be flexibility because some schools may be under the limit, while others are over it. I fully accept that the hon. Gentleman's point brings into sharp focus the tension between parental preference and class size. We have always thought that parental preference should be given a high priority—although it cannot be met in every circumstance. By providing extra flexibility, parental preference will more likely be met.

The Minister has not fully addressed the issue that I and others raised in Committee concerning the soon-to-be LEA—following the demise of Berkshire county council on 1 April—in my constituency. It feels that some parents would prefer their child to be in a class of, say, 31 or 32, but where there was a classroom assistant as well as a teacher, so that contact time with the child was increased, rather than their child being in a class of 30 or 29 in which there was only a teacher. That is exactly the sharp choice described by my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood.

The Government are placing everything on the class size limit and not taking into account all the other factors, such as resources available to an LEA, space available on a school site, the teaching resource and the availability of classroom assistants, who can be extremely important in an infant class.

Such factors, together with parental preference, should be given a higher priority in the Bill, which provides simply a single limit on class size. I hope that the Government will be able not only to respond to the points raised but to look again at the possibility of introducing a degree of flexibility, which accepts the concept of a limit but provides leeway for LEAs to help meet practically parental preference and other issues.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): I sincerely believe that the Government's response to the new clause will be a good pointer to whether their interest in education derives from a genuine concern about improving the quality of education or from their electoral concern and a fascination with election slogans emanating from Millbank tower.

There can be no doubt that the pledge on classroom size was a very effective slogan; it worked very well for the Labour party. Now that Labour Members are the Government, they have to look at the reality. The reality is that not only Opposition Members but teachers, governors and parents are asking many questions about what the policy, strictly interpreted, will mean.

We support the goal of smaller class sizes. However, if the annual expenditure of £100 million alone—the Department has costed its policy at that amount—will unlock the key to a better education system, I am sure that the previous Government would have found the money to pursue such a policy. We increased education spending by billions of pounds—not just by £100 million—and, in doing so, we improved the standards and the quality of education.

On the other hand, as reported in The Times Educational Supplement, the present Government's policy has led governors to predict a disaster if popular schools are required to expand out of control. I believe that the Minister has boxed himself in by pledging that no child will be forced to attend a failing school. That commitment has been latched onto as a way of forcing the most popular schools to grow even further. As The Times Educational Supplement points out, there are many reasons why a school is popular. One reason is that it has reached an optimum size. If the Minister forces such schools to grow even further, he will reduce standards in those and in other schools.

As I said, we are in favour of smaller class sizes, and the new clause seeks to ensure that such an objective is interpreted broadly. In Surrey, we have small class sizes—the average is under 27 per class. We have always devoted additional expenditure, over and above the standard spending assessment, to early years primary schools. Therefore, we are entirely sympathetic with the Government's objective.

The new clause seeks to introduce some flexibility so that in an authority area where the average class size is 27, individual schools may have an additional eight pupils in a class. It is not a question of coping with an additional single child, but of introducing the flexibility to deal with an additional eight children. That is surely a significant difference.

The school in the village where I live has two classes of just under 30 pupils. The school is growing—indeed, it needs to take on more children in order to survive and pay its way. If that school is to survive, classes may have to include a 31st or 32nd child. Parents prefer to send their children to the local village school rather than braving the peak-hour commuter traffic to take their children to schools in the neighbouring village or in the main town of Guildford. Parents do not make that choice, because it would not be good for their children: it is better for children to be educated with their friends in the village where they are growing up. As a result of the Government's proposals, parents will no longer have that choice.

The bias towards smaller class sizes is based on research, but that research also shows clearly that only a significant drop in class size has an impact on educational achievement. No researcher in this area has proved that small variations in class size have any significant impact on the quality of education provided. The environment in which the child learns and the quality of teaching are far more important.

Curiously, during the passage of education Bills introduced by the previous Government, the present Ministers were the first to warn of "the dead hand" of bureaucracy, to use the words of the Minister for School Standards. The Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment said:

"We must stop the infliction on schools and children of a bureaucracy that will do no good to anybody."—[Official Report, 9 November 1992; Vol. 213, c. 687.]

Yet the imposition of the rigid limit of 30 per class will impose a bureaucracy that will do "no good to anybody".

On the other hand, the wider objective in the new clause would mean that the benefit of lower class sizes could feed through, but without the damage that the Government's policy would inflict.

4.30 pm

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): Thank you for calling me to speak, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We seem to be working in synchronicity and I hope that I will continue to be in tune with your wishes as I speak briefly in support of the new clause.

I am pleased to follow my hon. Friends in commending new clause 8. Many of the hon. Members present have just finished considering the Bill in the Standing Committee and I think that most would agree that it was an exemplary Committee in that it was constructive and Opposition Members did their best to help Ministers to arrive at better legislation.

The new clause is a classic example of how the Opposition are seeking again to assist Ministers and ensure that they avoid a damaging pitfall. The rigidity and inflexibility that the Bill would enshrine in law would cause the Government major problems, as they would be held responsible for the chaos that would ensue. There would also be problems for local authorities and schools throughout the country.

More important, the Bill would impose enormous problems on parents, who would lose an element of choice. Their choices and decisions would be limited and restricted by the legislation, and their choice of school would be narrower. In many areas, there would be difficulties in meeting parents' educational requirements.

Our suggested new clause would provide the discipline that the Government reasonably seek to introduce in requiring an average class size of a certain level and it would certainly enshrine in law the principle of aiming for lower class sizes. It would also allow some flexibility, which would be a major improvement and would help the Government to avoid some of the embarrassing difficulties that they face in the years ahead if they do not accept it.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) referred to some of the difficulties that would arise with the Government's inflexible proposals, such as difficulties with siblings and for people with a preference for denominational education in Church schools, which could not be met because of rigid class size limits. The Government must bear in mind the fact that for many parents the most important factor in deciding where their child should go to school is its religious character. No Government should have a right to ride roughshod over that choice and deny parents the freedom to choose a denominational education. The Bill risks doing so.

For many parents, it is important that their children should be able to attend their local school. Often, it is a matter of practicality for the family, especially when both parents work. In that case, it can be vital to send children to a school close to home.

While the Minister may have given some serious reassurance to rural schools—we wait to hear whether that is the case—as a Member representing a suburban constituency, I must press him further on the criteria that he would apply in allowing extra funding to popular schools in urban and suburban areas that reach the class size limit. It is not good enough merely to say that a school that feels that it may reach or breach the limit would be able to apply for a grant to increase the size of its premises and the number of teaching staff to accommodate the extra need. We need to know what criteria will be used, and whether a popular school in a suburban or urban area will always be given the funds promptly to allow for expansion to meet parental choice.

As Labour Members who served in Committee will know, I represent an area which is fortunate in the quality of its schools. I am most concerned about the impact of the Government's proposals on popular schools—I am in the fortunate position of having to defend the popularity of the schools in my area, which attract many applications from outside their catchment areas and even the borough boundary. Any reduction in the choice that is available to parents who live just over the boundary in the Manchester metropolitan borough council area—they are not my constituents—is a serious threat, which would be to their detriment.

The Bill is flawed; it betrays an arrogant belief that the Government know better than parents how to choose schools for children, and better than schools and local authorities what is right for children. It puts ahead of parental choice and responsibility the notion that Ministers should set public priorities that will apply throughout the country, regardless of particular circumstances. The new clause would improve the Bill and it would help the Government to avoid embarrassing difficulties in the future. I very much hope that the Minister will accept it.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): What my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) has said is entirely consistent with reality. The recent league tables show that Cheshire and Staffordshire are two of the counties that achieved tremendous school results. There is a remarkable symmetry between what has been going on in those counties, which are, to a great extent, rural counties.

From time to time, I have had to fight very hard within the Staffordshire county council educational framework to ensure that the rural schools in my constituency have been sustained. Indeed, I pay tribute to the county council, which has pursued a policy of ensuring that rural schools survive, even though they may have class sizes well below the numbers that are being promulgated at the moment. Such schools perform an immensely important function in sustaining the rural community. It is not realistic to set arbitrary limits that will prevent rural schools, particularly infant schools, from surviving.

I thoroughly support new clause 8, which would guarantee arrangements to ensure the preservation of schools that should be preserved. The Government are in power largely as a result of the support—which I think was misconceived, as the Bill betrays—that they received from people in rural areas in the general election last year. If the Government want to maintain that support, they should listen to the arguments that are being advanced by Conservative Members.

Rural schools are vital to a community's sense of identity, as was demonstrated by the Countryside Alliance only 10 days ago. Although the alliance's main objectives concerned other questions relating to rural areas, schools are fundamental to rural communities.

[Mr. William Cash]

It is essential that we ensure the survival of rural schools, even if they are undersized. I hope that the Minister will show due regard to the significance of those schools, and ensure that the Bill's measures will do nothing that would lead to their being closed. If the Government make a mistake on this, they will pay the price in the ballot-box.

Mr. Willis: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, or is it the right hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Cash: Certainly not.

Mr. Willis: It was a Freudian slip. The hon. Gentleman's day will come. I listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman said. Why, during the lifetime of the last Conservative Government, were more than 450 small rural primary schools closed? That was unprecedented. More were closed under the previous Government than under any Government since the war. Is there a response to that?

Mr. Cash: The short answer is that I said that I was not always right. I do not believe that I ever am. Part of the argument was that there was a problem, and many rural schools were closed under the previous Administration.

The argument that I address to the new Government, because they are the Government, is that they should have regard to the importance of sustaining the rural communities. It is essential that rural schools are maintained. It does not matter what happened in the past. The key question now is what the present Government intend to do about it. Rural schools must be sustained, even if they appear to be undersized. If the rural communities are at stake, I look to the Government to respond.

Mr. Byers: I shall be asking the House to accept Government amendments Nos. 79 and 80. As the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) said, we discussed similar amendments in Committee. My recollection is the same as that of the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis). The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) moved an amendment to change "may" to "shall". Parliamentary counsel has had an opportunity to examine the important drafting issues raised by those two amendments and has agreed that is appropriate to change "shall" to "may". That is all that amendments Nos. 79 and 80 do.

Amendment No. 79 imposes a limit on class sizes and places a duty on the Secretary of State to limit them. Amendment No. 80 says that the Secretary of State "shall" pay grant for the purposes of reducing class size.

I hope that all hon. Members will be able to accept the two Government amendments, which reflect a discussion in Committee in which there was broad agreement. I am pleased that we can start off the Report stage on something that the whole House can accept and that we can reflect the positive spirit of the proceedings in Committee. That is probably as far as it goes; I shall be asking the House to reject new clause 8.

Before I come on to the detail of the new clause, may I say that I listened carefully to the points made to the hon. Member for Stone, who has been a doughty campaigner for schools in Staffordshire for many years. Some exciting work is going on in Staffordshire to harness new technology to benefit rural schools. We can build on that nationally. It will enable children attending rural primary schools to have a breadth of education experience which, in days gone by, might have been denied to them. New technology will provide the opportunity of a good standard of education to children in schools in Staffordshire and throughout the country.

I hope that, later tonight, we shall discuss new clause 13, which deals specifically with protecting rural schools threatened with closure. Hon. Members were right to raise concerns about the effect of class size policy on rural infant schools in particular. If it is handled badly, it may also affect schools in built-up and urban areas. I shall go through the steps that the Government intend to take and the safeguards that we shall put in place to make sure that the difficulties to which right hon. and hon. Members have referred simply will not occur.

Before I deal with the Government's approach, I shall say a few words about new clause 8. The right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) said that a degree of flexibility with regard to class size was vital. The flexibility provided by the new clause would allow larger classes—up to 35—with all the problems that have been mentioned. The intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) made the point well; any cut-off may create difficulties. Whether the limit is 35 or 30, we must put in place safeguards and mechanisms that ensure that we do not create difficulties such as the denial of parental preference, which has been referred to during this short debate.

We recognise that class size is not the only factor affecting good quality education. The class can be small, but if the teacher is bad and poorly prepared, the quality of education will not be satisfactory. We need to take steps to ensure that we have good teachers in every class in every school.

A good teacher will be helped by a smaller class size. That is why we need a combination of policies. It is not merely a matter of saying that we want to raise standards and we will do that by reducing class size. That will not be enough. The reduction of class size policy must be seen alongside steps to improve teacher training, to provide greater access to literacy and numeracy materials in schools, and to improve the environment through our capital programme and the new deal for schools. All those measures will ensure that, in a variety of ways, we can drive up standards in our schools.

In that context, reducing class sizes in the infant years will play an important role. The number of five, six and seven-year-olds in classes of more than 30 has risen dramatically over recent years.

4.45 pm

Mr. St. Aubyn: Will the Minister try to enlighten us by pointing to any research that suggests that the quality of teaching is improved if the class size is reduced from 31 to 30?

Mr. Byers: The hon. Gentleman was not listening. I did not say that a good teacher and larger or smaller classes were mutually exclusive. The Government are committed to a many-faceted approach to raising standards, partly by reducing class size, and also through good quality teaching. The two must go together. I agreed with the right hon. Member for Charnwood that a range of issues need to be addressed. Class size is one factor which, we believe, makes an important impact on the quality of education provided in infant schools.

We want a national scheme, and we make no apology for that. We do not want local variations in class size. We were elected on a clear pledge of classes of no more than 30 for five, six and seven-year-olds by the end of this Parliament, and we are on course to deliver that pledge. It will not be subject to local variations, but will be a national scheme delivered through local partners—through schools, Churches and local education authorities. Working through those partners, we will be able to deliver the pledge.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): The Minister is right to say that the Government pledged to introduce a national scheme to ensure that class sizes for five, six and seven-year-olds would be reduced to a maximum of 30. Will he confirm to the House what the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris), told us in Committee—that, at a national level, there would be no possibility of schools meeting the class size pledge for key stage 1 by increasing class sizes for key stage 2, or in any other way damaging the education of key stage 2 pupils?

Mr. Byers: The attraction of the method that the Government are using to deliver the pledge is that the money is ring-fenced and cannot be used for any other purpose. By ring-fencing the resources by way of specific grant, we can guarantee that every penny that we redirect from the phasing out of the assisted places scheme will be used for the revenue spending to employ more teachers to meet the class size pledge. We will be able to deliver for five, six and seven-year-olds and, because we are providing additional resources, that should not have a consequence for seven, eight and nine-year-olds, as we are dealing with key stage 1.

Mr. Foster: The Minister has perhaps not been quite as robust in his response as the House would have liked. Will he give an absolute assurance that no school will be allowed to introduce the class size maximum of 30 for key stage 1 in a way that is to the detriment of pupils in key stage 2, either by increasing their class sizes or by any other method?

Mr. Byers: I am disappointed that I have not been robust enough in my response—I will have another go and I hope it will be better this time. Delivering the pledge will affect infant classes of five, six and seven-year-olds and we will provide the resources for that. There is no need, therefore, for children at key stage 2 to be affected adversely.

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary said—and I am happy to confirm—that we will monitor closely the way in which schools use the new regime and we will see how it affects key stage 2 pupils to make sure there are no adverse consequences. We will look carefully at the local management schemes—which the Secretary of State approves—to make sure that no attempt is made to use money for key stage 1 by diverting resources away from key stage 2 pupils.

Mr. Dorrell: Is not the reason why the Minister cannot give the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) the assurance he seeks that, although he says it is the Government's intention specifically to grant the extra money to provide for five, six and seven-year-olds, the Government have no machinery for ring-fencing the budget that is not specifically granted—that is, the whole of the budget currently spent on those pupils? The Government can specifically grant, and therefore ring-fence, the extra money, but it is still open to a school or LEA to withdraw money currently used for five, six and seven-year-olds to use elsewhere. The implication of targeting in the Minister's remarks is something which the Government cannot deliver.

Mr. Byers: The right hon. Gentleman chose to ignore my final point, which was that there is a safeguard. All local schemes for management, and the delegation of budgets to schools, have to be approved by the Secretary of State. If, within that regime, a local authority seeks to divert resources from key stage 1 pupils—and uses the additional specific grant as an opportunity to do it—it will be thrown up as part of the local management scheme.

I can assure the right hon. Member for Charnwood that the Secretary of State will not approve a local management scheme that tries to achieve those objectives. In approving a local management scheme, the Secretary of State will be exercising a power inherited from the previous Administration, who gave Secretaries of State precisely that power.

Some play was made of the importance of religious education and the concerns that Catholic or Church of England schools might not be able to meet parental preference. I did not hear from the right hon. Member for Charnwood or any of his hon. Friends the views of the Church education authorities. The reason we did not hear their views is that the Church education authorities support the Government's policy on class size reductions.

There have been attempts to try to get the Church authorities to express concerns or reservations about the policy, but that has not happened because they fully support the Government's pledge to reduce infant class sizes. The Church authorities support the policy, which they know will be implemented in a way which takes account of their concerns and views. That is why it is important to deliver the pledge through the LEAs, the Church authorities and the schools themselves.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) rose—

Mr. Byers: We will not wait until the end of this Parliament, which was the pledge—we will start delivering from this September. We will start in constituencies in Devon—such as that of the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning)—where we will spend £1 million from this September on reducing class sizes for 6,100 five, six and seven-year-olds. I hope that she will welcome the Government's action.

Mrs. Browning: If the governing body of a Church school had any concern about numbers—for example, the 31st child, siblings and so on—is it correct that the Church authority would have a veto on the matter?

Mr. Byers: It will be for the admissions authority to trigger the additional resource that would follow on from the 31st child. We made the point in Committee that, whether it is a rural school or a popular school, we will take steps to ensure that if there is a 31st child, additional resources will follow to ensure that parental preference is not denied. The additional teacher will be made available. Therefore, the school will be able to ensure that the class will have 30 or fewer children. That will apply across the board, not just in rural areas. We made it clear in Committee that we will ensure that the pledge is delivered in a way that is sensitive to parental preference. That is exactly how we intend to do it.

Mrs. Browning rose—

Mr. Byers: I shall give way once more, but then I must make progress.

Mrs. Browning: I am sorry to press the Minister, but it is important. Is it the case that, in such a circumstance, Church authorities have not been promised a veto? I shall be grateful for a specific answer to that question.

Mr. Byers: No one has been promised a veto on anything. That would be inappropriate. I hope that that answer satisfies the hon. Lady.

We have sought to work with the education service, and we intend to do that. As a result of our class size pledge and the way in which we intend to target resources, we can reduce class sizes and meet parental preference, which was not the case under the regime that we inherited from the previous Government. We are taking steps to ensure that we can do that not just for rural schools but for urban schools that might be popular and offer high standards. They will have the opportunity to reduce their class sizes.

The new clause seeks to deny hundreds of thousands of children in our country the benefit of the pledge that the Government made to the electorate in the run-up to the election on 1 May. We intend to ensure that we will deliver on our pledge.

The flexibility that the right hon. Member for Charnwood seeks to introduce is for higher class sizes. We reject that. We recognise the value of class size and the crucial part that it will play in driving up standards in our schools. We intend to deliver on our pledge, not from the end of this Parliament but from September of this year. Some 120,000 five, six and seven-year-olds will benefit from this September. By the end of this Parliament, 500,000 five, six and seven-year-olds will benefit because of the Government's commitment.

The new clause is destructive. It will deny those opportunities, which is why I urge the House to vote against it.

Mr. Dorrell: The Minister has responded to none of the concerns that I expressed. It remains the Government's position that it is more important to be in a class of 29, in a second-choice school, with a newly qualified teacher. In the Government's view, that is a better set of circumstances than to be in a class of 31, with an inspirational teacher, in one's school of first choice, in gleaming new buildings. That is not the experience of the overwhelming majority of Britain's parents. That is why we shall press the new clause to a vote.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New clause 14

EDUCATION DEVELOPMENT PLAN

'Educational development plans shall contain a plan for Special Educational Needs, which shall outline:

(a) the mechanism by which the LEA identifies special needs within its area;

(b) how it intends to meet current legislation including requirements of codes of practice;

(c) appeals mechanisms; and

(d) how it will meet the statutory requirements of the statements process.'.—[Mrs. Browning.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mrs. Browning: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss new clause 20—Special educational needs—

'(1) The Education Act 1996 shall be amended as follows.

(2) In section 316 (Children with special educational needs normally to be educated in mainstream schools)

(a) for subsection (1) there shall be substituted—

"Any person exercising function under this part in respect of a child with special educational needs who should be educated in school shall secure that the child is educated in a school which is not a special school unless that is incompatible with the wishes of the parent and the needs and ascertainable wishes of the child."

(b) subsection (2) shall be omitted.'.

Mrs. Browning: New clause 14 would establish a clear obligation on local authorities to identify, in education development plans, areas of special educational needs for which they have responsibility. It is important that that is included in the plans. In Committee, we expressed our concern about the general principle of education development plans, but it would be unrealistic for us to assume that they will not be part of the Bill. From that starting point, we tabled new clause 14 for addition to the Bill.

Before Christmas, the House had an Adjournment debate on a Friday morning on the Government's policy on special educational needs, based on their consultation document, "Excellence for All Children: Meeting Special Educational Needs". It is clear from the document and the consultation, which has now concluded, that the Government intend to introduce changes to the range of policies that affect children with special educational needs. The Minister has said on other occasions that the Government's recommendations on any changes—which, I understand, will be available in the summer—will not be part of any primary legislation. It is, therefore, important that a local education authority's education development plan, which will be approved by the Secretary of State, should encompass its responsibilities for special educational needs.

As new clause 14 makes clear, it is important that local authorities outline the mechanism by which they identify special needs. Many LEAs are unable to say how many children with different types of disability they provide for, and it seems a sensible starting point to have a mechanism for identifying special educational needs and, more specifically, the variety of needs that they have to meet. It is also important that the provision made by LEAs meets current legislation. The Minister has made it clear that the SEN code of practice is likely to be changed—we do not object if it is improved—but it is incumbent on LEAs to show how they intend to comply with the current code of practice.

Appeals mechanisms are especially important to parents and details should also be included in LEAs' education development plans. LEAs should also include in their plans details of how they intend to meet the statutory requirements of the statementing process.

The Government's Green Paper summarises some of the changes that they anticipate will be made, possibly after the Bill has received Royal Assent. Four key points are set out on page 42 and we believe that they should be incorporated in education development plans. The Green Paper states:

"A revised version of the SEN Code of Practice will be in place, preserving the principles and safeguards of the present Code, while simplifying procedures and keeping paperwork to a minimum.

There will be renewed emphasis on provision under the school-based stages of the Code of Practice, with support from LEAs and greater assurance for parents of effective intervention, particularly at stage 3."

The Government claim:

"The result of these improvements will be that the proportion of children who need a statement will be moving towards 2 per cent."

I do not wish to rehearse the debate on statementing that I have previously had with the Minister—and will have again when she makes known the outcome of the consultation—but it is clear that the statementing process will be retained. It is, therefore, important that LEAs identify clearly in their education development plans how they will undertake the statementing process. The Green Paper also states:

"The great majority of SEN assessments will be completed within the statutory timetable."

It is important that that requirement is included in the Bill.

The Green Paper states, on page 70:

"The Government has a central responsibility for raising standards and promoting progress for all children, including those with SEN."

We do not disagree. That wording is almost identical to the explanatory notes in the Bill when it describes the responsibilities of LEAs to provide an education development plan for submission to the Secretary of State. The Bill states that education development plans are a statement of proposals for developing provision of education by raising the standards of education and improving the performance of schools. The two definitions are therefore compatible.

5.15 pm

It is fair to say that special educational needs were discussed only in passing as they were covered by clauses in the Bill. No section referred specifically to SEN and, although one or two amendments were debated in more detail, it is important that the Government recognise that, in legislating for the future, they should include consideration of special educational needs.

From the cases that Members of Parliament take up on behalf of children with special educational needs, it is clear that parents are often in dispute with their LEA over their child's statement or individual requirements. If more clarity can be achieved in making LEAs aware that they have to follow codes of practice and legislation, and submit their plans for doing so to Secretary of State for scrutiny, that can only assist parents and the Minister, especially when we learn the details of her proposals once the result of the consultation on the Green Paper is known. I hope that new clause 14 is non-controversial and that the Minister will accept it in the spirit in which it is tabled. I also hope that its main beneficiaries will be children with special educational needs.

Mr. Willis: Liberal Democrat Members support the comments of the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning). If new clause 14 is pressed to a vote, we shall support her in the Lobby. I hope that it will not be pressed, because I trust that the Minister supports most of what the hon. Lady said.

I begin my remarks on new clause 20 by praising the previous Government. It is unusual to hear such praise in the House, but there have been remarkable advances in working with children with special educational needs over the past 20 years, particularly since the Education Act 1981. It is difficult to think that, 20-odd years ago, we categorised young people in terms of their disabilities for the whole of their school lives. Worse, some children were categorised as incapable of being educated. It is important to put on record the fact that we have come a long way in addressing the problems of teaching children with special educational needs and including them in our education system. I am sure that the Minister supports those comments.

We owe Baroness Warnock and her committee a tremendous debt of gratitude for the work that was done in producing their report. The 1981 Act did not bring about all that we wanted to result from the report, but it put into legislation the requirement for local education authorities and schools to meet more effectively their responsibilities to children with special needs. Subsequent legislation and, in particular, the code of practice have embedded good practice towards children with special educational needs in our education system. New clause 20, and new clause 14, would further embed good practice in legislation.

The number of statemented children who are in mainstream education has risen to 134,000, which is remarkable. Another achievement in which the previous Government played a part is the doubling since 1991 of the number of statemented children in mainstream schools.

Unfortunately, there has been no corresponding decline in the number of children in special schools. There is a feeling that having statemented children in mainstream schools has caused a decline in special schools and the number of places in them. Several hon. Members, such as the hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), have pleaded strongly for the retention of special school provision. Although the number of statemented children in mainstream schools doubled in the 1990s, the number of children in special schools has remained constant at 98,000.

I want more children to be educated not in special schools, but in mainstream schools wherever possible, and the new clause deals with that matter.

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that Baroness Warnock told the Select Committee on Education and Employment during the previous Parliament that her suggestion of total integration had gone a little too far, and that she had changed her mind slightly?

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that so many statements have been issued over the past few years because parents, particularly vociferous middle-class parents, have realised that statementing is a good way to ensure that resources are directed to their child, and have pushed for statementing? When I was head of a special school, it was difficult to get parents to agree to statementing, because they believed that their child would be stigmatised by it. The increase in statementing is a reason for the decrease in the number of special school places.

Mr. Willis: I agree with both of the hon. Gentleman's points. I have never supported 100 per cent. integration, and do not believe that the Warnock committee meant it to come about, because mainstream education will never be appropriate for some children. I agree that more statements have been issued because of middle-class pressure, which has been the case in my local education authority, but I would like to think that the increase also came about because parents want the best for their children. I do not blame parents for using the system to help them.

The number of statemented children who are educated in mainstream schools differs between LEAs. In some, less than 0.5 per cent. of statemented children are educated in mainstream schools, but in others, the figure is as much as 2 per cent. There are stark differences between individual schools. At John Smeaton school in Leeds, where I worked before being elected to the House, 5 per cent. of the 1,600 children had statements of special educational needs, and a further 220 were on level 3 of the code of practice, which is a significant number. We offered specialist provision, particularly to children with severe learning difficulties, and a facility to children with visual impairments. There was a feeling that many schools copped out and encouraged parents to ask my school to admit their children rather than fight for places at local schools which, in many cases, could have provided for the children equally well.

I recommend to hon. Members recent research carried out by Mel Ainscow of the university of Manchester, Tony Booth of the Open university, and Alan Dyson of Newcastle university, which shows the advantages that can be gained by children with special educational needs who are educated with their peers. Education is more than learning skills and acquiring knowledge; it is about developing and changing pupils' attitudes and behaviour towards each other, and evidence shows that inclusive education is the greatest force for such development.

At one school in Cleveland, I worked on the integration of children with physical impairments. A thalidomide child named Ricky Corner came to the school. He had no arms, and wrote with his foot. At first, that was a great cause of amusement and embarrassment to staff and students, but having him at the school was a great advantage, and the memory of the great joy and the understanding of his problem that he brought to his peer group and to staff has remained with me for many years.

It is a great pity that the Secretary of State is not here, because, seven or eight years ago, we had the pleasure of undertaking pioneering work with children who were totally blind and coming into a mainstream set-up. Mark Lister, who was from an incredibly disadvantaged family with immense social problems, came into my school in Leeds. Several years later, that young man went to Keele university to read for a law degree. He had a long-distance relationship with a girl in Poland, and is now married with a child. He spent all his time in a busy and difficult mainstream setting.

Thousands of examples could be given to illustrate why the Government should accept the new clause, and make inclusive education a pillar of the structure of raising standards. For parents, there is the immense satisfaction of having their children taught in mainstream education. There is no doubt that, although some parents still prefer their children to be educated in special schools—often for "protectionist" reasons—the vast majority aspire for their children to be educated alongside not just their peers but, if possible, children who live in the same street. That should be the ideal.

5.30 pm

In many ways, the barrier to the development of an inclusive education system is attitude—not legislation, and, if I may say so, not even resources. However, the Education Act 1981 gave local education authorities and schools an opt-out by making integration subject to an efficiency clause. Sadly, that has been used all too readily to deny children access to mainstream education.

The new clause is intended to make the Government's position and intention clear. It is intended to make it clear that all children should be given the opportunity to be taught in mainstream education, unless that is incompatible with the wishes of parents and the needs and ascertainable wishes of the children. The new clause does not fetter parents' right to send their children to special schools if that is considered best; nor does it give parents an unfettered right to send their children to the school of their choice. Parents would still be subject to the schedules of the Education Act 1996.

What the new clause does is provide an entitlement for every child in the country to a mainstream place, and tell every local education authority, every education action zone and every school to plan their resources accordingly.

Mrs. May: I support the new clause, and hope that, given the spirit in which it was moved, the Government will look favourably on it. It sends a clear message about the importance that we all attach to special educational needs, and about our view that every local education authority should include SEN as a natural part of its consideration of the development of education in its area.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) said, when we discussed educational development plans in Committee, valid questions were raised about whether they were appropriate. As the Government want to press ahead with such plans, however, I think it important to send a clear message that it is not simply a question of developing standards and performance targets that relate only to mainstream schools. The Bill should specify that the same criteria will relate to special educational needs, whether they are catered for by special schools or by mainstream provision. If the Government accepted the new clause, they would, indeed, send a clear message about the importance of LEAs' including SEN in their plans.

We have already discussed the question of special schools versus mainstream education for children with special needs. The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) mentioned that debate and, indeed, made a passing reference to my contribution. The topic is important, and I am glad that it will be focused on, but we need to think carefully about what should be done. I am interested by new clause 20, tabled by the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough. In the document entitled "Excellence for All Children"—I hesitate to say whether it is a White Paper or a Green Paper, because I always seem to get it wrong—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Ms Estelle Morris): Green.

Mrs. May: I thank the Minister for correcting me from a sedentary position.

In that Green Paper, the Government presented their vision of an inclusive policy for children with special educational needs. I am sure that we all agree about the importance of ceasing to assume—it has been assumed in the past, but in recent years our attitude has changed—that the only way in which to teach a child with SEN is to send that child to a special school. We must accept that mainstream education is beneficial where it is possible, and where it is right for the child concerned.

I must, however, add a word of caution. I do not want a policy of inclusion to become a mantra, followed purely for the sake of it. We must recognise not only the requirements of children with SEN, but the requirements of other children in the mainstream class and, indeed, the rest of the school.

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough spoke of the benefits that could result from educating disabled children in the mainstream system. I have seen those benefits myself. I was a governor of a primary school to which a blind child was brought. My example is similar to that given by the hon. Gentleman. The parents were clear about their wish for the child to be educated in the local primary school, and extra resources were provided to enable that to happen.

I well remember the meeting of the governing body at which the head teacher listed the benefits that had been gained not only by the child who had been able to be educated among his peers, but by the other children who had been able to relate to him. Attitudes had changed. Earlier this week, I talked to another head teacher in a school in my constituency. She told me that, when a child in a wheelchair was introduced to mainstream education, a change took place in the other children. Instead of saying, "Here comes the girl in a wheelchair", they said, "Here comes Melanie". They recognised the person. We cannot overestimate the change in attitudes and the benefit to other children, which will stay with them for the rest of their lives. We should not shy away from it.

Having said that, I must add that there are some children with SEN for whom inclusion in a mainstream class is not appropriate. The inclusion of some children would cause great difficulty for the rest of the class. Such circumstances are most likely to apply to children with particular behavioural difficulties, who would be disruptive. It might be difficult for teachers to cope with such children; or they might receive the bulk of the teacher's attention, while the others failed to be given the attention that they needed and deserved. While recognising the benefits of mainstream education, we must also recognise that what is right for the child and the school must be taken into account in any decision.

It is a delicate balance. We do not want head teachers simply to say that they will not take a particular child with special needs, because they think that it will be difficult to cope with that child in the classroom, and to shut that child out. We want to ensure that the right attitudes are taken, and that inclusion is possible where it is right. I continue to believe, however, that special schools will always be needed for some children. We should not give the impression that we do not think that they are appropriate for anyone. A balance must struck in assessing the specific needs of every child, to determine what is right in each child's circumstances.

I am very pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton has moved new clause 14. Special educational needs provision should be clearly dealt with in the Bill, clearly stating that local education authorities must not sweep SEN to the side or believe that it is a secondary consideration. SEN must be part of their work in developing educational development plans for their area. It must be natural for local education authorities to consider, as part of their process of developing education, how they will provide for SEN and how they will develop that provision.

My caveats on the inclusive policy proposed in new clause 20 are based on my belief that LEAs should be required in the Bill to give equal consideration to special educational needs, which should be part of their education development plans. I hope that the Government will accept new clause 14 in the spirit in which it was moved.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): I agree entirely with the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), especially her comments on the importance of spelling out in the Bill the importance of special educational needs and of striking the right balance between mainstream and special schools. I strongly support both new clause 14 and new clause 20, as they would add considerably to the Bill. As my hon. Friend said, they would also send a clear message that education authorities must explicitly consider special educational needs.

In my previous constituency, I had experience of a school for dyslexic children, which was in the independent sector, and was greatly concerned to learn of the many cases in which parents struggled to obtain the right education for their child. So often, some education authorities refused point-blank to accept that a dyslexic child had a special educational need, although an independent school could have met that need. Although some authorities—curiously, they were Labour-controlled authorities, such as Derbyshire—were strongly supportive and realised that a certain school could meet a child's needs, other authorities were not supportive.

Local education authorities too often feel that they can cope within their own boundaries with almost any difficulty that a child may face, but they cannot. I wish that local education authorities would own up to the fact that they cannot possibly meet every special educational need, as children may have one of many difficulties.

I should like there to be much greater co-ordination between local education authorities so that, although they cannot provide for every special educational need, they can join other authorities in providing and rationalising special provision for children. That would not only relieve them from thinking that they must make all provision within their boundaries, but greatly extend provision by producing economies of scale. Consequently, special schools in the maintained sector could attract children from a wider area and become viable, as counties would not be competing with one another.

My own constituency is in the extreme north-east of Hampshire and abuts Surrey. For some of my constituents, the closest special educational need provision in Hampshire is 10 or 20 miles to the west, whereas precisely the right provision is available only a couple of miles away, just across the border in Surrey. However, Hampshire county council says, "That school would not be appropriate for that child, and we are not prepared to make an out-of-county placement." I therefore hope that the Minister will use her persuasive powers on local education authorities, so that they realise the benefit of rationalisation, which I am sure is the answer.

5.45 pm

I hope that the Minister also appreciates the points made by the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) on the role and importance of special schools. There are, of course, advantages in educating children in mainstream schools, not only for children with special educational needs, but for those without such needs. Children with special educational needs in mainstream schools do not feel that they have been separated from other children. However, I agree whole-heartedly with the hon. Gentleman that there is a case for children being educated with their peers if he means that those with a specific disability benefit by being educated with others with a similar disability.

At Maple Hayes hall, which is a school for dyslexic children in my previous constituency, I met children who had behavioural difficulties. I met one child who, at his previous school in Essex, had stabbed a Biro through the hand of the child next to him. The act was attributed to behavioural difficulties, but that was wrong. He was expressing frustration because his special educational needs were not being met. Fortunately, he was able subsequently to attend Maple Hayes hall. He told me, "This place saved me. If I hadn't come here, I probably would have ended up in prison."

I therefore believe that there is a case for children with some special educational needs to be educated together. They would not have to explain anything to their peers, and would derive enormous self-confidence by being with others with a similar disability.

I hope that the Minister will listen to the case that has been made—almost by both sides of the House—for passing the new clauses. The hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg) made an interesting and useful speech. Including the new clauses in the Bill would send a clear signal that, although educating children in mainstream education is preferable, there is a very strong case—educationally and socially—for encouraging schools that provide for specific educational needs.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I support new clause 14. The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) generously commented on how greatly knowledge and understanding of special educational needs have increased in the past 20 years—the truth of which is undoubtedly reflected in the emphasis that we are giving to the subject in this debate and have given in other debates in the House in recent months.

The hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg) adopted a rather tired and old-fashioned agenda in his concern about which element in society has benefited most from the attention that has been given to special educational needs. It was inevitable that, as awareness has grown of what can be done to improve the performance of children with SEN, some sections of society have become more aware of those needs than others. Although, hitherto, middle-class families may have benefited more from the resources given to special educational needs, those benefits can be extended to all families.

It is negative to imply—as Labour Members have occasionally in our debates on the subject—that expenditure on SEN is a middle-class fix and the result of special pleading by middle-class parents for an extra share of the education cake. That is not the case at all: the children have a genuine need and we have to recognise it.

The situation would be improved if new clause 14 were implemented, because in the course of agreeing education plans with local authorities, a wider awareness of best practice could be generated. If plans were discussed with a particular focus on special educational needs, there is no doubt that the success stories would spread to other areas and thereby SEN provision could be improved across the board.

Mr. Steinberg: I am sorry if I unintentionally gave the wrong impression. I was trying to say that, in many cases, statements were being made for children because their parents had insisted on the resources. I do not want to bring too much politics into the debate, but resources have been scant in mainstream schools because of the unfortunate policies of the previous Government, and statements were one way in which parents sought to obtain extra resources. I was not saying that they did not deserve those resources or that they were cheating the system; I was merely making the point that that was one way of getting resources and that it was the vociferous middle class who realised that.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am not sure where that leaves the hon. Gentleman's concerns. Certainly on other occasions it has been implied that a disproportionate advantage was being taken, but I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has been able to clear that matter up.

Provision for special educational needs in the mainstream falls into three categories. There are children who have some physical handicap but tremendous academic potential. It must help the whole school to learn to cope with, and help the development of, such children and to see them develop alongside their peers. Then there are children who have latent academic ability but suffer from a mental block that needs to be overcome. In such cases, special educational attention within the mainstream ensures that their problem is overcome while in other aspects of their development they continue alongside their peers.

There will, however, always be a group of children for whom being in the mainstream is not appropriate. It has to be recognised that it may be appropriate to take them out of the mainstream for a short period. Skills can be developed to enable those children to go back into the mainstream and the objective of many people working in the sector is to ensure that children who come into their care are enabled, so far as is possible, to return to mainstream education. That is where it becomes important that the children's problems are discovered and recognised as soon as possible. The longer problems are allowed to build up, the longer it will take outside the mainstream sector before they are well equipped to re-enter it.

One of the objectives of new clause 14 is to improve what might be called the response time of local education authorities when parents alert the LEA to the fact that they believe that their child needs special educational provision. In previous statements, the Minister has indicated her belief that too much money is spent on the assessment of special needs and on the appeals process and that redirecting those funds alone would unlock a rich purse that could be spent on actual provision, although Conservative Members have expressed scepticism about that. What is important is that methods of good practice are promoted by her Department to ensure that there is prompt recognition of need by local education authorities throughout the country. I have received representations from interested bodies who have found that LEAs' response times and willingness to respond is patchy and varies significantly from one area to another.

It would be helpful if the Minister clarified the Government's attitude towards the provision of special educational needs by the independent sector. We are not certain about whether the Government are in favour of building bridges with the independent sector or are in favour of blowing them up, as they have done or have tried to do on several occasions. There is clearly an important role for independent schools in special educational provision. A great deal of progress has been made and it is likely that some of the discoveries will emerge from schools that are outside the remit of local education authorities and the state system. It is important that, in developing plans that spell out how special educational needs are to be addressed in any area, a role is identified for such schools so that their innovative work can be encouraged and built on for the benefit of all children with special educational needs.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): I support the principle of LEAs having a responsibility strategically to plan special needs provision in the context of their overall plan for educating children in their area.

My hon. Friends the Members for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) and for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) made a valid point about the significance of the new clause in terms of the message it broadcasts to the wider community, but there is an even more important point about LEAs' overall role in planning school places and admissions, the relationship between special needs provision and the mainstream, and LEAs' critical role in the analysis of individual children's needs. All those factors necessitate LEAs incorporating special needs provision into their strategic plans.

One of the good things that have emerged in special needs education over the past 20 years is the statement. My interest in the subject started when I first became a member of an LEA in 1985—I am still a member of that Nottinghamshire LEA. The statement is undoubtedly a positive thing for parents and children. I do not want to digress into talking about the Green Paper, but there are real concerns about the dilution of the statement. It needs to be said that many parents of special needs children feel that the statement is their only binding guarantee of a decent education in line with their child's needs. That is another reason for supporting the new clause; it would require LEAs to consider the definition of need for children with special needs in the context of their overall education planning.

I have heard many arguments about integration into the mainstream and I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), whose arguments have been advanced many times. There are many good social and cultural arguments for integrating children with special needs into mainstream schools. Many parents support that and many children benefit from it, but I have to say that cultural and social reasons cannot be elevated above the individual educational needs of the child. It may be socially desirable for a child to be integrated into the mainstream, but not if that is detrimental to the child's educational progress.

There are many parents of special needs children who take the firm view that their child's special needs are best met by specialist provision which, in practical and educational terms, can be best met in special schools. I endorse my hon. Friends' comments on the need to retain special schools where those are proven to be the best way of educating children with special needs.

Local education authorities have variable records on special needs provision. That is not a party-political point. Some Conservative LEAs have a less good track record on special needs, as do some Labour LEAs, and there are some controlled by both parties that have excelled. There is great variation in how effectively different authorities have addressed special needs provision and how quick they have been in statementing children. My hon. Friend the Member for Guildford was, however, too generous in that the issue is not just the time that it takes, but the willingness to statement at all. There is considerable variation among LEAs on that as well, which is very worrying. That, too, is not a party-political remark.

Like other hon. Members, I should like to mention a constituency case. A child was in mainstream education in Nottinghamshire where, as I have said, I am still a member of the LEA. I was delighted to be able to assist that child, who was suffering bullying at a good mainstream school, not a tough school. I helped the child to transfer out of the mainstream to special needs provision in my constituency in Lincolnshire. The parents uprooted and sold their home to move to Spalding so that their child could be educated in a special needs school and avoid some of the problems that they had encountered in mainstream education, so we must remember that there can be movement both ways.

The biggest growth area in special needs provision—this needs emphasising—is children with emotional behavioural difficulties. A range of studies has illustrated that. They can be the hardest to integrate. LEAs must have a coherent policy on dealing with such children. Provision is pretty patchy and variable across LEAs. Some sweep the issue under the carpet, while others have taken imaginative and innovative approaches, dealing with the problem very effectively. We must have an honest debate about how to deal effectively with what is, sadly, a growth area.

The new clauses would help by obliging LEAs to focus on the issue and build it into their strategic planning.

Ms Estelle Morris: This wide-ranging debate has barely touched on the new clauses in some respects. I do not want to incur your wrath, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or that of hon. Members by spending the rest of the evening debating special educational needs. Suffice it to say that I am grateful to all hon. Members who have chosen to make a contribution on this important issue.

I am pleased to join the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) in acknowledging that Governments and local councils of all parties have made tremendous progress on SEN provision in recent years. There is unanimity in the House on the importance of the issue and how much there is to be done. That cross-party approach has been evident today. I shall respond to a few of the points that have been raised and then address the new clauses. I shall not ask the House to accept the new clauses, not because I disagree with much of what has been said but because this is not the time for them. There will be other opportunities to propose them.

[Ms Estelle Morris]

We should not be having today a further debate on the Green Paper on special needs. There will be a time for that. I do not seek to run away from that debate and I have not done so since the Green Paper was published; I am merely trying to be cautious with our use of time. Our response will appear in June. We are busy analysing more than 3,500 responses from organisations and individuals. Apart from that from the major organisations, I have not even looked at the analysis yet. What I say today should not be regarded as a response to the consultation on the Green Paper.

The hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) talked about primary legislation. I do not yet know whether the consultation on the Green Paper will necessitate primary legislation. We have not analysed all the responses and I do not know what the Government will want to take forward, but I have consistently said that if primary legislation is needed we cannot include it in the Bill. My Department will have to take its turn in the search for parliamentary time.

Mr. Dorrell: The Minister has missed the boat.

Ms Morris: We had an important decision to take. We wanted to include SEN provision with other legislation, but we did not feel that we could do it justice in time for the White Paper in June. The two should be regarded as sister papers.

I should like to pick up some of the main strands of the debate. The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) made a good case for regional planning for SEN. The problem is particularly noticeable for some of the smaller new unitary authorities. With the disabilities and special needs that are increasingly common with medical advances and as more children survive with problems and disabilities that might previously have caused them to die, I am convinced that groups of local authorities will need to join up to plan initially for low incidence disabilities and then, if it works, for more common disabilities.

We suggested pilot studies on regional planning in the Green Paper. We intended to run two pilots on regional planning for SEN, but such has been the response from local authorities that we shall run more than two. When I last looked at the issue, four seemed the likely figure. We have already secured the money. We are currently negotiating with local authorities on a regional basis. We shall be able to announce the local authorities in which the pilots will take place soon.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I am delighted that the Minister has taken that initiative. When might she announce the pilot areas?

Ms Morris: I see no reason why I could not make that clear once agreement has been received from the local authorities. We have not yet ascertained whether that is the case, but the latest progress report is that there is a high level of interest. I shall not deliberately hold the issue up. The hon. Gentleman is clearly keen and has a constituency interest. I shall ask my officials and let him know whether his local authority has expressed an interest.

I am enormously optimistic about the developments. Hon. Members have talked about local authorities hiding from their responsibilities and being reluctant to go for a statement, or even to acknowledge that there is a need, let alone to begin to find the solution. That has been caused either by a feeling that a single authority's resources cannot effectively be used to meet that need or because the local authority does not have the know-how. Regional planning will be important to ensure progress on that.

There is a danger that we will all stand up and say that inclusion is good and feel happy about that because being inclusive makes us feel that we are doing the right thing. All hon. Members who have spoken in this debate started by saying that inclusion was a good thing—and then went on to say "but". The views ranged from those of the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough, who thought that inclusion was almost entirely a good thing, but not quite, to those of the hon. Member for Aldershot and some of his hon. Friends, who said that it was a good thing "but", and went on to stress the importance of special schools.

New clause 20 illustrates the problem. It must be good to integrate children with special needs with their peers in mainstream education. If that can be done well, there is no reason why we should not do it. Some hon. Members say "but" because parents have different wishes and children have different needs. We must avoid integrating SEN children badly. We must not integrate before all the partners in the education service are ready. I shall refer to that later.

I reassure the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn), who is not in his place, about the role of special schools in the independent sector. I do not know why I need to, because I have already done so time and again. I suspect that he might not have been listening. I see that he has returned to the Chamber. Quite honestly, we could not manage without the contribution that independent special schools make to overall provision.

I remind the hon. Member for Guildford, as an indication of the importance of such schools, that, although they secure capital from independent sources, they rely on local authorities for 80 per cent. and more of their revenue costs. Local authorities refer and buy places in the independent sector, which enables such independent schools to keep going. That partnership between the maintained and independent sectors precedes anything that is being talked about now and is an example of good practice. How it has arisen is for a different debate. Suffice it to say that such good practice and innovative work leaves a bolt hole for schemes such as HIGASHI, which happens overseas, and which some of our parents want to access. Such provision can always be introduced in this country through that channel. I reassure the hon. Gentleman that the independent sector's role is vital and will continue, and that we shall continue to make use of it.

I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton, and applaud her for saying, that if we are serious about meeting the needs of special needs children and being more inclusive we must incorporate their needs in all our planning and stop regarding them as extra. That is what we have done in education development plans. Some of the things that new clause 14 asks us to do should not rightfully be in education development plans, not because they concern SEN but because of what they are. Such things should be done elsewhere.

I remind the House that education development plans essentially ensure that local authorities set targets for improvement and let us know how they intend to meet those targets and what strategies they will put in place to raise standards for all children. Due to the importance of education development plans, we must be careful to be clear and focused about what we ask them to do. They cannot embrace every responsibility of a local authority. That would be wrong and it would dilute their main thrust.

I refer hon. Members to pages 5 and 9 of the draft guidance on EDPs, which states clearly that one of the things about which we will want to know is how pupils with special education needs are supported. The guidance goes on to mention gifted and more able pupils. We debated the definition of special needs. In the section on school population characteristics for each of the main types of school, the guidance states that we will require LEAs to let us know about both statemented and non-statemented children in mainstream and special schools so that there is a clear, year-on-year pen portrait of children with SEN in the area. It is quite clear in the document that targets must be set for special schools and for special needs children in mainstream schools.

I have never been entirely happy—I think that hon. Members will share this view—that there is sufficient fine tuning of targets for GCSEs and key stages to help us recognise the progress of special needs children. That is why we have already set in hand work with the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority to fine tune key stages 1, 2 and 3 so that children who might make progress at those stages will probably have targets set for them by the end of their school careers. Target setting for children with special needs is included, as it should be. I do not want new clause 14 to be accepted because it asks us to do things that are not appropriate for education development plans.

Mr. Hayes: The point that needs to be emphasised is that the target setting process—the development of measurables and deliverables—is intrinsically linked to a particular LEA's view of the number of special needs schools it provides, its school places policy and its strategic approach to SEN. Target setting in individual schools cannot be separated from the overall strategic approach to SEN because the overall approach is bound to impact on it. I support my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) because the point that we are making is that, by trying to separate the two areas—although I acknowledge what the draft guidance suggests—we are not emphasising the interrelationship strongly enough.

Ms Morris: Local authorities need to bring together the different plans that they are required to make. The hon. Gentleman did not serve on the Committee, but he may know that we debated how local authorities and others provide sufficient places for children in their areas. I am sure that he will be reassured to know that we have stated clearly that local authorities must take account of the special educational needs of the children in their area and plan accordingly.

Education development plans are essentially about target setting to raise standards. The key element is that children with special needs are explicitly included. If they were not, I would be unhappy. We are consulting on the guidelines and listening carefully to ensure that we get it right for SEN children. We shall obviously reflect on the comments as we receive them.

I have tremendous respect for the work that the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough has done with his school. He is an evangelist in both his commitment and his trail blazing, which shows where the rest of us can go. John Smeaton school, of which the hon. Gentleman was head, is an example of good practice to which we should all be looking.

New clause 20 would remove the provision that we should consider the efficient education of other children. People have talked about sending messages. I have tried to send messages of inclusion and of valuing special needs children. I do not think that we would be doing special needs children any favours if we sent out the message in this debate that their inclusion should be considered without regard to the efficient education of other children. The greatest asset of inclusion is that it benefits both groups of children. We must accept that schools must be equipped and ready in attitude and facilities to meet the needs of SEN children. It can be done; it will be done more, but we must move sensitively and have regard for some of the concerns expressed by hon. Members and in consultation.

One thing amused and interested me in our consultation on the Green Paper. One member of my advisory committee attended two consultation meetings on Tuesday and Wednesday of the same week. Both were very well attended. At the first, he was hauled over the coals about why we had not gone for total inclusion. At the second, he faced a group of angry parents who wanted to know why we were threatening the closure of special schools. Those are the two fears; we must do everything we can to make progress without alienating any of those people. Both groups have rights, fears and expressions of interest.

I hope that the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough will accept that I am committed, as he is, to ensuring that the Government, with the co-operation of others, deliver our pledge to offer children who can benefit—and parents who want it—an opportunity to take their place in mainstream schools as they will in mainstream society. That is the bottom line.

This has been a useful debate. I hope that the hon. Members for Tiverton and Honiton and for Harrogate and Knaresborough feel that I have answered sympathetically and that they will accept my assurances that the issues that they have raised ought better to be met in different areas of Government education policy.

Mrs. Browning: I am naturally disappointed that the Under-Secretary feels that she cannot accept new clauses 14 and 20, and I must seek some reassurances on various points that she has raised.

The Minister said that local education authorities will be required to provide a snapshot of their special needs provision. Perhaps that would be more appropriate for conclusions to the consultation. I hope that the Minister will look carefully at disaggregating special needs statistics. I see the Minister wrinkling her nose as she does not like that idea—and I understand why. The problem is that, even now, some LEAs do not recognise specific learning disabilities—they refuse even to recognise the terminology. Unless the guidelines require LEAs to demonstrate clearly how many children with specific disabilities they are making special needs provision for—whether statemented or not—they will continue their current bad practice.

Ms Morris: I have noted the hon. Lady's initial comments. I wrinkled my nose because, following previous exchanges in the House, I talked to the advisory group about disaggregating the statistics. It seemed ridiculous that no one could tell me how many autistic children were in mainstream schools, but nothing is as easy as it sounds. The answer that I received from academics—some of whom were mentioned by the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) and one of whom serves on the advisory group—is that it is not as easy to define groups as we might imagine. It is very difficult to distinguish children with emotional and behavioural difficulties from those who are naughty, disturbed or mentally ill. I shall continue to reflect on that matter, but the task is not as easy as I first thought.

Mrs. Browning: I fully accept that, but I urge the Minister not to let go. For years, some LEAs have deliberately flown in the face of medical diagnoses. Parents may have pieces of paper from qualified doctors or clinical psychologists stating that their child has been diagnosed with a particular illness, yet that terminology is not recognised by the LEA from which that child seeks education provision. We must address that problem. I urge the hon. Lady to keep at it—I assure her that I shall support her to the hilt.

The Minister also said that, when she concludes the consultation process, there may be a need for primary legislation and that her Department would have to wait its turn. Today's national press carry details of the Government's agenda for the next parliamentary year—although I do not know how accurate it is. When education legislation is before the House, the Minister should use that opportunity to introduce primary legislation on special educational needs; otherwise, she may have a long wait. I urge her not to let any opportunities slip: if she feels that primary legislation is necessary, she should do her best to bring it to the Floor of the House at the earliest possible opportunity. We do not want long delays.

I am disappointed by the Minister's decision, but she has promised further time for debate on the Floor of the House before any major decisions are made about changing SEN significantly. The Minister will report in June and I hope that, if there are significant changes, she will bring them to the House when it returns after the summer recess. Those changes should not go through during the recess as hon. Members must have an opportunity to voice their opinions and contribute to the proposals. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 15

ADDITIONAL PROVISION WITH RESPECT TO TARGETS

'.—In section 19 of the Education Act 1997 (School performance targets), in subsection (1), after 'set' there shall be inserted "after consultation with the local education authority.".'.—[Mr. Don Foster.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Don Foster: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 15 raises the question of target setting and the relationship between individual schools and their local education authorities. The new clause would require governing bodies to consult their local education authorities before setting performance targets. That will be achieved by amending the Education Act 1997. I am delighted that the Under-Secretary will respond to the debate on the new clause. If she checks her records, she will see that, during debate on that earlier legislation, she was a sponsor of amendment No. 208. As new clause 15 is almost identical to the amendment that she proposed approximately one year ago, I look forward to her support when we discuss the issue further.

The new clause is about target setting and the relationship between local education authorities and schools. It is now accepted by all hon. Members that target setting can play an important role in helping to raise standards. That is why the Liberal Democrats are prepared to support the Government's initiatives in that regard. However, we are conscious of the fact that target setting alone will not raise standards; other processes must be in place. After all, there is little point in setting a high hurdle unless we help people get over it.

A more important issue is the nature of the relationship between local education authorities and individual schools. There was considerable debate about that in Committee. I think it fair to say that Opposition Members were somewhat confused about the nature of the Government's understanding of the relationship between schools and LEAs. That was particularly true in relation to target setting. There was considerable confusion about who would be responsible for agreeing or setting targets. For example, I refer to the contribution by the Minister for School Standards in Committee on 29 January, when he said:

"The LEA will need to engage in discussion with the school and agree targets for it."

The Government clearly believe that the LEA will set the targets and that the schools must accept them. However, the Minister went on:

"It will always be for the school to agree to the targets proposed by the LEA, but it will be for the LEA to challenge the school to do better and to get it to sign up to those improved standards."—[Official Report A, Standing Committee, 29 January 1998; c. 178.]

It is clear that the LEA will set the targets and that the school must agree to them. Later in our deliberations on the same day, the Under-Secretary said at column 191 that the schools would be responsible for setting targets. She went on to say that she believed that it was important that the targets were owned by individual schools. She argued persuasively that, if the target-setting agenda was to be successful, schools had to set and own their targets.

The Committee also agreed—I hope the House will accept this also—that, if schools and local education authorities are to have an effective relationship, it is vital to involve local authorities in the target-setting process. If we refer to page 26 of the White Paper "Excellence in schools"—which preceded the Bill—we see that the Government had a clear view of the nature of that relationship. The White Paper states:

"The Government sets national targets and publishes national performance and benchmark data.

Each LEA provides benchmarking data and guidance to all its schools to help them set targets.

Each school sets draft targets, taking account of the comparative data and their own previous best performance, for discussion with its LEA."

Finally, the White Paper states:

"Schools and LEAs agree targets, covering a 3-year period and subject to annual review."

The crucial phrase is "for discussion" with its LEA. The new clause would ensure that an assurance was written into the Bill that the governing body of a school will consult its LEA before targets for the school, which the body will continue to own, are agreed.

Given that the new clause is almost identical to an amendment that the Under-Secretary proposed approximately 12 months ago, I very much hope that it will have her support.

6.30 pm

Ms Estelle Morris: I have to admit that I have never understood the problems that the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) seems to have with this matter. In Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards and I both made it clear where the responsibility for target setting lies. I am happy to reaffirm our commitment to setting targets as an important part of the agenda of raising standards and to reiterate my words in Committee. Ownership of targets by schools is important. The role of the local education authority is crucial. The hon. Gentleman referred to comments made by my hon. Friend that were made in the debate in which Leafy Lane and Park View schools were born. We had a long and interesting debate and those schools stayed in existence until the end of the Standing Committee, with hon. Members on both sides referring back to them at suitable points in our exchanges.

My hon. Friends referred to Leafy Lane, Park View and all the rest, because target setting is not merely about ensuring that schools that do not get good results improve, but about ensuring that schools that get what appear to be adequate results improve as well. We commented that there was much under-performance in Leafy Lane schools that needed to be challenged. The crucial role of the local authority in this matter is to provide comparative information about schools' performances in similar circumstances—similar in prior attainment, in the backgrounds of children and in the environments of the schools—which means that, when schools set targets, they cannot hide away and loiter in the middle of the school performance table. That is the role of local authorities—to challenge the target-setting progress of schools and point out to them that they may be happy to set X, but that a school with similar circumstances in the borough has set X plus Y.

From our experience of local authorities setting targets on a local authority-wide basis, we know that schools want to meet the best target that other schools in similar circumstances are meeting. The qualitative information that local authorities provide will be helpful to schools in setting targets.

As my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards said, and as I repeated later:

"Responsibility rests with the school and the individual classroom teacher".—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 29 January 1998; c. 178.]

I am happy to repeat again that the responsibility for setting targets must lie with the bodies that will primarily be responsible for ensuring that the targets are achieved—schools. It is right that that should happen, but it is also right that schools should listen to what local authorities say.

In the vast majority of cases, there will not be a dispute. Schools will welcome the information that local authorities can bring. They will benefit from the exchange of information that they and their governing bodies will have with the local authority. The result will be that the targets set will be sufficiently challenging to do their job of raising standards.

Mr. Don Foster: Does the Under-Secretary accept that there is a possibility of a dispute between a local education authority and a school only if there has been consultation on the issue between them? Will she confirm that it will be a requirement for schools to consult the LEA before they finalise their targets? That is all that the new clause would ensure.

Ms Morris: I do not want to avoid the question, but that depends on what the hon. Gentleman means by "consult". If he is asking schools to consult local education authorities and defer to their opinion, the answer is no. If he is asking them to talk to the LEA about their targets, the answer is yes. The real difficulty is—perhaps this has been the source of our debates—that, if the school and the LEA cannot agree, the local authority's targets stand, but the fact that there has been a dispute can be recorded in the plan that goes forward. What is the hon. Gentleman's interpretation of the word "consult"? Does it mean bargaining and schools having to do what they do not want to meet the needs of the local authority? No. Schools must set their own targets. If consultation means talk, we can find accord with that.

I do not think that there is a million miles between us on this matter and, my having given him those assurances, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will see fit to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Foster: Towards the end of the Under-Secretary's remarks, we were beginning to get a clear assurance that she would expect consultation of the type which she described—not a one-way consultation in which the LEA is determined to have its way, but a two-way consultation between the school and the LEA.

The Under-Secretary wonders why I have continued to be somewhat confused about the Government's position. If she reads in Hansard her contribution to the debate on new clause 14 on special educational needs, she will find that she continued some of the confusion. If I noted it correctly, in her reply to that debate she said:

"targets must be set for special schools".

[Mr. Foster]

The confusion about who is responsible for setting targets is part of the reason for my confusion.

Ms Morris: I would hate the hon. Gentleman to continue to be confused after this debate. Perhaps I was not clear in my use of words. I was referring to the documentation that is sent to the Department for approval, in which we are asking for targets school by school. The word "for" refers to the fact that LEAs must record the targets for special schools, not that they must do it on their behalf.

Mr. Foster: I am grateful to the Under-Secretary for acknowledging that her words were somewhat unclear. I pressed the issue because of that lack of clarity, but given the clear undertaking that the hon. Lady has given about the need for consultation, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1

POWER TO SET LIMITS ON INFANT CLASS SIZES

Amendment made: No. 79, in page 1, line 9, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

Clause 3

PAYMENT OF GRANT IN CONNECTION WITH REDUCTIONS IN INFANT CLASS SIZES

Amendment made: No. 80, in page 3, line 1, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

Clause 10

ESTABLISHMENT OF EDUCATION ACTION ZONES

Mr. Don Foster: I beg to move amendment No. 121, in page 10, line 7, leave out from 'purpose' to the end of line 9 and insert—

'(a) with the consent of the governing body of every school which it is proposed should be a participating school, and

(b) where the LEA is not making the application, with evidence that it has been consulted by the proposers, with a view to being a partner in the Education action zone.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: Government amendment No. 85.

No. 88, in clause 12, page 11, line 13, at end insert—

'(3A) In discharging any function transferred to it under the provisions of subsection (2) of this section an Education Action Forum may enter a contract for the performance of that function with any party, whether from the public or private sector, who, in the opinion of the Education Action Forum, is a fit and proper party to discharge the function or functions covered by the contract.

(3B) Any party with whom the Education Action Forum enters a contract under the terms of subsection (3A) of this section (hereinafter referred to as "the contractor") shall be responsible for delivering the service defined in the contract with the Education Action Forum to the standard defined in the said contract and shall be permitted to acquire, employ, and manage, on terms to be determined by the contractor, such equipment, staff and other resources as he believes to be necessary to perform the duties defined in the contract.'.

No. 122, in clause 13, page 11, line 35, after 'them', insert

'and where the employer is the local education authority, consult with that local education authority,'.

Government amendments Nos. 86 and 87.

Mr. Foster: The amendment is similar to new clause 15 in that it deals with the relationship between local education authorities and schools, but in this case it deals with schools forming part of an education action zone.

I must take this opportunity to place on record in the House what I said in Committee. We Liberal Democrats are very supportive of the Government's proposals for education action zones, at least in principle. In Committee, we had discussions about some of the detailed operations of the zones and had the opportunity to press some concerns.

Education action zones are an important feature of the Bill. We hope that, when the Minister examines the bids for the first few zones, he will find himself inundated with exciting proposals for new forms of partnership in education, which will bring together not only schools but other interested bodies, including private businesses and other representatives of the local community, as well as further education colleges and perhaps even universities. We believe that EAZs will above all offer an opportunity for some exciting thinking about how education can develop to meet the needs of children in the next millennium.

Because it is so important that EAZs are successful partnerships, we must ensure that all possible partners are involved. In Committee, I tabled amendments to ensure that the local education authority would have the opportunity to be a partner. As was clear from our discussions, the Government expected that, in the vast majority of cases, LEAs would be partners, although, as was rightly pointed out, there might be cases in which it would be unhelpful for the LEA—perhaps because it was deemed to be failing the schools in its area, or because it wanted to propose a different EAZ consortium—automatically to have the right to membership of the EAZ.

As I was able to demonstrate in Committee, all the Government's documentation showed that, until the last minute, the Government clearly intended that LEAs should participate in all EAZs. I think that we now understand why they shifted their position slightly. Nevertheless, it is vital that the LEA is at least consulted about the applications for each EAZ, so that it can decide whether to become a partner.

Unlike the amendments that I tabled in Committee, amendment No. 121 does not insist on a guaranteed role for the LEA in the education action forum; it merely suggests that there should be clear evidence that the LEA has been consulted on whether it wants to be a partner in the EAZ.

I hope that the Minister will recognise the importance of that, as he knows that the LEA will continue to have responsibilities, many of which are specified in the Bill, for the schools in any EAZ that is established. Those responsibilities include setting targets, operating early warning systems, reviewing special educational needs arrangements and providing for pupils with emotional and behavioural difficulties and for those who are educated out of school.

There are many other reasons why the partners in the EAZ will need to understand an LEA's work, not least in relation to local management of schools budget arrangements, the LEA services which are available, the requirement for continuing professional development, the relationship between a school's organisation committee, the LEA and the forum, and the general interrelationship of the LEA and more general local authority educational services.

Given that the LEA will carry out many functions that will affect schools in an EAZ, and given the need for schools in an EAZ to know about the work of the LEA, it is obvious that the LEA must be involved in some way in all EAZs. At the very least, the LEA must be consulted about plans to establish an EAZ and given the opportunity to become a member. I hope that the House will agree to the amendment.

Mr. Dorrell: I want to speak principally to amendment No. 88, which belongs to this group of amendments but which I shall seek, with your consent, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to put to a separate decision by the House. Its purpose is to tease out exactly what the Government think an education action zone will mean.

Like the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), when I first heard about education action zones, I found the idea rather attractive. It was certainly presented as an important new part of the Government's armoury for improving the delivery of service by our schools. At the north of England education conference at the beginning of this year, Professor Barber trumpeted it as an important step forward in introducing a new perspective—it would be an opportunity for new management and new ideas in areas where, for whatever reason, the Secretary of State felt that there were inadequate new ideas.

It seemed, originally, that the education action zones would be targeted at problem areas in the school system, but it became clear in Committee that the Minister wanted them to be established not only in areas of low educational attainment, but in any part of the country where he felt that improvement in service delivery by maintained sector schools was possible—he was looking for opportunities to introduce new structures and fresh ideas to any part of the country where significant improvement was possible.

All that seemed a rather attractive idea. When I was asked for my reaction to the proposal at the north of England conference, I said that I was receptive to the idea and would look forward to Ministers sketching out the detail. However, in Committee, when we considered the details of what the idea would mean in practice, the excitement started to fall away. It became obvious that the Government were unclear about their intentions for education action zones.

It is important that we should be clear about the Bill's provisions. When the Secretary of State has determined that an area should be an education action zone, individual schools' governing bodies will be responsible for deciding whether to participate. I agree with that—a school's participation should be voluntary.

When Professor Barber launched the idea, he made it clear that it was explicitly intended that the private sector should be able to play a role in the new structure, to bring in new ideas for the delivery of service. I understand that, at the north of England education conference, he speculated publicly that one of the companies that could be introduced—not only as advisers on a governing body or to provide tangential, relatively detailed advice, but as mainstream managers of the delivery of the schools service—was Procter and Gamble.

I admired the provocation that Professor Barber clearly enjoyed introducing to the argument. It was a piece of iconoclasm, although it is perhaps less provocative to those who recognise that Procter and Gamble already runs charter schools in the United States, where it picked up the concept—it is charged with delivering a specialist improvement in the schools service in different American cities. When I heard that the concept was part of the Government's idea, I thought that it was attractive. The name Procter and Gamble is provocative, but a more home-grown company is Nord Anglia, a British company with experience of employing teachers, managing schools and delivering a schools service.

The purpose of amendment No. 88, tabled by me and of my hon. Friends, is to probe the Government on whether they intend to create the opportunity for Nord Anglia and Procter and Gamble to manage and deliver a school service in an area where improvement is possible. When we came to this section of the Bill in Committee, it became pretty clear that at the very least there was a question mark over the idea. My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) asked the Minister for School Standards:

> "Will there be any circumstances in which a company will employ the teachers and have a form contractual arrangement with them?"

It may be the Government's vision that Nord Anglia, Procter and Gamble or anyone else should have the opportunity to deliver a new schools management service, as defined by proper public authorities, but it will be hard for a company to do so if it is not allowed to employ teachers.

The Minister's response in the Committee was rather depressing. He said:

> "We currently take the view that teachers will be employed by their employing body, be that a local education authority or an individual school."

I do not understand how we deliver the objective that Procter and Gamble certainly delivers in some charter schools in America.

Mr. Byers: I shall deal with this issue at greater length in my reply to the debate, but I draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to Government amendment No. 85. He will see that we intend to give legal powers to the forum. That was not the case when we debated the matter in Committee. We recognise that we need to have clarity and that is why we intend to put the education forum in the position of employer. That was not the case when we debated the matter in Committee.

Mr. Dorrell: I have seen that amendment and I understand that it is relevant, but in a sense it compounds the problem. The Government envisage that a manager will take over the management of a school where there is a problem—whether it is of low attainment or, to take the Minister's argument from Leafy Lane high, of low expectations, and there is an opportunity for improvement in a school that is complacent. Whatever the purpose of taking a school into an education action zone, if a company such as Nord Anglia or Procter and Gamble is to have responsibility for delivering the improved service that the Government say that they seek, it must have the power to manage all the necessary resources.

Government amendment No. 85 merely underlines the timidity of the response offered by the Minister in Committee and repeated by the Under-Secretary. I gave the Government a second chance to deal with the question. The Under-Secretary confirmed that at that stage

"the teachers would continue to be employed by . . . the LEA."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 3 February 1998; c. 270-76.]

The Government's amendment says that the teacher contract can be converted to an EAZ contract, but that still does not allow an EAZ to decide that a bidder for the delivery of a school service offers to the children of a district the opportunity of a better education that meets their needs better and offers them a better start in life.

The Minister will acknowledge that the EAZ concept is based loosely on the ideas that have been shown to work in some very difficult city schools in the United States. I hope and believe that the Government are trying to learn those lessons. I do not believe that they will achieve that objective if they do not give the enterprise with the responsibility for managing the school the power that it needs to deliver its objectives in what will often be difficult circumstances. That is why our amendment makes it clear that, although not in every case—I do not say that this should apply in every EAZ—where a bidder wants to employ, manage and be responsible for all the resources in a school, and the EAZ is convinced that that is the best way of delivering the service in that area, that power should be available.

I appeal to the Government to have the courage of their convictions to embrace their own idea and not to run away from their own radicalism.

Mrs. May: I shall concentrate my comments on amendment No. 88, but I shall make passing reference to amendment No. 121, tabled by the hon. Members for Bath (Mr. Foster) and for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis). It refers to the role that the LEA should play in bringing forward an education action zone. That proposal is interesting. It shows yet again that the Liberal Democrats constantly come back to the role of the LEA as the single deciding body to be involved in every aspect of education.

The Liberal Democrats do not simply suggest that where the LEA is not making an application, schools that wish to bring forward an EAZ should show that they have discussed or referred the matter to the LEA. There might be some sense in saying that schools within an LEA, or under two or three LEAs where schools wish to group together, should alert their LEAs to the fact that they are proposing an EAZ. The Liberal Democrats are saying that the schools must refer to the LEA with a view to its being a partner in the EAZ. They intend to remove the considerable flexibility that the Government have built into the Bill. That is why I am concerned. As in so many debates in Committee, the Liberal Democrats seem unable to envisage the provision of any aspect of education without a central and determining role for the LEA.

Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), I was interested in the concept of EAZs when it was first introduced. I seem to recall that the concept raised considerable interest not only among Conservative Members, but in a number of national newspapers, including The Daily Telegraph, which said that the Government had come up with a radical and forward-thinking idea—very new Labour. However, as with so many new Labour ideas, including several in the Bill, the words and the practice tend to differ considerably. A radical message was put out to the press that the Government were thinking outside any confines about how they provided education, that they would innovate and that EAZs were one of the ways in which they would do so. Suddenly we see that the restrictions placed on the development of EAZs in the Bill mean that they are not as innovative as the Government would have people believe.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood made specific reference to EAZs, and we dwelt on them in Committee. It was not clear initially exactly what the Government's proposals were on employment. I accept that the Minister said that the Government were introducing their own amendment on the employment aspect of the operation of EAZs under the education action forum, but they are still shying away from the true concept of the EAZ as it was first expressed and understood when the Government proposed it. It is important to go back to that point.

There have been other misunderstandings. In the initial stages, it was expected that the Government intended to use EAZs purely as a way of helping failing schools to find another way of coming together to produce innovative ideas, to get over their problems. However, it has been made clear, and I hope that the Minister will reiterate it for the record today, that the Government do not intend to put in place EAZs purely as a structure for failing schools. It is a structure that any group of schools can request from the Secretary of State, even schools that are not underperforming, such as Leafy Lane high in the example that we were given in Committee. Schools that are performing well may want to be removed from the rigours of LEA control, to look for new ways of providing education. They will be able to come together with a proposal to set up an education action zone and an education action forum.

It is ironic that the Bill abolishes grant-maintained schools, yet introduces very similar powers—the same powers in relation to employment—for education action zones. The Government tell us that an individual school cannot set itself apart from the local education authority and cannot remove itself from the strictures of the LEA, although many schools have done that with enormous success. The Government say that individual schools can no longer do that, but if the school gets together with two or three others, they can form what the Government call an education action zone and do that.

In the debate in Committee, we were told—by the Under-Secretary, as I recollect—that the EAZ was a new structure for education for the new millennium, and that we must stop thinking in the old way about schools being under an LEA. We must drop those ideas and start looking at new ways in which schools can come together and find new ideas on providing education for the children who choose to go to those schools.

Despite all that, we see from the Bill that the Government are not prepared to go that extra step. They say that EAZs are an innovative model and the new way forward, but they are not prepared to give EAZs all the powers necessary to do whatever they—the EAZs—consider appropriate to improve the standard of education in schools in that zone.

Amendment No. 88 would put into practice what the Government seem to have been saying in the early stages of the debate on EAZs. It will be interesting to hear how the Minister of State responds. The idea of EAZs and the powers given to them in the Bill are at the boundary between new Labour and old Labour. How far are the Government willing to go, to put into practice what they proclaimed about innovation in education for the new millennium? If they are committed to innovation, they will accept amendment No. 88, give education action zones full powers, especially in regard to employment, and enable EAZs to set themselves up as innovative groups of schools that are ready to consider new ways of providing a high standard of education.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I apologise for not being present for the beginning of the debate, but I was present during the Committee stage and am aware of some of the issues involved. I should be grateful if the Minister clarified a particular point. We shall have a debate later on grant-maintained schools. Having spoken at length to representatives of grant-maintained schools in my constituency, I know that they have severe doubts about the option of having foundation school status. We have discussed the idea of those schools forming an education action zone.

Will the Minister confirm that education action zones are not just for areas where the education system is seen to be failing, and that they are applicable to areas where a group of schools are striving for excellence? For whatever reason, those schools may not see control and regulation by the local education authority as their preferred route, and may see an interesting and exciting future in the new EAZ mechanism. Will he confirm that, under the Bill, it will be possible for such a group of schools to undertake that exciting initiative?

Mr. Byers: I shall start by replying to the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn). I confirm that nothing in the Bill restricts education action zones to any particular type of school, whether it is underperforming, underachieving, or whatever. The Bill provides a mechanism to allow education action zones to be established.

The Government are looking to establish five EAZs with effect from September, and increasing that number to 25, probably by the autumn of next year. As we consider the applications that are submitted, we shall want to achieve a good geographical spread of EAZs, mixing urban and rural areas, and different types of school. The important aspect of the EAZ concept—this addresses some of the points raised by the hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May)—is that we see EAZs as the test bed for the schools service of the next century. That is why we want groups of schools, perhaps in partnership with local authorities or with the private sector, to come forward with new and exciting ideas. We want to examine ways in which we can empower schools.

Our earlier debate underlined the fact that schools have the primary responsibility for raising standards. If, through the EAZ concept, we can engage and motivate schools of whatever type, the Government are prepared to facilitate that and support schools that want to take advantage of the freedoms that might be made available in the EAZ.

That is why the three Government amendments are important. Government amendment No. 85, which I mentioned in an intervention in the speech of the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), makes the EAZ accountable as an employer for the decisions that it makes in relation to the people whom it legally employs.

Government amendment No. 86 gives the Secretary of State the power to approve or reject applications to disapply the national teachers' pay and conditions document. We consider it appropriate for the Secretary of State to have that power, because we want to monitor carefully a new teachers' contract and a new system of remuneration for teachers. The Secretary of State needs to be involved in that process, so that we can see what works and what does not work so well.

Mr. Willis: That matter concerns many teachers. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) has made clear, we support the general principle of the Government's proposal, but if, after three or five years of an education action zone, when there has been a disapplication of conditions of service and there are new rates of pay, will the Government underwrite those new conditions of service and rates of pay if the EAZ completes its work, or will it be the job of the LEA to do that? How will we assure teachers working in the schools that will move into those EAZs that their pension rights and future pay and conditions will not be jeopardised by what could be a glorious experiment for Nord Anglia?

Mr. Byers: The Government fully understand those concerns. When we deal with amendment No. 122, tabled by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), we shall state clearly that there will need to be proper consultation with teachers, with their representative organisations and with local education authorities as employers about the changes that a forum might want to introduce in teachers' pay and conditions. We want people to be involved, so that they can express views on those pressing matters. We want a system whereby in three or five years, those teachers will be entering a quite different world from that of 1998.

I should be surprised if we did not look differently at teachers' pay and conditions in the light of the experience of EAZs. They are the test bed for the schools system for the next century. Changes will arise as a result of the initiatives that take place in the EAZs.

It is interesting to note that the advice that I have from my civil servants is that amendment No. 88 is redundant because the powers that it seeks to introduce are in the Bill as a result of the powers that we intend to give the education action forums. The point of the education action forum is that its powers are ceded from individual governing bodies. That makes the point that governing bodies are agreeing voluntarily that their powers should be given up to the education action forum. The education action forum can then act almost as a collegiate governing body. It will have all the powers that an individual governing body has at present. It could buy in specific services—for example, managing the payroll, running specialist literacy programmes and providing school meals.

Those are modest measures, and if this is to be an exciting initiative, we must go beyond them. It is most important that the education action forum is responsible for determining the aims and objectives of the schools for which it has responsibility; for monitoring and evaluating the schools' performance; for raising standards of educational achievement through determining the schools' strategy for improving performance; and for setting targets and taking any necessary action to support them.

It will be for the education action forum to decide who is best placed to achieve those objectives. If the education action forum takes the view that Nord Anglia or Procter and Gamble—given its good experience in America—is best placed to deliver those objectives, there is nothing in the Bill to stop the education action forum doing that.

Mr. Dorrell: That is crucial to the argument. The Minister is saying that the education action forum will have no powers that are not currently vested in governing bodies, because all the powers of the education action forum will be delegated to it by the governing body. Is he therefore saying that any governing body in the maintained system already has the power, if it chooses, to subcontract the management of its school to Nord Anglia?

Mr. Byers: It depends on exactly what the governing body wants Nord Anglia to do. At the moment, it could put payroll management or specialist literacy services out to Nord Anglia. The framework that we have inherited from the previous Administration places restrictions on exactly what governing bodies can do. As a result of the new framework, an education action forum will have the power from September next year to contract out to Nord Anglia or Procter and Gamble, to deliver those services and to meet objectives. Legally, it will be able to do that.

Mr. Dorrell: As the Minister recognised, subcontracting the power to run payroll services can be useful, but it is not what we are talking about. We are talking about the management of the school, the delivery of education services, deciding whom the school employs, deciding the terms and how their time is used, and the experience of the child in the classroom. Does an existing school have the power to subcontract those functions to a commercial company? If it does not, the Minister has not shown how the power can be vested in a forum. He said that the forum has only the powers delegated to it by the governing body.

Mr. Byers: The governing body will be responsible under the new framework that we are introducing in September next year. The education action zones will operate on a voluntary basis, depending on when the Bill reaches the statute book—probably five will operate from this September—and they will have full legal powers from September next year. If an education action forum has powers ceded to it by the governing bodies, it will be able to engage the private sector or the local education authority to meet its objectives. That is why education action zones are an exciting initiative—there will be flexibility. I hope that that meets the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Maidenhead, who thought that this was a modest proposal. The powers are there, which is why my officials state that amendment No. 88 is unnecessary.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): Would the powers to be ceded include the power to suspend pupils? That would be an interesting departure from the norm. For the first time, the power to suspend a pupil would be given to a private company, which would not be in the same contractual relationship with the parent as a school.

Mr. Byers: The powers of the education action forum are derived from governing bodies ceding the powers that they have at present. We do not foresee a situation in which some of the exclusion powers would be handed over to a third party. Technically, that might be possible, but there are provisions elsewhere in the Bill, which prescribe the circumstances in which exclusions can and cannot take place.

Mr. Don Foster: For the avoidance of confusion, can the Minister confirm that once an education action zone is set up, the staff currently employed by the schools within the zone will continue to be employed by the LEA, and only new staff chosen by the forum will be employed by the forum? Can he confirm that it will not be possible to send on to a third party the responsibility for the delivery of the curriculum?

Mr. Byers: It is more complicated than that. Under the framework, certain schools—for example, foundation schools—will be the employer of their staff. It is far more complicated than just saying that there is a blanket approach. One of the powers to be given to the education action zones will be to disapply the provisions of the national curriculum, so that they have greater flexibility. I am afraid that there is not a simple answer to the hon. Gentleman's complicated question.

Amendments Nos. 121 and 122 were tabled by the hon. Member for Bath. I understand his concerns about the need to involve LEAs, which will still have the underlying statutory responsibility for ensuring that children in their area receive an adequate and suitable education in terms of their age and ability. There is a difficulty with the way in which amendment No. 121 is worded, because it talks about consultation, but then refers to the LEA as a partner. The amendment states:

"with a view to being a partner in the Education action zone".

There is a legal difficulty with that.

I might be able to help the hon. Member for Bath by referring to the guidance sent to the interested parties that might want to promote an education action zone, in which we make it clear that different zones will be run in different ways:

"In many cases, the LEA will be the driving force behind the proposal . . . In such cases there would still be a central role for business and for community and voluntary organisations."

The hon. Gentleman is concerned about situations in which the LEA may not be the driving force behind the proposal. The guidance states:

"In others, a proposal to create a zone might come from a business, community or voluntary organisation, in conjunction with a group of schools"— addressing the situation that was referred to earlier.

"This allows for new and exciting groups to become involved in running an Action Forum, bringing with them fresh ideas on school improvement. In such cases, the LEA would be consulted in the development of the proposal, and we expect that LEAs will want to work closely with any successful bids which come through this route."

That is more appropriate than requiring that to be so, because there may be circumstances in which, for one reason or another, the LEA is not happy with the group of schools with approval for education action zone status.

We can guarantee that consultation will be required before a proposal is approved by the Secretary of State, but we do not feel that it is appropriate to go further. Amendment No. 121 talks about the LEA, as of right, being guaranteed a place as a partner in the proposal. That would be inflexible and would create a range of possible difficulties.

Mr. Don Foster: The Minister seriously misrepresents the amendment when he says that it states that the LEA would, as of right, expect to have a place on the forum. I hope that he will accept that the amendment's wording is clear and does not have the interpretation that he has given it.

Mr. Byers: Legally, the hon. Gentleman's amendment can have that interpretation, which is why I shall ask the House to resist it.

Education action zones are an exciting initiative. They will allow schools to raise standards in new and imaginative ways. For those reasons, I ask the House to reject the Liberal Democrat amendments but to endorse Government amendments Nos. 85, 86 and 87.

Mr. Foster: Although I am delighted that the Minister has acknowledged that there is a need to consult the LEA in the vast majority of cases, given the many roles that it will continue to have in respect of schools that may form an education action zone, it is vital that we have a much clearer indication that the LEA will be consulted and that it is given an opportunity to consider whether it is appropriate for it to become a member of the education action zone.

As we have not received sufficient assurances, we wish to press the amendment to a Division.

FUNCTIONS OF EDUCATION ACTION FORUM

Amendment made: No. 85, in page 11, line 13, at end insert—

'(3A) Regulations may, in relation to the discharge by an Education Action Forum of any function of a governing body under sections 52 and 55(1) to (3), Schedule 16 or paragraph 26 of Schedule 17, make any such provision as may be made by an order under section 73 (application of employment law during financial delegation).'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Amendment proposed: No. 88, in page 11, line 13, at end insert—

'(3A) In discharging any function transferred to it under the provisions of subsection (2) of this section an Education Action Forum may enter a contract for the performance of that function with any party, whether from the public or private sector, who, in the opinion of the Education Action Forum, is a fit and proper party to discharge the function or functions covered by the contract.

(3B) Any party with whom the Education Action Forum enters a contract under the terms of subsection (3A) of this section (hereinafter referred to as "the contractor") shall be responsible for delivering the service defined in the contract with the Education Action Forum to the standard defined in the said contract and shall be permitted to acquire, employ, and manage, on terms to be determined by the contractor, such equipment, staff and other resources as he believes to be necessary to perform the duties defined in the contract.'.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

DISAPPLICATION OF PAY AND CONDITIONS ORDER IN RELATION TO TEACHERS AT PARTICIPATING SCHOOLS

Amendment made: No. 86, in page 11, line 43, leave out 'shall' and insert 'may'.—[Mr. Byers.]

New clause 1

ARRANGEMENTS FOR GOVERNMENT OF NEW SCHOOLS

'.—(1) Where proposals for the establishment of a maintained school fall to be implemented under paragraph 5 or 10 of Schedule 6, the local education authority shall make arrangements providing for the constitution of a temporary governing body for the school.

(2) Once constituted in accordance with arrangements made under subsection (1) the temporary governing body shall continue in existence until such time as the governing body are constituted for the school under an instrument of government.

(3) The local education authority shall secure that the governing body are so constituted—

(a) as soon as is reasonably practicable after the time when the requirement for there to be an instrument of government for the school takes effect in accordance with subsection (4), and

(b) in any event not later than the last day of the term in which the school first admits pupils.

(4) The requirement for there to be an instrument of government for a school (imposed by section 36) shall take effect in relation to a school falling within subsection (1) above as from the school opening date; and for the purposes of this Part proposals for the establishment of a maintained school shall be taken to be implemented on that date.

(5) Regulations may make provision with respect to—

(a) the making and termination of arrangements for the constitution of temporary governing bodies, including such arrangements made in anticipation of proposals falling to be implemented as mentioned in subsection (1);

(b) the constitution, meetings and proceedings of temporary governing bodies, the payment of allowances to temporary governors, and the appointment of clerks to such bodies;

(c) the transition from a temporary governing body to a governing body constituted under an instrument of government; and

(d) such other matters relating to temporary governing bodies as the Secretary of State considers appropriate.

(6) Regulations under subsection (5) may, in connection with any matters falling within that subsection—

(a) modify any provision made by or under any of Schedules 9 to 12;

(b) apply any such provision with or without modifications;

(c) make provision corresponding or similar to any such provision.

(7) Subject to subsection (8), the temporary governing body of a school shall be treated for the purposes of the Education Acts as if they were the governing body during the period—

(a) beginning with the school opening date, and

(b) ending with the time when the governing body are constituted for the school under an instrument of government; and for the purposes of sections 495 to 498 of the Education Act 1996 (general default powers of the Secretary of State) the temporary governing body of a school shall also be so treated at any time falling before the school opening date.

(8) Despite subsection (7), nothing in any of the following provisions, namely—

(a) section 35,

(b) section 36(1) or (2), or

(c) (subject to any regulations made by virtue of subsection (5)) any of Schedules 9 to 12, applies to any temporary governing body.

(9) In this Part "school opening date", in relation to a new maintained school, means the date when the school first admits pupils.'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

7.45 pm

Mr. Byers: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 4, 5, 9, 1, 81, 6 to 8, 3, 14 to 22, 66, 67, 11, 23, 24, 10, 2 and 28.

Mr. Byers: It gives me great pleasure to deal in detail with the new clause and each of the Government amendments.

New clause 1 and Government amendments Nos. 1 to 11 and 81 to 82 concern the governance of new schools and set out in greater detail the position of temporary governing bodies of new schools. The greater clarity provided by new clause 1 and the Government amendments will help both governing bodies and local education authorities.

Government amendments Nos. 14 to 24 provide for transitional arrangements so that we can ensure a speedy and smooth transition when governing bodies are set up and we move to the new structure under the Bill.

Government amendments Nos. 28 and 67 concern expenses for governors. Under schedule 11, regulations may allow governors of schools with delegated budgets to be paid expenses, other than for travel and subsistence, if the governing body believes that to be appropriate. The amendments allow for regulations to give local education authorities the same latitude in their schemes to pay expenses along similar lines.

Government amendment No. 66 concerns meetings and proceedings of governing bodies, and allows governing bodies to regulate their own meetings and proceedings on any aspect not covered by the regulations.

New clause 2

RATING OF MAINTAINED SCHOOLS

'.—(1) For the purposes of Part III of the Local Government Finance Act 1988 (non-domestic rating) the occupier of any hereditament so far as consisting of the premises of a maintained school shall be taken to be—

(a) the local education authority, where it is a community, voluntary controlled or community special school; or

(b) the governing body, where it is a foundation, voluntary aided or foundation special school.

(2) In section 43(6) or 47(2)(a) of that Act (mandatory and discretionary rate relief) any reference to trustees for a charity includes the governing body of a foundation, voluntary aided or foundation special school.'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Byers: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause concerns rate relief. It does not affect the existing provisions for rates which would be outside the Bill's scope. It simply mirrors the existing provisions as they affect schools and simply rolls forward the existing arrangements into the new framework. It does not affect schools themselves financially, but simply clarifies the position and introduces a degree of certainty which the Government feel will be of benefit. This is a technical new clause.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 3

CONTROL OF DISPOSALS OR CHANGING USE OF SCHOOL PLAYING FIELDS

' .—(1) Except with the consent of the Secretary of State, a body to whom this subsection applies shall not dispose of any playing fields—

(a) which are, immediately before the date of the disposal, used by a maintained school for the purposes of the school, or

(b) which are not then so used but have been so used at any time within the period of 10 years ending with that date.

(2) Subsection (1) applies—

(a) to a local authority; and

(b) in any case where the consent of the Secretary of State is not required to any such disposal by virtue of either of paragraphs 1 and 2 of Schedule 22—

(i) to the governing body of a maintained school, and

(ii) to a foundation body.

(3) Except with the consent of the Secretary of State, a local authority shall not take any action (other than the making of a disposal falling within subsection (1)) which is intended or likely to result in a change of use of any playing fields—

(a) which are, immediately before the date when the action is taken, used by a maintained school for the purposes of the school, or

(b) which are not then so used but have been so used at any time within the period of 10 years ending with that date,

whereby the playing fields will be used for purposes which do not consist of or include their use as playing fields by such a school for the purposes of the school.

(4) Subsection (3) does not, however, apply where the land in question will, on a change of use falling within that subsection, become used in connection with the provision by a local authority of educational facilities for a maintained school or any recreational facilities.

(5) For the purposes of this section the Secretary of State's consent may be given in relation to a particular disposal or change of use or generally in relation to disposals or changes of use of a particular description, and in either case may be given subject to conditions.

(6) This section has effect despite anything in section 123 or 127 of the Local Government Act 1972 (general power to dispose of land) or in any other enactment; and any consent which a local authority are required to obtain by virtue of this section shall be in addition to any consent required by virtue of either of those sections.

(7) In this section—

"local authority" includes a parish council;

"playing fields" means land in the open air which is provided for the purposes of physical education or recreation, other than any prescribed description of such land.

(8) For the purposes of this section any reference to a maintained school includes, in relation to any time falling before the appointed day, a reference to the school as—

(a) a county, voluntary or maintained special school, or

(b) a grant–maintained or grant–maintained special school, within the meaning of the Education Act 1996.

(9) Nothing in this section applies in relation to Wales.'.—[Mr. Blunkett.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 77, 76 and 78.

Mr. Blunkett: The new clause is intended to fulfil another of our manifesto commitments, this time to ensure that the wholesale sell-off of playing fields is at last put to an end.

We have agreement across the House. In 1991, the then Department of Education and Science went out to consultation; seven years on, that consultation is gradually coming to an end. The previous Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), promised to put a stop to the sale of playing fields, having sold 5,000 of them over the years. In fact, about 40 playing fields a month are still being lost to us. Therefore, it is with great pleasure that, tonight, we can join together to say that enough is enough, and today is the day when we agree to put a stop to this environmental vandalism.

In rejoicing in doing that, we can also ensure that common sense prevails. Where it is appropriate for a swap to be done to provide facilities, that can be agreed. Where the criteria need to be worked out, that can be done in conjunction with the Sports Council, the National Playing Fields Association and others. We can apply common sense, work together, ensure that everybody gains, and provide children with adequate facilities for play and for sport. We must ensure that the environment in which they find themselves is acceptable as we approach a new century.

As I am totally against waffle, I shall sit down.

Mr. Dorrell: I am as opposed as the Secretary of State to waffle, so I do not propose to speak for more than a few moments on the new clause. The right hon. Gentleman correctly anticipated the reaction of the Conservative party. I welcome the provision being written into the law, not least for the various reasons given by the right hon. Gentleman relating to the history of the proposal during the lifetime of the Conservative Government.

In my year as Secretary of State for National Heritage, I was responsible for the early drafting of a White Paper that was then published by my successor, and which contained exactly this proposal within it. I am pleased to support the new clause.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): The Liberal Democrats will not engage in waffle on this subject, either. However, I want to make a few brief remarks.

The physical fitness of those undergoing education is vital. We are concerned that so many playing fields have been sold, but a number of swimming pools are also being closed. We all know of examples of that in our constituencies.

When I visited the Army recently in Germany, I was told that the physical fitness of new recruits is bad. One reason for that is the selling of playing fields. We must remember why playing fields are sold—to raise cash because schools are short of money. The underlying point is that if schools are not to be forced to sell them, they must be properly financed and receive the right amount of support from the Exchequer. We hope that that will be the case under this new Government.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 4

GRANT MAINTAINED SCHOOLS

'.—(1) Where a school is a grant maintained school within the meaning of the Education Act 1996 at the beginning of the 1998–99 school year—

(a) the provisions of this clause shall have effect for prescribing the procedure for altering the school's status so that it is no longer a grant maintained school; and

(b) the status of the school as a grant maintained school shall not be so altered except in accordance with the provisions of this clause.

(2) The Secretary of State may by regulations make provision for ballots of parents to be held, at their request, for determining whether the grant maintained school to which such a ballot relates should retain its status as a grant maintained school.

(3) Ballot regulations may make provision—

(a) for determining the parents who are eligible to request and vote in a ballot under this section, provided that such determination shall include only parents of children for the time being in the school or who have accepted an offer of a place in the school;

(b) requiring a request for such a ballot to be made by means of a petition signed by such number eligible parents as may be specified in or determined in accordance with the regulations;

(c) prescribing the form of any petition and other requirements (whether as to the procedure to be followed or otherwise) which are to be complied with in relation to any such petition;

(d) prescribing the body ("the designated body") to which any such petition is to be sent and which, under arrangements made by Secretary of State, is to—

(i) make the arrangements for the holding of ballots under this section, and

(ii) discharge such other functions with respect to such petitions and the holding of such ballots as may be prescribed (which may include the determination of any question arising as to the validity of any request for a ballot);

(e) requiring prescribed bodies or persons, or bodies or persons falling within any prescribed category—

(i) to provide the designated body or any other person with any prescribed information requested by that body or person, or

(ii) to publish prescribed information in such manner as may be prescribed;

(f) prescribing the terms of the question on which a ballot under this section is to be held and the manner in which such a ballot is to be conducted;

(g) specify how the result of such a ballot is to be ascertained;

(h) enabling the Secretary of State, in any prescribed circumstances, to declare a previous ballot under this section void and require the holding of a fresh ballot;

(i) requiring anything falling to be done under the regulations to be done within such period as may be specified in or determined in accordance with the regulations;

(4) Ballot regulations may provide for a request for a ballot under this section to be made, in any prescribed circumstances, by means of two or more petitions.

(5) The information required to be provided in pursuance of subsection (3)(e) may include the names and addresses of parents of any prescribed description.

(6) Where—

(a) a ballot has been held under this section, and

(b) the result of the ballot was to the effect that the schools or school in question should retain grant-maintained status, no further ballot relating to the schools or school shall be held under this section within five years.

(7) An authority or body to whom this subsection applies shall not—

(a) publish any material which, in whole or in part, appears designed to influence the result of a ballot under this section, or

(b) give any financial or other assistance to a person for the publication of material, which the authority or body are prohibited by this subsection from publishing themselves, or

(c) otherwise incur any expenditure, or give any assistance, for the purpose of influencing the outcome of a ballot under this section.

(8) Subsection (7) applies to—

(a) any local education authority, and

(b) the governing body of any maintained school within the meaning of section 95 and in the case of the governing body of such a school which has a delegated budget within the meaning of Part II of this Act (or, in relation to any time before the appointed day, Part II of the Education Act 1996) the reference to expenditure in subsection (7)(c) is to expenditure out of the school's budget share.

(9) In this section, "ballot regulations" means regulations made under this section.'.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Dorrell: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 113, in schedule 2, page 99, line 39, at end insert,

'except that no such school shall be allocated to a new category unless the change has been agreed to following a ballot under section (Grant Maintained Schools).'.

Mr. Dorrell: The House will recognise that new clause 4 deals with the principal occasion of the Bill. The Government would say that the purpose of the Bill is to raise school standards, and we all share that purpose—but the occasion of the Bill is the Government's determination to abolish grant-maintained schools. New clause 4 would offer some protection to those schools whose parents, through a parental ballot, have voted to accord to them GM status. It would entrench their right to remain GM schools and prevent the Government from removing that status without first securing the consent of the parents.

In terms of the delivery of children's education, the new clause is the most important that we are likely to consider on Report. It goes to the heart of the central purpose that led the Government to introduce the Bill—the determination to abolish GM status.

When the Secretary of State introduced his White Paper in the summer, he included as one of the guiding principles of his education policy the proposition that standards matter more than structure. No one in the House should disagree with that principle. However, in the months since that White Paper, the right hon. Gentleman's policy has given the lie to any suggestion that it motivates the way in which, day to day, he carries out his functions.

The Bill is called the School Standards and Framework Bill and it devotes 50 clauses to establishing a new framework for the management of schools. The right hon. Gentleman's principle, when it is converted into legislation, amounts to the substitution of the word "framework" for the word "structure", and then a commitment to redesign the framework of the management of schools.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) said, it is even more ironic than that. Through the Bill—the central purpose of which is the redesign of the framework for the management of schools—the Government are withdrawing the principles of local responsibility and accountability as they have been accorded to GM schools, which have used the opportunity to deliver successful education to their children. Yet in an earlier debate, the Minister for School Standards—with our support—wanted to introduce new flexibility and new opportunities to escape from over-prescriptive local education authority control for any school that opted into an education action zone.

It is extraordinary that, within the same Bill, the Secretary of State is asking the House to endorse two flatly contradictory principles—first, the principle of withdrawal of local responsibility and the reimposition of LEA control; and, secondly, the principle of enhanced flexibility and the removal of LEA control, where that can be shown to be in the interests of children.

We agree with the Secretary of State on his second principle; we disagree profoundly with him on his first. We believe that we can adduce arguments of practice and of principle to show that when the right hon. Gentleman seeks to reimpose and reintroduce over-prescriptive LEA control, he is wrong.

First, The right hon. Gentleman is wrong on the basis of the results published by his Department on the delivery of service by GM schools. In November last year, the Department for Education and Employment listed the 240 most improved schools in Britain. The Secretary of State was embarrassed by having to admit in interviews that, of the 240 schools that he listed, a third were grant maintained. It was pointed out to him that it was a bit of an own goal to issue a press release effectively praising schools whose status he was about to abolish. Eight of the top 20 schools on the list were grant maintained.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that those figures are all the more striking in view of the fact that grant-maintained schools account for only 6 per cent. of all state schools in England and Wales?

8 pm

Mr. Dorrell: That is exactly right. The Secretary of State says that grant-maintained schools account for about 20 per cent. of secondary schools, but, even taking that figure, the grant-maintained sector is over-represented by a factor of roughly two in the list of most improved schools.

In the table published in The Sunday Times following last year's A-level results, 50 of the 100 best-performing schools, including the top three, were grant maintained. That is the track record of the structure that the Secretary of State wants to abolish, while saying that standards are more important than structure. How can the two halves of his personality be reconciled?

Mr. Blizzard: Does the right hon. Gentleman attribute the success of those schools to good management and efficient use of their delegated budgets, or to the favoured funding that they received as against other schools in the same area, many of which lost funding as a result? If the answer is the former, that will be unaffected by the legislation; if it is the latter, most people would believe that our schools should be fairly funded.

Mr. Dorrell: The answer is the former, but the hon. Gentleman is completely wrong to say that it is unaffected by the Bill. If it were true that the Bill left the grant-maintained school with the same authority over its own affairs, and the same freedom to decide which resources are spent by the school and which are retained by the local education authority, I would have no problem with it; but that is not what the Bill delivers.

The Bill consciously and deliberately reasserts the principle that the grant-maintained school should receive the resources allocated by the local education authority after the authority has decided which resources to use within its own bureaucracy. That is the principle that the hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) will be asked to support. He may shake his head, but that is the principle in his party's manifesto.

Dr. George Turner: The right hon. Gentleman wants to defend what he regards as essential management powers. Which of those powers will not be available under the Government's proposals?

Mr. Dorrell: I am about to deal with exactly that subject. The House should concentrate not only on the results achieved by grant-maintained schools but on the principle that lay behind their establishment. The Government are asking their Back Benchers to throw over that principle and substitute the principle that the powers should be vested in the local education authority.

The Minister for School Standards says that it is his view that the key responsibility for the delivery of standards rests with the school. He is right to say that, but the problem is that he then advocates taking powers away from the school and vesting them in the LEA. The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner) asked which powers. One was mentioned earlier: the power of the school to determine its own priorities.

The structure of the education development planning process that we discussed in Committee requires the school's targets to be agreed by the LEA, and the LEA's education development plan to be agreed by the Secretary of State. The Bill transfers power from the school to the LEA, but that power rests with the LEA only as long as the Secretary of State is satisfied, week by week and month by month, with the way in which the service is managed.

The Secretary of State is seeking powers over the maintained sector that are indistinguishable in principle from the powers that the Secretary of State for Health has over the national health service. The key difference is that the national health service was always intended to be a national service, accountable to Parliament through the Secretary of State, whereas we sought, first, to have a school system that is accountable through the local education authority—an elected assembly to a local body—and then, more recently, to have direct accountability from individual schools, through the governing body, to parents and the local community.

Dr. George Turner: I fail to understand how the Secretary of State's insisting on the setting of standards and targets interferes with a governing body's ability to achieve higher standards.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman is now asking me a totally different question. He asked how power was taken out of the school, and I answered his question. The school should be responsible for deciding its priorities for the community that it serves, but the Bill takes that power out of the school and vests it either in the LEA or in the Secretary of State.

It is not true, as the hon. Member for Waveney loves to argue, that there was a distortion of resources in favour of grant-maintained schools. Resources were allocated to the school rather than to the local education authority, and it was for the school to decide whether they should be used within the school or to buy services from elsewhere in the bureaucracy.

Mr. Blizzard rose—

Mr. Dorrell: Before the hon. Gentleman embarrasses himself again, he should remember the words of the Minister for School Standards, who is on the record as saying that he wants to raise the level of delegation in the rest of the maintained sector to that achieved in grant-maintained schools.

If that is the right principle, why abolish grant-maintained schools? Why not leave them there and raise the other schools to their standard? Why begin the process by levelling down, rather than—as the Minister for School Standards might have said, but did not—using the grant-maintained schools as a gold standard by which to raise the attainment of other schools?

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it may well have appeared that grant-maintained schools got extra money, but that they could spend what they needed to spend only because they were given directly money that many local education authorities had not passed on as they should have done?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is entirely right. It is a question whether decisions about resources should be made by LEAs, or should be vested in schools and governing bodies. Sometimes, schools and governing bodies use resources to buy services from LEAs—and that is fine by us, if it is in the best interests of the school concerned and the children in it. We argue—and it is the implication, which is never faced up to, of the remarks of the Minister for School Standards—that resources should go into the school. It should then be for the head teacher principally—but also for the teaching staff and the governing body—to make decisions about how those resources can best be used.

Mr. Blizzard: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dorrell: I will give way once more.

Mr. Blizzard: I thank the right hon. Gentleman. In the light of what he has said, how does he explain comments frequently made to me by head teachers of schools that became grant maintained? Effectively, they said, "I did it for the money." Head teachers often persuaded their governing bodies to become grant maintained in pursuit of extra money—not just a greater share of the annual revenue resource taken from the LEAs, but priority in attaining capital funding from the Government. Most of those schools took the carrot that was dangled before them—extra capital resources—in what appeared to be, in the light of what the right hon. Gentleman has said, a deliberate attempt to break down LEAs altogether.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman says that they did it for the money. In fact, they did it to control the budget that was available for the children anyway. I say that the budget was available anyway, but, if the schools were not grant maintained, the money did not get into the schools.

Labour Members love to claim that extra resources went towards the education of children in grant-maintained schools, but that is not true. As Labour Members know very well, resources were divided on the basis of local spending decisions. That is why, in the early stages of grant-maintained status, spending levels in individual GM schools with similar needs varied: they reflected the circumstances of the LEA. The hon. Gentleman's interlocutors said, "We did it for the money" because they wanted to control the money that they knew was supposed to deliver education to their children, but which, in their opinion, was not being used properly.

It is true that many GM schools have used the extra authority that they have had over resources to improve their capital stock, but they have been able to do that because the money that was previously stuck in the bureaucracy got to the schools, and the schools were able to make decisions about the best use of that money.

The Government are committed to the abolition of GM schools. I remind Labour Members who defend the abolition of GM schools that the Bill introduces the same principles in regard to education action zones. At least we are consistent: we voted for the principles regarding education action zones against which Labour Members have just voted, and we shall vote for the principles regarding grant-maintained schools as well. We shall do so because the principles are right, whether we refer to education action zones or to grant-maintained schools.

Labour Members are wrong in their vendetta against grant-maintained schools. They are wrong because they have not looked at the evidence that such schools are successful, and they are wrong in principle. They are not adhering to a principle that the Minister for School Standards loves to proclaim, but then violates in the way in which he discharges his function: maximum delegation. When the Minister proclaims maximum delegation, he is right; when he pursues a policy that inhibits and, indeed, reverses his principle for grant-maintained schools, he is wrong.

We do not claim that the grant-maintained system was perfect or incapable of improvement; nor have we ever said that grant-maintained status is right for all schools. What we say is that grant-maintained status moved power into schools, and that the result was a dramatic improvement in the education that those schools gave children.

We make another key case. Grant-maintained schools do not exist as a result of a fiat issued by the Secretary of State or his predecessors; they do not exist as a result of a private agreement between heads and governors, or local education authorities. They exist within the law as it currently stands, for a simple reason: parents supported the principle of grant-maintained status in a ballot.

8.15 pm

That is what the new clause proposes. Given the Government's determination to remove the concept of grant-maintained schools from the statute book, the least we should do is accord schools that voted for grant-maintained status within the last 10 years the same protection that the Government are prepared to accord to grammar schools. The Government's attitude to grammar schools and grant-maintained schools is remarkably consistent. Both are successful institutions, and there is clear evidence that they have widespread parental support, but the Government are plainly opposed to both. The grant-maintained sector is uniquely exposed, however. At least the Government have said, in principle, that they will not abolish grammar schools without securing consent in a ballot.

The new clause applies principles which, as I said in Committee, I do not find hugely attractive in themselves, but which provide some protection for grammar schools. I simply ask this question: why do the Government not give grant-maintained schools, when parents have voted for GM status, the protection that they are prepared to accord to grammar schools? That is the challenge which the new clause presents to the Secretary of State. I hope that, in his reply, he will recognise this: a school that can claim in its support, first, that the system works because it delivers high standards, secondly, that it is right in principle because it reflects the principle that the right hon. Gentleman himself is introducing in education action zones, thirdly, that it is backed by parents, governors and teachers, and, fourthly, that it has already been supported in a ballot of parents is entitled to expect the protection of one of Her Majesty's Ministers. The Secretary of State should not have the power to abolish grant-maintained schools unless he can show that parents have changed their minds, and have voted in a ballot to reverse the decision that they made in a ballot only a few years ago.

Mrs. May: My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) has outlined the ultimate irony that lies behind the Bill very well. It is clear that the Bill is fundamentally about changing the framework of schools. Whatever the Government say about its being a Bill to raise standards, most of it is about school structures. It is about changing the framework of schools; it is about development plans for organisation committees. It is not about standards in themselves, but about the structure within which schools operate, and the sort of schools that we have under local education authorities and education action zones.

The irony is that, in two ways, the Bill discriminates against grant-maintained schools—as my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood pointed out. On the one hand, the Government say, "Fine. We may not want to create new grammar schools"—we disagree with that, but it is the Government's position—"but if parents have said that they want grammar schools to stay, we will allow it. As for grant-maintained schools, no thank you—goodbye."

As for education action zones, the Government envisage certain powers in an innovative new world. The Minister for School Standards confirmed that in a debate on another new clause. The Government look ahead to the provision of education in the new millennium. They want radical thinking from schools and, to bring it about, they will set up a structure enabling schools to free themselves from LEAs, to apply different terms and positions to the employment of teachers and to have extra, favoured funding. Those are the principles that lie behind education action zones. However, the principles that schools should be free from local education authorities and have the freedom to say "No, we do not want to retain standard terms and conditions for teachers", are precisely the same principles that were applied to grant- maintained schools.

The Government are saying, "Fine, we accept that schools might not want to be under the local education authority and might want to have new thinking. We think that that's a good idea, but they can do it only if they do it under the structure that we set up and not under the previous structure. If it is a Labour idea we like it, but we don't like the idea if it was introduced by the previous Government, despite the fact that they are exactly the same."

There is also a great sadness behind the Bill.

Mr. Bercow: It is small-minded.

Mrs. May: Yes, that is an excellent description of the Bill. In Standing Committee, we were told that the Bill is about looking forward to the new millennium, about free thinking and about saying that the structure of schools under a local education authority is not right. Let us make no bones about it: the Bill will lead to the demise of local education authorities. By establishing education action zones, Ministers are saying that they want to abolish LEAs, but that they do not want to come out and say so. They will create a new structure and abolish LEAs by subterfuge.

In Committee, the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris), made it absolutely clear that the Government think that, very soon, there may be 400 education action zones. The Government have created the new structure not to deal with failing schools but, ultimately, to take over the education structure of the United Kingdom. That is how the Government perceive the way forward to the new millennium.

Dr. George Turner: Does the hon. Lady acknowledge that the GM experiment was divisive and that it—unlike action zones—fostered competition rather than co-operation? Despite what she says, by no means will action zones be anti-LEA. They are a way forward. Now we shall be able to get on with raising standards, rather than continuing the sterile debate of the past 10 years on the GM experiment.

Mrs. May: That intervention was up to the hon. Gentleman's usual standard. He said that it was divisive to give a school GM status, but he thinks that it will not be divisive if schools band together as education action zones and receive extra Government funding. He has defeated his own argument.

I should like to disabuse the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner), and suggest that he think through very carefully the implications of the provisions that he has voted for in the Bill. He should spend some time thinking about the likely ultimate result of the education action zone experiment. In Committee, Ministers said that, in the new millennium, the modern school structure and modern education in modern Britain would be education action zone led and not local education authority led. Ministers made that quite clear in our Standing Committee debates, and I suggest that the hon. Gentleman should go away and have another look at those proceedings. Ministers' statements on that point were very interesting.

The hon. Member for North–West Norfolk and other Labour Members have voted for the concept of schools being freed from local education authorities, but they are saying that schools can do that only if they are in an education action zone and are not grant maintained. Grant-maintained schools were very successful precisely because they gave power to schools to make decisions on their own future and on how to provide education in those schools, without being under an LEA's authoritative hand.

Mr. Bercow: Is not the extraordinary illogicality of the Government's position that failing schools can be freed from the authority of local education authorities, but that successful schools cannot be so freed bizarre, even by new Labour standards?

Mrs. May: The Government have moved forward and accepted our argument, as they will allow successful schools to become part of an education action zone and thereby free from the local education authority. However, my hon. Friend is absolutely right in saying that Ministers believe that, whereas groups of failing schools should be given those freedoms, successful grant-maintained schools must have those freedoms removed.

Mr. Hayes: Does my hon. Friend acknowledge that, by any other name, the provision is an insult to local education authorities? Our local education authorities—be they successful or unsuccessful—are being told that they are incapable of running schools. Are local education authorities being told that the democratic accountability that they offer is no longer relevant? Moreover, are we being told by Ministers that differential funding, which various Labour Members have argued against in this debate, is now acceptable?

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend makes a very interesting point. I think that every Labour Member needs to think through the Bill's consequences for local education authorities and the Government's views on them.

I tell my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) that there is an even greater illogicality in the Government's position. The Government have said—the Minister for School Standards has confirmed it in response to an intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn)—that if a group of grant-maintained schools wishes to join in an education action zone, it will be able to do so. The Government are, therefore, saying that a group of grant-maintained schools can form an education action zone—with freedom from the local education authority and, should they wish, from the national curriculum, and with powers on how to employ their staff—but that they cannot have those powers or freedom if they maintain grant-maintained status.

The Government are interested only in abolishing something called "a grant-maintained school". They are interested not in the principles underlying grant-maintained schools or in how grant-maintained schools can and have raised standards, but only in the name "grant-maintained school". It is sheer envy of that name. Ministers believe that it is perfectly acceptable for the Government to allow education action zones to have extra funding to free themselves from local education authorities because they will not be called grant-maintained schools. That is what that provision in the Bill is all about.

I suggest that the Minister and the Secretary of State should themselves think through the illogicality of saying no to grant-maintained schools, but saying yes to the very powers that grant-maintained schools provided.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: I endorse everything said in this debate by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell). I should also declare an interest, as my daughter attends a grant-maintained school. She is very proud to attend such a school, and I am very proud that she attends one.

We have a number of grant-maintained schools in Tewkesbury, and I have spent much time at them.

Mr. Bercow: Will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to accept from me—having met his excellent daughter at Conservative party conferences—that she is an admirable advertisement for the continuation of grant-maintained schools?

Mr. Robertson: As they say on the television, "You may think that, but I couldn't possibly comment." Nevertheless, I thank my hon. Friend for that very kind intervention. I suspect that more unfriendly interventions will be forthcoming as I make my speech.

I have spent much time at those grant-maintained schools, and base my remarks not only on those visits, but on my experience, some years ago, as a chairman of governors of a primary school that had about 200 pupils. At that time, primary schools of that size could not opt out; they could not apply for grant-maintained status. I tended to find that, as chairman of governors, I spent at least half my time fighting the nonsense of the socialist LEA in Bolton, and very little time doing what I was supposed to do. The headmaster found himself in a similar position.

The LEA adopted a sinister and arrogant attitude to that primary school, because it knew that, at that time, we could do nothing about it. It—and other LEAs—adopted a very different attitude to secondary schools that could opt out, because of the constant threat that those schools might leave the LEA. I do not like to use the word threat, but, when dealing with socialist LEAs, especially in the north, it was necessary to use every available weapon to run a school decently.

8.30 pm

That experience persuaded me to put pressure on the then Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), to allow smaller primary schools to apply for grant-maintained status. I was proud to take part in that campaign, and the Secretary of State authorised the change. I felt that smaller primary schools needed financial and managerial autonomy. The schools that have opted out have enjoyed success as a result.

The then Government wanted schools to become grant maintained because they wanted to give parents a choice about which schools their children attended. There were grant-maintained schools, Church schools and grammar schools—a range of schools—so the opinion of parents, the people who really take these decisions, mattered.

However, I have one criticism of the then Government: they made it far too difficult for schools to opt out. An enormous turnout of parents in the ballot was required. That requirement, and the terrible campaigns that LEAs carried out against schools that appeared likely to opt out, made it difficult for schools to opt out. Before any hon. Member says that there are not that many grant-maintained schools, I should say that that is hardly surprising, because there were no depths to which the LEAs would not sink to prevent schools from opting out. That is why there are not as many as there should have been.

Mr. Brady: Would my hon. Friend care to reflect on the position of many grant-maintained schools that faced sinister and unpleasant campaigns by their LEAs, which tried to oppose GM status? Many of those schools are in great fear of the prejudice that they may experience from predominantly Labour LEAs when they are forced back into the LEA sector.

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is right. Those schools do not know what will happen and they are afraid of being returned to that situation. Some disgraceful campaigns were mounted against schools that proposed to opt out.

I attended St. James's school in Farnworth, Bolton which I believe, became the second school in the country to opt out. It was interesting to watch how the LEA acted to try to prevent the school from doing so. It let it be known that the school might close. That made parents slightly dubious about sending their children to the school, so the rolls started falling, and the LEA then considered closing the school. The Bolton LEA thereby put the school in a position where it had no option but to opt out. The campaign that the LEA waged against the school was disgraceful. My hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) is absolutely right.

The previous Government should have made it easier for schools to opt out, especially given the success that grant-maintained schools have had. I ask a single question. Those schools—

Mr. Don Foster: The hon. Gentleman has just suggested that the grant-maintained school experiment has been some sort of success. I appreciate that this is the last gasp of an attempt to save them, but will he enlighten the House with his knowledge of evidence that demonstrates that the grant-maintained school sector has led to overall benefits? Specifically, will he draw our attention to any research that he knows of that has shown that the grant-maintained school experiment has led to a raising of academic standards?

Mr. Robertson: I can only quote the figures that I have been given. [Laughter.] Well, I shall not quote the figures that the Minister gave me because, when I did so this morning, having had them in writing from the Minister, he denied that he had given them to me—so I shall not quote the Government's figures, because I may be corrected. They may change later this evening.

However, I understand that 92 per cent. of grant-maintained schools have appointed additional staff, 91 per cent. have increased their spending on books and equipment and 54 per cent. have increased their spending on new buildings. [Interruption.] From a sedentary position, the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) suggests that I am talking only about cash. I am actually talking about what that cash bought, which seems to me to be quite important.

Mr. Hayes: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to those extra measurements of input, but measurements of output are also relevant. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) said, measured by examination results, by university entrance or by any of the standard criteria for academic success, grant-maintained schools are way above and beyond a success; they are a towering success. I know that the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) was a friend of city technology colleges and grant-maintained schools before he entered the House.

Mr. Robertson: As usual, my hon. Friend makes the point better than I could.

If, now that opted-out schools are about to lose their status, I were to ask them, "Would you, by choice, revert to your previous status under the LEA?" I am not aware that any school would choose to do so. We should listen to what those schools are saying. It is all very well for us to talk about the subject in the Chamber. Should we not listen to what the schools are saying? They opted out voluntarily, and they would not revert to their previous status. They have had success because they have been able to control their finances. They have more teachers, books and buildings.

Grant-maintained schools have also been a success in less tangible terms. When one walks through a grant-maintained school, one can feel its liveliness, balanced by discipline. I believe that that is unique in such schools.

Mrs. Browning: I wonder whether my hon. Friend is wondering just how wrong a Prime Minister can be. Labour Members are all gesturing from sedentary positions to suggest that everything that my hon. Friend is saying about academic standards and discipline in schools is wrong, and yet the personal preference of the Prime Minister of this land—

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): Cheap.

Mrs. Browning: It is not cheap; it is fact. It cannot be denied. If the Prime Minister of this land, who has the choice of any school that he wishes—including those in the private sector—decides to send his son to a GM school, is his judgment out of accord with that of the members of the Labour party, or is it that they are right and he is wrong? I wonder what my hon. Friend thinks of that.

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful for that intervention. The Prime Minister is absolutely right to exercise his choice about which school he sends his children to—I wish them the best of success—but he is wrong to deny that choice to other children. Of course, he is only following what many other Labour Ministers have done. They have attended schools that, at a later date, they have wanted to close. It is a matter of "Do as they say and not as they have done." They have benefited from a far greater education than many Conservative Members have done, but have then wanted to close those very schools. It is hypocrisy. I am sorry that that is the case.

I spoke of the success that resulted from financial and managerial autonomy. I spoke of the intangible success of a disciplined and lively atmosphere in grant-maintained schools. That has led to the academic success that Conservative Members have mentioned.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside): Is the hon. Gentleman seriously saying that local authority schools do not have discipline and standards? Is he aware that only a handful of schools chose to opt out in areas such as Labour Lancashire? Is he also aware that the Labour-controlled Lancashire county council transformed its inheritance from a Conservative administration to raise standards of numeracy and literacy, as well as well-being and discipline?

Mr. Robertson: Having spent 33 years in Lancashire, I do not recognise the success that the hon. Lady describes. I am not suggesting that there is no discipline in schools that are not grant maintained. I am saying that the grant-maintained schools that I have experience of have successfully balanced a great fun atmosphere with good discipline. If the hon. Lady is suggesting that there has not been a discipline problem in our schools, she has lived in a different country from me. There have been serious discipline problems at many schools in Lancashire.

The financial autonomy, managerial autonomy and intangible atmosphere of grant-maintained schools have led to great academic success. That success is clear for all to see. It is a tragedy that the Government want to scrap those schools.

What will happen to grant-maintained schools when they return to LEA control? Like other schools, they will have to queue up for money from LEAs. That is difficult for many schools. Many councils have a lot of bureaucracy and top-slice the money, diverting it from schools. I pointed out to the Secretary of State at Education and Employment questions a few weeks ago that the Labour group in Gloucestershire did not want to passport the Government's extra money to schools. That money is being passported only thanks to the Conservative group, with the support of the Liberal Democrat group. The Labour group voted against it.

Mr. Brady: Disgraceful.

Mr. Robertson: Absolutely disgraceful.

If something is not broken, we ought not to be fixing it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead asked, why are the Government making the changes? It is another vain attempt to look dynamic. If there had been no grant-maintained status, the Government would probably have introduced it, just to look as though they were doing something. Their behaviour is spiteful. Many Labour Members still consider good education to be an elitist concept. I did not have the education that I might have wanted, but I respect those who did and I respect organisations that provide good education. It is a pity that the Government do not. Their socialist principles are in good health and are here for all to see.

Mr. Brady: I am delighted to follow many of my colleagues who have spoken eloquently in support of grant-maintained schools. [Interruption.] The Secretary of State is chuntering from a sedentary position, as he was when my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) was speaking. My hearing is very good. I could tell that he was suggesting that my hon. Friend had had the good fortune to attend a grammar school, as I did. I saw the palpable disappointment on his face when he discovered that that was not the case.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: I am happy to correct the Secretary of State. I am not proud of the fact, but I had the distinction of failing the 11 plus. I went to a good secondary modern school and did not go to a grammar school until I was 16.

Mr. Brady: We may come to selective education on the second day on Report. I point to my hon. Friend as a perfect example of how a selective education system can work for the benefit of all. My hon. Friend was not traumatised and made a failure for life by failing his 11 plus. I accept that the Deputy Prime Minister may have suffered from that more significantly. We shall doubtless come to the issue on another occasion.

I am proud to defend grant-maintained schools, but I am sad that we have to do so. The Government's actions regularly contrast with their policies. They say that intervention should be in inverse proportion to excellence. That sounds fine and we all support the principle. However, their actions oppose it. To abolish grant-maintained status when grant-maintained schools achieve so much is a disgrace, as is the Government's intention to damage grammar schools, which are another mark of excellence in our state education system. The Government should be proud of them, as we are.

The Government have moved some way towards understanding the logic of giving greater freedom and independence to schools. That is evident in the education action zones proposals, principally for failing schools in inner-city areas, which will be given greater freedom and flexibility. At the same time, as several of my hon. Friends have said, the Government's policy on grant-maintained schools runs in entirely the opposite direction.

By creating foundation schools, the Government have moved a little way. The measure is a sop to grant-maintained schools and the idea that independence and autonomy in schools are a good thing; it is very half-hearted. By going so little of the way towards a system that we have seen work so effectively, the Government risk throwing out all the benefits of grant-maintained status. Parents in many parts of the country will have cause to criticise the Government for that in years to come.

8.45 pm

The imposition of LEA representatives on boards of governors, the removal of articles of government of schools, the imposition of a standard new form and the control over admissions policies all point to a major erosion of independence.

Changes in funding arrangements, which have been discussed to some extent, are entirely inadequate and have not been made sufficiently explicit. We need far greater transparency and a far fairer settlement in transitional arrangements—not only over one year—particularly for schools that only recently became grant maintained, such as Altrincham girls' grammar. It is vital that such schools should be able to continue and complete their restructuring, expecting that special purpose grants will be available and without having to do so in a concertina time scale.

To change the teaching force and the profile of staff over one year would be very unsettling. It would be appropriate for the Government to consider extending the transition period to allow such schools to take a longer view and to smooth out changes as they otherwise would have done.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) referred to the academic success of GM schools, which I was going to do only in passing. I am pleased that, in contrast to their performance in Committee, Labour Members did not take the trouble to try to suggest that the performance of GM schools was not as good as we claim. The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) challenged one of my hon. Friends, however, so I shall give him some of the figures that ought to be on record in this debate.

The figures are very clear; they show the percentage of schools in which pupils achieved, for instance, five-plus A to C grades at GCSE. In the grant-maintained sector, the figure is 53.3 per cent., the national average is 42.6 per cent. and the LEA performance is 39.8 per cent. That difference is maintained even in areas where there are no selective schools. GM schools in those areas achieve a performance of 45.6 per cent. against an LEA performance of 38.4 per cent.

Before Labour Members talk about social differences across the country, I should point out that the same difference in performance is borne out even in areas where many free school meals are provided. In areas where more than 30 per cent. of school meals are provided free of charge, GM schools deliver a performance of 29.4 per cent. of pupils achieving five-plus A to C grades, against an LEA performance of 21.7 per cent. I know that the hon. Member for Bath is itching to get to his feet, so I shall allow him to intervene.

Mr. Don Foster: The hon. Gentleman was absolutely right; I was itching to get to my feet. If grant-maintained schools were the success that he described, presumably the prediction of the former Secretary of State, Mr. John Patten—that by about four years ago, the majority of secondary schools would be grant maintained—would have come true. He said that if they were not, he would eat his hat, garnished; we are stili waiting for him to do so.

On statistics, does the hon. Gentleman accept that it is important that we are concerned about results across the country? He must, therefore, demonstrate that the growth of GM schools—what growth there has been—has led overall to an increase in success at GCSE level, for example. Does he acknowledge that, in LEAs where there has been a growth in the number of 15-year-old pupils who have gone to GM schools, there has not been a commensurate increase in the average GCSE point score? That is statistically correct.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Foster: Some GM schools have done better because they have received additional funding and they should have done better. But, overall, there has not been an increase.

Mr. Brady: I am beginning to become confused about who is intervening on whom. My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) sought to intervene on the hon. Member for Bath. I feel as though, by rising to my feet, I am merely giving my hon. Friend an opportunity to speak.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend displays characteristic courtesy in giving way on this point. Does he agree that the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) imposes far too great a burden of responsibility on grant-maintained schools? It is surely not necessary for grant-maintained schools, which constitute a tiny minority of maintained schools, to show that they have improved standards in all other schools. In order to retain GM schools, we must simply demonstrate that they do not damage other schools.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Interventions should not be speeches: they should be very brief.

Mr. Brady: I thank my hon. Friend. I agree that it would be unfair to place such a responsibility on any one grant-maintained school. The argument advanced by the hon. Member for Bath—like those put by Labour Members—reveals a manifest failure genuinely to grasp the importance and benefit of competition. That fact emerged earlier by way of intervention. Grant-maintained schools have played, and continue to play, a critical role by setting a gold standard to which other schools can aspire. Amidst all the rhetoric, the Minister for School Standards occasionally recognises that fact by saying that he wishes to bring all schools to the standard of grant-maintained schools.

However, the reality will be entirely the opposite. There will be a process of levelling down—removing the successful grant-maintained schools and returning to a mixture of local authority control, in one form or another, which will erode standards. My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood revealed that 30 of the top 100 improving schools are grant maintained. That is further compelling evidence of the key role that grant-maintained schools can play in raising education standards in this country. It is a tragedy that the Government will prevent that progression.

New clause 4 will not only greatly improve the Bill from a technical point of view, but be a vital step towards a fairer approach on the part of the Government. It is impossible to justify the new Government's decision. Parents have voted—in some instances by overwhelming majorities—for grant-maintained status, but the Government have decided to wave them aside and push legislation through the House of Commons.

Dr. George Turner: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brady: Yes, with some reluctance.

Dr. Turner: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there was a vote on the policy which was thrashed out before the general election? The electorate gave the Government the mandate to introduce the compromise that was trailed in the White Paper and which is brought forward in this Bill.

Mr. Brady: The hon. Gentleman reveals his Stalinist tendencies. Although he may have enjoyed the brief period of success thrust upon him by the election result last year, some parts of the country did not vote for the kind of policies that he supports.

In my constituency—where the electors clearly did not vote for the Labour manifesto—the figures speak for themselves. Parents wish to retain grant-maintained schools in my constituency. At my old school, Altrincham grammar school, 78 per cent. of the parents voted and 75 per cent. voted in favour of grant-maintained status. At the Ashton upon Mersey school, 73 per cent. of parents voted and 76 per cent. of them voted for grant-maintained status. At the Blessed Thomas Holford school, 64 per cent. of parents voted, but 84 per cent. of them voted in favour of grant-maintained status.

There is a very real demand for grant-maintained schools in my constituency. Such schools were, and are, popular and they are doing a good job. They were always good schools, but they have improved dramatically since they became grant maintained. The quality of grant-maintained schools shines through not only in selective educational areas. That is an important point as Labour Members often try to attack grant-maintained schools on the false premise that they are all selective.

I will refer once again, as I did in Committee, to a school of which I am particularly proud—Ashton upon Mersey school, where 23 per cent. of the pupils have free school meals. It is by no means in an area of great social standing or privilege, but it achieves a remarkable outcome for any school. Possibly—the Minister may be able to correct me—it is the only school in the country that has twice achieved an outstanding award from the Office for Standards in Education and a charter mark, and has recently been made a sports college. It is not a selective or grammar school, but a classic and fine example of a grant-maintained school—in this instance a secondary modern, which is using the freedom to control its own resources, decide its own policy and create its own ethos to generate a proud and effective school which serves the local community well.

Ministers would be wise to reflect on the lessons that can be learnt from schools such as Ashton upon Mersey and countless other grant-maintained schools, and they would be wise to remember the popular mandate that many GM schools received from parents who voted for them in overwhelming numbers.

Mr. St. Aubyn: We have heard some excellent speeches from Opposition Members in praise of grant-maintained schools. As my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) said, it is depressing that we have heard little in response from the Labour side—not even a gracious acknowledgement of how successful those schools have been. Anyone who is interested in raising academic standards has surely to begin with that acknowledgement.

I ask the Government to acknowledge another home truth; that academic excellence is for the few, not the many. Not all of us can have a first class degree. In fact, not all students should go to university and not all school leavers should try for A-levels. Different approaches and levels of education are appropriate to different individuals and if we accept the logic of that, we accept that inevitably, in a fair education system, society will invest more money in some children than in others and yet it will still be a fair system. If we accept that, we are not outraged by the idea that the resources devoted to some schools are slightly higher pro rata than those devoted to others.

The real test of the record of grant-maintained schools is not whether they have achieved a marginal increase in the resources that go into them, but how they have achieved far more than a marginal increase and improvement in the academic success of pupils.

In the area I represent, we have a number of grant-maintained schools. They are not selective, as we have a non-selective system throughout our county, yet they have consistently achieved outstanding academic results. Today, they are asking what they have done wrong. Why are they being forced into the yoke built by this Government in the Bill, which will force them to conform to the branding exercise that new Labour is carrying out?

As my hon. Friends have said, we know that the Government accept the principles of GM schools. Indeed, on 5 February I recall the Minister for School Standards telling us how he intended to build on the experience of those schools. Welcome though that was at the time, as with much that we hear from the Minister it was an ambiguous statement. So much has been reserved in the Bill to be controlled by regulation and decree after it is enacted that it is deeply ambiguous throughout. Conservative Members may be in for a pleasant surprise, whereas some Labour Members may be in for a shock, when education action zones are extended to include clusters of GM schools that know how to take advantage of them.

Our difficulty with the Bill is that, because it will give so many discretionary powers to Ministers, it gives little away to hon. Members who are being asked to agree to it. The new clause would tie down the democratic accountability that is needed for any legislation that introduces as many new powers as this Bill does.

As I said, there is a non-selective system in Guildford, yet the achievement of the schools there is significant. Recently, I met the heads of GM schools in the area, who asked me why they should choose foundation status and what it would achieve, as it would mark them out as former GM schools and would not provide them with their previous independence, either financially or from LEA governors.

Fortunately, there is a Conservative LEA in my area. The response of people throughout the country who are in favour of GM schools will undoubtedly be reflected in local election results—more and more local authorities will return to Conservative control as people realise that that is the only way in which they can be sure of the approach to local education that is represented by the excellence achieved by GM schools.

Because Guildford has a Conservative LEA, I can reassure the heads of GM schools in my area, but I understand their concerns for schools where there is not a Conservative LEA. They are worried that, in an area that has a Labour LEA, foundation status will be used as a mechanism to discriminate against GM schools and that a political project will be launched to try to force those schools to give up foundation status and return to the mainstream. If that project succeeded, it could be heralded as a political victory for the Government when in fact it would be a cynical exercise in undermining the morale and success of some of the best schools in the country.

Earlier, we were asked to provide evidence of the success of GM schools. Last November, The Independent published research showing that barely 5 per cent. of schools exhibited an improvement in standards for each of the previous four years. Of that 5 per cent., one in three were GM schools. Moreover, as we heard, eight of the top 20 schools in the country are grant maintained. There can be no doubt about GM schools' ability to raise standards.

Because of the Government's retrograde step, GM schools are being denied the opportunity to build partnerships. Labour Members often talk about the need for local partnerships; GM schools are ideally placed to build them. They could show other schools in the area how to build forms of co-operation that go way beyond what the LEA can offer through its bureaucratic and stratified systems and means of delivery. Why should not local schools go out to tender in a group bid for financial and auditing services? Why should not groups of schools pool their transport or sports facilities? Very few schools adopt such an approach, but if any group of schools is capable of doing so and developing these ideas, it is GM schools. They should do it because, in doing so, they would produce a better quality service that releases resources to put into education.

It is a great regret that, as a result of the passing of the Bill, there will be no opportunity to develop the independence of GM schools in setting their capital budgets. It was a matter of resentment to the hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) that GM schools had some freedom on their capital budgets, but let us not forget the context in which that freedom was given. The capital spending of GM schools was outside the public sector borrowing requirement. We learnt only by chance in Committee that the Government had allowed that favourable status to be lost. It appears that they are incapable of doing anything to resurrect it. They appear to be happy to see £11 million of capital spending by GM schools come back within the PSBR and to deny such schools the opportunity, under whatever status they might be granted, to regain that freedom on their capital budgets.

The Minister told us in Committee that his Department had examined the problem and was unable to come up with any answers, but surely the fact was that it was unable to come up with any answer that would meet the Government's objective of getting rid of GM schools.

Mr. Byers: I am reluctant to intervene because the House wants to make progress, but the hon. Gentleman has been misleading in his description of what I said in the Standing Committee. For the record, he should accurately reflect the fact that the decision was taken by the Office for National Statistics. I made it clear that the Government were making representations for it to change its decision. I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that that is an accurate reflection of what was said in Committee, unlike what he has just said.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I believe that there is a misunderstanding. I was trying to explain to the Minister that he would have immense difficulty changing the ruling of the National Audit Office precisely because he had constrained his freedom of manoeuvre by the way in which he has designed the Bill.

Mr. Byers: The hon. Gentleman needs to be aware that the National Audit Office has nothing to do with the matter, which involves the Office for National Statistics. He needs to be aware that the ruling affects grant-maintained schools as it applies to their present status, regardless of the new framework in the Bill.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I stand corrected, but I must point out to the Minister that he has an opportunity in the Bill to create a structure for GM schools that would still be recognised as providing them with a capital budget outside the PSBR. He has failed to take that opportunity.

Mr. Blunkett: I need to put it on record that the House does not have the facility to overturn the Office for National Statistics. It is important for the hon. Gentleman's sake and the sake of his Front-Bench colleagues, who know that what I have said is correct, to state that we are not in a position to do that.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful to correct the impression created by the Secretary of State. We are talking not about overruling the Office for National Statistics but about creating a new structure into which GM schools could be fitted that would satisfy the requirements of that office and enable the favourable capital budget treatment to continue—but that would involve maintaining the independence and integrity of GM schools, which is anathema to the Government. As a result, the capital spending of schools in general and former GM schools in particular will be constrained in a way that is due purely to dogma and the Labour party's blatant approach to GM schools.

The Bill is all about conformity. As my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) said, there is a contradiction between the Government's desire to attack individual grant-maintained schools and the possibility that, through the education action zone, they may be prepared to sanction a cluster of GM schools. The reason for the contradiction is that the Government seek conformity. Through conformity, they may achieve some improvement in the performance of the laggards—the schools that are performing least well—but they may at the same time undermine the spirit, energy and enterprise of the best schools and thus the service that our education system should provide for the best of our children.

Mr. Hayes: New clause 4 addresses the contradiction that lies at the heart of the Bill. The Government are sending out a confused message about their appreciation of the role of the local education authority, individual schools and the Secretary of State.

I do not argue with those who say that LEAs should take a strong, perhaps even a dominant, role. That is a logical and acceptable position. I do not argue with those who take the view that all schools should be encouraged to opt out, that LEAs should wither away and that schools should work independently. I do not even argue with those who say that the entire system should be governed centrally—that there should be an all-powerful Department for Education and Employment, that LEAs should cease to exist in all but name and that powers should be removed from the schools. All those positions are at least coherent.

The problem with the Government's approach is that it is a mix of all those positions. The Bill gives the Secretary of State more powers than any Secretary of State has enjoyed before. Labour Members who complained about the centralising tendencies of Conservative Governments over the past 20 years would do well to consider the new powers that the Bill gives the Secretary of State in a range of areas that would have scarce been thought of by Conservative Secretaries of State. Had such powers been proposed before the general election, they would have been roundly condemned by Labour Members.

The Secretary of State is a winner out of all this. LEAs take back some extra responsibilities, but their role is confused. We have already heard of the confusion about education action zones and their relationship with LEAs, and there are other contradictions in respect of the role of LEAs. The schools are, by and large, losers—and none more so than grant-maintained schools.

I shall deal with grant-maintained schools in the context of that general confusion about the future management of education. There has already been some talk in the debate about academic success, which I shall not repeat. I shall not take hon. Members on a travelogue around Windsor, Guildford, Altrincham and other fine places. I mean no disrespect, but I shall not focus on interesting schools in bizarre parts of the country, or bizarre schools in interesting parts of the country.

Given that we all accept that grant-maintained schools have achieved excellence in academic performance, I want to try to analyse the reasons for that success. Even the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) has acknowledged that in GCSE results, university entrance and A-level results, grant-maintained schools have performed disproportionately well. The question is why.

The answer can be summed up simply. It is about liberty, which breeds confidence; confidence, which breeds higher expectations; and higher expectations, which breed success. If there is one thing that my experience in education has taught me, it is that higher expectations are the key to improving educational performance. That are precisely what liberation from the LEA delivered.

I have no prejudice about that; I say it on the basis of my conversations with heads and teachers from grant-maintained schools all over the country. All of them—including those who would not vote Conservative—conclude that liberty has bred a spirit of energy and enterprise, as my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) said. That intangible matter of ethos has changed the expectations of schools, staff, parents and pupils, and raised standards. The new spirit, energy and liberty is at risk from the Government's policy, and that is a cause of great regret and sadness.

9.15 pm

I said that I would not give the House a travelogue, but I want to say something about a particular school in my constituency—I would be condemned roundly if I did not. The grant-maintained Sir John Gleed girls' school is in Spalding in Lincolnshire which, I am pleased to say, retains a selective system of education. I am a grammar school boy; I make no bones about the fact that I believe strongly in selection.

Sir John Gleed girls' school is a secondary modern in a town with a good grammar school for girls that is taking a significant and growing proportion of the brighter girls in Spalding, yet it is achieving results equal to or better than many of the comprehensive schools in other parts of Lincolnshire. I was lucky enough to distribute the prizes at the Gleed last year and I can tell you that its success is largely about expectation, ethos, energy and enterprise. It is largely about what is expected of the girls who go to the school—a school which, bear in mind, has many children with learning difficulties. It is a secondary modern that takes a mixed catchment. I can tell you—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. I think the hon. Gentleman means that he can tell the House.

Mr. Hayes: I can tell you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—and through you, the House—that the school is a testament to the fact that grant-maintained schools that are non-selective, that deal with difficult catchments and that have no great advantages, can achieve outstanding results. The school has improved consistently over five years, with none of the apparent advantages mentioned by the hon. Members for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner) and for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard).

The school is joined to another secondary modern—not just on the same site, but in the same building—which is not grant maintained; Sir John Gleed boys' school. It is an excellent school, but it is not as yet achieving the results that the girls' school is achieving. This is not about new buildings, greater capital investment or some disproportionate funding mechanism that gives undue and unreasonable advantage to the school; it is about spirit, enterprise, energy and liberty—it is about being grant maintained.

There will be those—imperialists always say this—who say that the schools would have been better off under LEA control. There will be those who make light of the intangible concepts I have described. Having visited grant-maintained schools not just in my constituency, but all over Britain, I have scarcely found one that would willingly give up that status. I have scarcely found a head teacher who would honestly say he regretted going grant maintained—even those who initially had reservations, who were not natural supporters and who were not Conservatives but socialists or Liberals. That is why they are so concerned and bitter about the proposals.

With a degree of empiricism, I can genuinely say that grant-maintained status has been a success. Given that empiricism, it is hard to imagine why a fair-minded and objective Government would want to snuff out that success—but that is precisely the prospect we have before us tonight. It is not, I am happy to say, a proposal with which I wish to be associated.

Given the initial failure of this confused and mixed-up Bill, I look forward to the Government clarifying their position on the future of education as they perceive it; clarifying how they see the role of LEAs and how they will develop; clarifying how they see the freedom of individual schools developing and, of course, clarifying what direction needs to emanate from the Government.

The Bill does none of those things. It is a poor start. Ultimately, because we all want a good education for our children, in a spirit of generosity I hope that the Government will do considerably better in the future.

Mr. Bercow: A number of my hon. Friends spoke eloquently of the success of grant-maintained schools. In each case, they cited schools in their constituencies that have performed, and continue to perform, exceptionally well. To date, none of the evidence that my hon. Friends adduced in support of the proposition has been disputed by any hon. Member.

It should be placed on the record that the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), whose long-standing hostility to grant-maintained schools is well understood, seeks to obscure the realities by posing a challenge to grant-maintained schools that it is wholly unreasonable for the House to expect them to fulfil. The point bears examination. He asked in all sincerity whether successful grant-maintained schools had contributed to the greater success of all schools. The implication was that, unless they could demonstrate that they had, their raison d'etre would disappear.

[Mr. Bercow]

I disagree. It is clear that these schools have succeeded by themselves. I have four in my constituency that are dramatic beacons of excellence. They are thriving at all levels, including key stage 2, GCSE and A-level, in providing facilities, in satisfying their requirements in sport, in achieving excellence in pastoral care, and so on. Each and every one of them is a success.

If the hon. Member for Bath challenges me to prove that those schools have also raised the standards of all other maintained schools in Buckinghamshire, I will readily concede that I cannot—of course I cannot—but equally, and more important, he cannot prove that successful grant-maintained schools in Buckinghamshire have in any way damaged the educational attainments of other schools. That is the point. The onus of proof is not on a grant-maintained school to demonstrate that, as well as educating successfully its own pupils, it has managed somehow to achieve the extraordinary feat of educating successfully pupils of other schools. At most, all that is necessary is for it to be able to demonstrate that it has not undermined the quality of education provided in other institutions, and on that I very much doubt whether the hon. Gentleman will be able to provide evidence.

It is uncharitable of the hon. Gentleman in a sense to smear grant-maintained schools by requiring of them achievements that he would not require of ordinary maintained schools. The record of grant-maintained schools compares favourably with that of other schools. I would be no more likely to assert that all state schools should be grant maintained than any other Opposition Member. I have never argued that case. Many such schools do not wish to be. However, many have chosen to be grant maintained and, having escaped—I use that word advisedly—local education authority control, scarcely any of those of which I am aware now wish to go back into that control.

I am a fair-minded fellow, charitable even—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—as my hon. Friends' ready enthusiasm in greeting my observations testifies. I am not making a party political observation. I could point to all the examples of Labour local education authorities that have been so incompetent, malign and manifestly unsuitable that schools have rushed to escape their clutches—but I will not.

I point instead to the schools in my constituency and elsewhere in the county of Buckinghamshire that have opted to become self-governing outwith the control of Buckinghamshire county council. I am happy to describe and to criticise again and again the outrageous antics and consecutive failures year after year of left-wing education authorities, and I point to their passion for political correctness.

I make no such charges against Buckinghamshire county council. It is an estimable local education authority, so schools in my patch are not trying to escape the council's control because it is extremist or politically correct, is opposed to standards or has a track record of failure. None of those charges would be true. Indeed, the opposite is true in every case.

The county as a whole is dramatically successful, and many of its thriving schools are within LEA control. Those that have opted to become free of that control—to go their own way, make their own decisions, allocate their own funds, organise their own priorities and determine their own successes—have, without exception, upon my visiting them or via correspondence, told me that they welcome that state of affairs and wish it to continue.

That leads me to my second and final point.

Mr. Brady: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way to me, especially before he moves on to his second point—for which I can scarcely contain my anticipation. He has made an eloquent case for the excellence of grant-maintained status, in that, even in such a good local authority area as Buckinghamshire, schools still see its value. Grant-maintained status is not a negative thing, adopted merely to escape from bad local education authorities.

I have an even better example of the quality and merit of grant-maintained status. Two independent schools in my constituency have opted for grant-maintained status, because they believe that they will continue to enjoy the freedom that they had as independent schools, while being able to give the same quality of education to people regardless of ability to pay. Is it not a disgrace that the Government seek to destroy that state of affairs?

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. Perversely, the Government could end up by expanding the fee-paying sector as a result of their dogmatic hostility to the self-governing sector of the British education system. They would not want to do that, and they did not anticipate or plan for it, but that could be the outcome.

It comes down to a question of democracy, and whether people have a right to have their schools run by people whom they do elect and can remove, or whether they should suffer the fate, of which the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) regularly reminds us, of affairs being run by people whom they do not elect and cannot remove.

Let there be ballots; let people have a say; let the cross be placed on the paper to determine the outcome. If that can happen for grammar schools, I ask the Secretary of State why it cannot happen for grant-maintained schools.

I have said before, and I say again, that Conservatives can be forgiven for thinking that, just conceivably, the reason why the Government do not want ballots—

Ms Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West): Get on with it.

Mr. Bercow: No, I am afraid that I shall have to extend the hon. Lady's pain, because the embarrassment that the point causes the Government needs to be emphasised.

The reason why the Government do not want ballots is that they know that, in almost every instance, they—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Ms Squire) has clearly had her day and it is obvious that she is suffering from an illness from which I hope she will in due course recover. The Government will lose and we will win. Let democracy speak. Allow the parents to vote.

9.30 pm

Mr. Don Foster: It is a charitable person who seeks to find some good in even the most misguided of people. I enjoyed the contribution of the hon. Member for South

Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes), but I disagreed with it fundamentally. However, I agreed with one point, and that was his reference to the need for us to have high expectations of the children in our schools and of the schools themselves. He was right to draw our attention to that. I suspect that, in the past, some LEAs have not had high enough expectations of their schools, and that some teachers have not had high enough expectations of their pupils.

I even find some good—very little, but some—in the contribution of the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow). The hon. Gentleman at least made the point that there are some good grant-maintained schools, and I agree. There are many good grant-maintained schools. My constituency has two excellent grant-maintained schools—Beechen Cliff school and Oldfield school. They are both excellent schools with excellent staff doing a good job for the pupils whom they serve.

To say that there are good grant-maintained schools does not mean that grant-maintained status itself is a good thing. The one other thing which I share with the hon. Members for South Holland and The Deepings and for Buckingham is a disagreement with the Government's plans, but my disagreement comes from a completely different direction. Both hon. Gentlemen and the official Opposition oppose what the Government are doing because they want grant-maintained schools to continue. My party and I are clear in that we have no desire whatever to see that continuation. Our disappointment with the Government is that, instead of doing as we would wish them to do, which is to bring grant maintained schools back into the light strategic planning framework of LEAs, they are continuing to give those schools a sop by allowing them to stand outside the LEA framework. We believe that that is wrong.

At least the Government have recognised the need to get rid of grant-maintained status, and we are delighted that they have done that. As I said earlier in an intervention, grant-maintained status has not been popular. It was born out of Mrs. Thatcher's handbag back in 1988. We were told that it would be extremely popular and that, before long, the vast majority of schools would be grant maintained. That did not prove to be the case, despite the numerous bribes that were given to schools to become grant maintained. Year after year, the Tory Government came up with another new attempt to persuade schools to become grant-maintained, even requiring every governing body to consider annually whether to become grant maintained.

The one bribe that grant-maintained schools were given was the additional sums of money. When official Opposition Members tell us about some of the successes of some grant-maintained schools, the House should never forget that that is hardly surprising, as schools were given significantly increased sums to enable them to carry out the various things that led to some of those successes.

Mr. Brady: Given the hon. Gentleman's conviction that grant-maintained schools are so desperately unpopular, presumably he would have no qualms in agreeing with our new clause, which would allow parents to get rid of grant-maintained schools by voting to get rid of them.

Mr. Foster: The interesting thing about the hon. Gentleman's intervention is that it was the Conservative Government who, year after year, refused to allow the two-way option for grant-maintained schools. They were allowed to opt into grant-maintained status, but the Government refused to give them the power to vote to opt back out. It was the Conservative Government who wanted a simple one-way street and, once in, a school was stuck in it. Grant-maintained schools have had significant amounts of additional money; there is no doubt about that.

I have been challenged about the education results of GM schools. Anyone who has responsibility for education provision must look at the impact of any change in the system on the overall educational setting across the whole country. I would argue strenuously that the introduction of GM schools did huge damage to the education system. It set school against school, parent against parent and governor against governor. That led to great tension and problems in the system.

Giving additional money to GM schools has been to the detriment of all other schools. That additional money was taken from other schools.

Mr. Hayes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Foster: No, I will not as time is short and other hon. Members—

Mr. Dorrell rose—

Mr. Foster: Of course, I will give way to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Dorrell: In Committee, the hon. Gentleman voted for a clause that would require the Government to secure the consent of parents before abolishing grammar school status. The hon. Gentleman approves of that principle. Will he explain why he does not support the same principle for grant-maintained schools?

Mr. Foster: If the right hon. Gentleman checks the record, he will see that I made it clear that I did not believe that such decisions should be taken on a parental ballot. They should be taken by the local education authority. The right hon. Gentleman is well aware that the one major difference between GM schools and grammar schools is that GM schools are outside LEA provision.

Mr. Dorrell: I have Hansard in front of me. The hon. Gentleman voted for clause 95 to stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Foster: I explained that afterwards.

Mr. Dorrell: It is not a question of what the hon. Gentleman said afterwards. Even the Liberal Democrats must occasionally defend the votes they cast and explain why one case is different from the other.

Mr. Foster: I ask the right hon. Gentleman to continue to read Hansard—

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): The hon. Gentleman is squirming.

Mr. Foster: No, I am not squirming. Immediately after the vote, I realised that I had made an error in my voting.

Mr. Dorrell rose—

Mr. Foster: The right hon. Gentleman and I can continue this debate outside the Chamber. [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] No—others wish to speak.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman remembers a time when he mistakenly cast his vote the wrong way, but it was not in the vote on clause 95 stand part, dealing with the principle of the grammar school ballot. If the hon. Gentleman did vote the wrong way on that, he did not tell the Committee so at the time.

Mr. Foster: If the right hon. Gentleman looks through the record, which he needs to do, as he was not with us during the discussion on that particular issue—

Mr. Dorrell: I spoke on the clause and voted on it.

Mr. Foster: I want to make progress and the House wants to hear from the Secretary of State on this issue.

The key issue that has been raised tonight is whether grant-maintained schools have led to an increase in educational standards across the country. Research evidence shows conclusively that the introduction of GM schools has not led to an overall increase in examination results. Therefore, as an experiment it has failed. However—and I acknowledge this—because of the additional resources given, some GM schools have been able to raise standards, but that has been to the detriment of other schools in the LEA area. The net result has been no increase in standards; it has been a failed experiment.

I hope that the House will recognise that GM schools represent a failed policy of the Conservative Government. The sooner that we get rid of them, the better. I very much hope that the House will reject the Conservative new clause.

Mr. Blunkett: I thank my hon. Friends for their forbearance this evening. It is a great pity that so much hot air has been expended on so much self-preening. It is a wonder that all the feathers have not fallen out. I say that because Monty Python has reconvened for a final fling, and I was reminded of the famous sketch about the dead parrot. This debate is a dead parrot. It is nailed to the perch. The Norwegian blue is gone for ever, and we have had one or two Norwegian blues tonight. I have never heard such nonsense in all my life.

Mrs. Browning: Oh, come on. You must have.

Mr. Blunkett: I will let the hon. Lady into a secret: she is probably right. I have probably heard worse once or twice in my life, but we have come fairly close this evening.

Opposition Members know perfectly well that what they are saying is not true, but I welcome the fact that they have acknowledged and specifically embraced the process of balloting for the removal of selection in grammar schools, and recommended its extension into other areas. That gets us off to a sensible start in operating democracy.

Mr. Brady: Some of us might be prepared to accept ballots on the future of grammar schools if those ballots were fair and gave choice to local parents. The Government's proposals fail on that count. If the balloting procedure was fair, the Secretary of State might have an argument.

Mr. Blunkett: Of course we will have fair ballots. That is a necessary prerequisite, to legitimise the parents' decision.

As the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) pointed out, it is a cheek for Conservative Members, who resisted time and again giving parents the opportunity to decide whether they wanted a school to come back into the family of schools, to suggest that they are in favour of parents being able to vote on grant-maintained status. That really is the cheek of the devil.

The problem for Conservative Members is simple. They want to suggest that a school's status determines its standards, and that it is the change in status that has changed or enhanced standards in certain schools, when they know perfectly well that it is not. It may be something to do with resources. We have heard a lot about that tonight.

The extra resources have been praised as a very good thing. I am in favour of extra resources for all our schools. That is why we are giving an extra £1 billion for capital spending in schools. That is not only for certain schools. The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) argued that the girls grammar school in his area needed extra funding for restructuring. He said that it would be wrong to take away the extra funding.

Mr. Brady: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Don Foster: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Blunkett: I shall give way first to the hon. Member for Bath and then to the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West.

Mr. Foster: The Secretary of State rightly points out that the official Opposition are wrong in many ways. Does he agree that they are wrong in the totally scurrilous attack on me by the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell)? The record of our deliberations in Committee shows that I voted in favour of clause 95, which designated grammar schools, and against the balloting proposals.

Mr. Blunkett: I am totally in favour of fair balloting and of fair reporting of those ballots.

Mr. Brady: I want to correct a false impression that the Secretary of State appears to have. I was referring not to the capital costs of Altrincham girls grammar school—we are still fighting a battle to get capital funding for necessary repairs, and I would welcome his help with that—but to the process of restructuring the school staff, which was embarked on in good faith when the school became grant maintained last year. It was in the anticipation that that could be done over three years. Now the Government are prepared to guarantee funds for only one year, which could cause real problems.

Mr. Blunkett: I am fully in favour of extra revenue for schools. That is why we are allocating £835 million on top of what the Conservatives would have allocated—£110 per pupil, which happens to be the amount that the previous Government cut in 1996–97 per secondary school. They cut £40 per primary school.
